THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING of the Beginning and First Ages of the same, from the CREATION unto ABRAHAM.

The FIRST BOOK.

SECT. I. That the INVISIBLE GOD is seen in his Creatures.

OD, whom the wisest men acknowledge to be a Power uneffable, and Virtue infinite; a Light by abundant clarity invisible; an Understanding which itself can only comprehend, an Essence eternal and spiritual, of absolute pureness and simplicity; was, and is pleased to make himself known by the work of the world: In the wonderful magnitude whereof (all which he embraceth, filleth, and sustaineth) we behold the Image of that Glory which cannot be measured, and withal, that one, and yet universal Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious lights of heaven, we perceive a Shadow of his Divine Countenance; in his merciful provision for all that live, his manifold Goodness; and lastly, in creating and making excellent the world universal, by the absolute art of his own word, his Power and Almightyness; which Power, Light, Virtue, Wisdom, and Goodness, being all but attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and variety of celestial and terrestrial bodies: terrestrial, in their strange and manifold diversities; celestial, in their beauty and magnitude; which in their continual and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermix'd, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approach to the knowledge of the omnipotent Cause, and by these motions, their almighty Mover.

In these more than wonderful works, God (saith ^a Hugo) speaketh unto man: And it is true; that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, all that live, witness in themselves; the sensible, in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable souls: For, according to ^b St. Gregory,

^a Hugo super Eccles. Homil. 8. ^b Greg. in Mor. Herm. ad Al. Tat. 1. 5. Unus verò ingenuus, & non apparens, & immanifestus, omnia autem manifestans, per omnia apparet, & in omnibus. Apparentia solum generatorum est; nihil apparitio quam generatio.

Omnis homo eo ipso quod rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ratione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet: Every man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he, which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Job) which is, according to the fathers, Dominationem illius conspiciere in creaturis, To discern him in his providence by his creature. That God hath been otherwise seen, to wit, with corporal eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my understanding, grounded on these places of ^a St. John and ^a St. Paul, Ye have not heard his voice at any time, neither have ye seen his shape. And again, Whom never man saw, nor can see.

And this I am sure agrees with the nature of God's simplicity, of which St. Augustine, Ipsa enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, id ipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videri non potest; That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatsoever that be, the same cannot be corporally perceived. And of this opinion were ^b Origen, Cyril, Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzene, Hierome, Augustine, Gregory the great, Evaristus, Alcuinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authority. But by his own word, and by this visible world, is God perceived of men; which is also the understood language of the Almighty, vouchsafed to all his creatures, whose hieroglyphical characters are the unnumbered stars, the sun and moon; written on these large volumes of the firmament; written also on the earth and the seas, by the letters of all those living creatures, and plants, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned ^c Cusanus, Mundus universus nihil aliud est, quam Deus explicatus; The world universal is nothing else but God express'd. As the invisible things of God (saith ^d St. Paul) are seen by the creation of the world, being considered in his creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding than his own will, no other matter than his own power, no other workman than his own word, no other consideration than his own infinite goodness. The example and pattern of these his creatures, as he beheld the same in all eternity in the abundance of his own love, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his unchanged will moved, by his high wisdom disposed, and by his almighty power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to love God, ex fide, & ex effectibus (that is) both persuaded by his word, and by the effects of the world's creation: Neque enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognoscique potest, sed vel ex rerum, quæ factæ sunt, quæque fiunt & gubernantur, observatione & collatione; vel ex ipsius Dei verbo: For he, of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be known by any knowledge of cause or beginning (saith ^e Montanus) but either by the observing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and govern; or else by the word of God himself.

SECT. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the world to have been created by God.

THIS work and creation of the world, did most of the ancient and learned philosophers acknowledge, though by divers terms, and in a different manner express'd; I mean all those who are intitled by St. Augustine, summi philosophi, philosophers of highest judgment and understanding. ^f Mercurius Trismegistus calleth God, principium universorum, the original of the universal; to whom he giveth also the attributes of Mens, Natura, Actus, Necessitas, Finis, & Renovatio. And wherein he truly with St. Paul casteth upon God all power; confessing also, that the world was made by God's almighty word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus, fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heraclitus followed in opinion) took the word Fire to express God by (as in ^g Deuteronomy and in ^h St. Paul it is used) Omnia ex uno igne genita sunt, All things (saith he) are caused or produced out of one fire.

So did Orpheus plainly teach, that the world had beginning in time, from the will of the most high God: whose remarkable words are thus converted; ⁱ Cum abscondisset omnia Jupiter summus, deinde in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceive this sense: When great Jupiter had bidden all things in himself; working out of the love of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth, into grateful light, the admirable works which he had fore-thought.

Pindarus the poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most high, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Unus Deus, Pater, Creator summus. Plato calleth God the cause and original, the nature and reason of the universal; ^j Totius rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

Now, although the curiosity of some men have found it superfluous to remember the opinions of philosophers in matters of divinity (it being true, that the scripture hath not want of any foreign testimony) yet as the fathers, with others excellently learned, are my examples herein; so St. Paul himself did not despise, but thought it lawful and profitable, to remember whatsoever he found agreeable to the word of God among the heathen, - that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of ignorance, God rendring vengeance to them that know him not, as in the epistle to Titus he citeth Epimenides against the Cretans, and to the Corinthians, Menander; and in the seventeenth of the Acts, Aratus, &c. For, truth (saith St. Ambrose) by whomsoever uttered, is of the Holy Ghost; Veritas, à quo-cunque dicatur, à Spiritu Sancto est: And lastly, let those kind of men learn this rule; Quæ sacris serviunt, prophana non sunt; Nothing is prophane, that serveth to the use of holy things.

SECT. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Genes. I. 1.

THIS visible world, of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or first of all; in which (saith Tertullian) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrews seek some hidden mystery, and which in the Jews Targum is converted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men have conceived, both which are subsequent; but only to creation then. For before that beginning, there was neither primary matter to be informed, nor form to inform, nor any being, but the eternal. Nature was not, nor the next parent or time begotten, time properly and naturally taken: for if God had but disposed of matter already in being; then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of matter proceeded from a greater power, than that of God. And by what name shall we then call such an one (saith Laëtantius) as exceedeth God in potency; for it is an act of more excellency to make, than to dispose of things made? Whereupon it may be concluded, that matter could not be before this beginning; except we feign a double creation, or allow of two powers, and both infinite; the impossibility whereof scorneth defence. ^a Nam impossibile est plura esse infinita: quoniam alterum esset in altero finitum; There cannot be more infinites than one: for one of them would limit the other.

SECT. IV.

Of the meaning of the words Heaven and Earth,
Genes. ii. 1.

THE universal matter of the world (which Moses comprehendeth under the names of Heaven and Earth) is by divers diversly understood; for there are that conceive, that by those words was meant the first matter, as the Peripateticks understand it; to which St. Augustine and Isidore seem to adhere, Fecisti mundum (saith St. Augustine) de materia informi; quam fecisti de nulla re, pene nullam rem: that is, Thou hast made the world of a matter without form; which matter thou madest of nothing, and being made, it was little other than nothing.

But this potential and imaginary materia prima, cannot exist without form. Peter Lombard, the Schoolmen, Beda, Lyrans, Comestor, Tostatus, and others affirm, that it pleased God first of all to create the Empyrean Heaven: which at the succeeding instant (saith ^b Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Empyrean Heaven Steuchius Eugubinus calleth Divine clarity and uncreated: an error, for which he is sharply charged by Pererius, though (as I conceive) he rather failed in the subsequent, when he made it to be a place, and the seat of Angels, and just Souls, than in the former affirmation; for of the first, That God liveth in eternal light, it is written, ^c My soul, praise thou the Lord, that covereth himself with light: and in the Revelation, ^d And the city hath no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein also ^e John Mercer upon Genesis differeth not in opinion from Eugubinus: for as by Heaven created in the beginning, was not meant the invisible or supercelestial; so in his judgment, because it was in all eternity the glorious seat of God himself, it was not necessary to be created; Quem mundum super-cælestem meo judicio creari (saith Mercer) non erat necesse.

But as Moses forbore to speak of Angels, and of things invisible and incorporate, for the weakness of their capacities, whom he then cared to inform of those things which were most manifest (to wit) That God did not only by a strong hand deliver them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promise made to their fore-fathers; but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this aspectable, and perceivable universal: so on the other side I dare not think, that any supercelestial heaven, or whatsoever else (not himself) was increate and eternal; and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wisdom of mortal men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the seat of infinite power, no more than infinite power itself can be limited: for his place is in himself, whom no magnitude else can contain: How great is the house of God (saith ^f Baruch) how large is the place of his possession! it is great, and hath no end; it is high, and unmeasurable.

But leaving multiplicity of opinions, it is more probable and allowed, that by the words ^g Heaven and Earth, was meant the solid matter and substance, as well of all the heavens, and orbs supernal, as of the globe of the earth and waters, which covered it over (to wit) that very matter of all things, Materia, chaos, possibilitas, sive posse fieri. Which matter (saith ^h Calvin) was so called, Quod totius mundi semen fuerit; Because it was the seed of the universal: an opinion of ancient philosophers long before.

SECT. V.

That the substance of the waters, as mix'd in the body of the earth, is by Moses understood in the word earth: and that the earth, by the attributes of unformed and void, is described as the chaos of the ancient heathen.

Moses first nameth heaven and earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word earth; but afterwards he nameth them apart, when God by his spirit began to distinguish the confused mass, and (as Basil saith) Præparare naturam aquæ ad fecunditatem vitalem; To prepare the nature of water to a vital fruitfulness.

For under the word Heaven, was the matter of all heavenly bodies, and natures express'd: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatsoever is under the moon, and subject to alteration. Corrupt seeds bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure heavens are not subject, though subject to perishing. They shall perish (saith ⁱ David) and the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, saith ^k Esay. Neither were the waters the matter of earth; for it is written, ^l Let the waters under the heavens be gathered into one place, and let the dry land appear: which proveth, that the dry land was mix'd and covered with the waters, and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the waters were the matter or seed of the earth, much less of the universal. Initio tu, Domine, terram fundasti; Thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the earth: and again, ^m The earth was covered with the deep (meaning with waters) as with a garment, saith David. And if by natural arguments it may be proved, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth us also, that earth rarified may become water: water, air: air, fire: and so on the contrary. ⁿ Deus ignis substantiam per aerem in aquam convertit; God turneth the substance of fire by air into water. For the heavens and the earth remained in the same state in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicity of perfection, in respect of beauty and ornament. ^o Cælum vero & terra in statu creationis remanserunt quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita est. And the word which the Hebrews call Maim, is not to be understood according to the Latin translation simply, and as specific water; but the same more properly signifieth liquor. For (according to ^p Montanus) Est autem Maim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero aquas fecit; For Maim (saith he) is a double liquor (that is, of divers natures) and this name or word the Latins, wanting a voice to express it, call it in the plural, aquas, waters.

This mass, or indigested matter, or chaos, created in the beginning, was without form, that is, without the proper form, which it afterwards acquired, when the spirit of God had separated the earth, and digested it from the waters. ^a And the earth was void, that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and wrought this indigested matter into that form, which it now retaineth; then did the earth bud forth the herb, which seedeth seed, and the fruitful tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good; which attribute was not given to the earth, while it was confus'd; nor to the heavens, before they had motion, and adornment. God saw that it was good, that is, made perfect: for perfection is that to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecta sunt opera; The works of the perfect God are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect matter had the ancient poets their invention of Demogorgon; Hesiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that chaos: of which ^b Ovid;

*Ante Mare, & Terras, & (quod tegit omnia) cælum, Unus erat toto naturæ vultus in orbe,
Quem dixere chaos, rudis indigestaque moles.*

Before the sea and land was made, and heaven, that all doth hide,

In all the world one only face of nature did abide:
Which chaos hight, a huge rude heap.

S E C T. VI.

How it is to be understood, that the spirit of God moved upon the waters; and that this is not to be searched curiously.

AFTER the creation of heaven and earth, then void and without form, the spirit of God moved upon the waters. The seventy interpreters use the word superferebatur, moved upon or over: incubabat or fovebat, saith Hierome out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian doctor; Equidem non mecum tibi, sed viri cujusdam Syri sententiam recensito (saith Basil): which words incubare or fovere, importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, have a special likeness. Verbum translatus est ab avibus pulliti ei sue incubantibus, quamvis spirituali, & plane innarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their young, not corporally, but in a spiritual and unexpressible manner.

Some of the Hebrews convert it to this effect, spiritus Dei volitabat; The spirit of God did flutter: the Chaldean paraphrast in this sense, Ventus a conspectu Dei sufflabat: or, as others understand the Chaldean, Flabat, pellebat, removebat: The wind from the face of God did blow under, drive, or remove, or did blow upon; according to the ^c 11th Psalm, He caused his wind to blow, and the waters increase: but there was yet no wind nor exhalation. ^d Arias Montanus in these words, Et spiritus Elohim Merachefet, id est, efficaciter motitans, consovens, ac agitans super facies gemini liquoris; The spirit of God effectually and often moving, keeping warm, and cherishing, quickning and stirring upon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh four originals, whereof three are agents, and the last passive and material, to wit, Causa, which is the divine goodness: ^e Jehi, which is, fiat, sive erit, let it be, or, it shall be. Quæ vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit: Which voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the word of God. The third, spiritus elo-

him, the spirit of God, id est, Vis quædam divina, agilis ac præsens, per omnia pertingens, omnia complens; that is, a certain divine power, or strength, every where active and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Maim, id est, Materies ad omnem rem faciendam habilis; Matter apt to become every thing. For my self, I am resolved (Cum Deus sit superrationale omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reason above reason) that although the effects which follow his wonderful ways of working, may in a measure be perceived by man's understanding, yet the manner and first operation of his divine power, cannot be conceived by any mind, or spirit, compassed with a mortal body. Animalis homo quæ Dei sunt non percipit: For my thoughts (saith the Lord in ^f Esaï) are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways. And as the world hath not known God himself; so are his ways (according to St. Paul) pass finding out. O righteous father, the world hath not known thee, saith Christ. And therefore, whether that motion, vitality, and operation, were by incubation or how else, the manner is only known to God. ^g Quomodo in omnibus sit rebus, vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non capit; For how God (saith St. Augustine, speaking of his ubiquity) is in all things, either by essence, presence, or power, our understanding cannot comprehend. ^h Nihil inter Deum hominemque distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius Majestatis æternæ, cogitatio assequeretur humana; There would be no difference between God and man, if man's understanding could conceive the counsels and disposing of that eternal majesty; and therefore to be over-curious in searching how the all-powerful word of God wrought in the creation of the world, or his all-piercing and operative Spirit distinguishing, gave form to the matter of the universal, is a labour and search like unto his, who, not contented with a known and safe ford, will presume to pass over the greatest river in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his understanding. We behold the sun, and enjoy his light, as long as we look towards it, but tenderly, and circumspectly: we warm ourselves safely, while we stand near the fire; but if we seek to out-face the one, or enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to eschew curiosity; this is true, that the English word (moved) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoever is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with Mirandula, Vis causæ efficientis, The force of the efficient cause, St. Augustine sometimes taketh for the Holy Ghost; sometimes for a wind or breath, Sub nomine spiritus, Under the name of a spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for Virtualis creatura, for a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it also a breath or wind: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible spirit: Anaxagoras, Mentem: Tollatus, Voluntatem & mentem Dei, The will and mind of God; which Mens, Plato in Timæo maketh Animam mundi, The soul of the world: and in his sixth book, De Republica, he calleth it, The law of heaven; in his epistles, The Leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the incarnation of Christ our Saviour, Mens deficit, vox silet, & non mea tantum, sed etiam Angelorum; My mind faileth, my voice is silent, and not mine only, but even the voice of angels : so may all men else say in the understanding and utterance of the ways and works of the creation ; for to him (saith ^a Nazianzenus) there is not one substance by which he is, and another by which he can, Sed consubstantiale illi est, quicquid ejus est, & quicquid est ; Whatsoever attribute of him there is, and whatsoever he is, it is the very same substance that himself is.

But the spirit of God which moved upon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite active power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustaineth and giveth continuance to the universal. For the spirit of the Lord filleth all the world ; and the same is it which maintaineth all things, saith ^b Solomon. If thou send forth thy spirit (saith David) they are created : and Gregory, Deus suo præsentiali esse, dat omnibus rebus esse, ita quod si se rebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihilum defluerent universa : God giveth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himself from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would again fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of God's spirit in all things, ^c Virgil hath express'd excellently :

*Principio cælum ac terras, camposque liquentes, Lucentemque globum lunæ, Titaniaque astra,
Spiritus intus alit : totamque infusa per artus,
Mens agitat molem, & magno se corpore miscet.*

The heaven, the earth, and all the liquid main,
The moon's bright globe, and stars Titanian,
A spirit within maintains : and their whole mass,
A mind, which through each part infus'd doth pass.
Fashions, and works, and wholly doth transpierce
All this great body of the universe.

And this was the same spirit, which moved in the universal, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. ^d His spirit hath garnished the heavens, saith Job. So then the Spirit of God moved upon the waters, and created in them their spirituality, and natural motion ; motion brought forth heat ; and heat rarification, and subtilty of parts. By this spirit (which gave heat and motion, and thereby operation to every nature, while it moved upon the waters, which were in one indigested lump, and ^e chaos, disposed to all forms alike) was begotten air : an element superior, as lighter than the waters ; thro' whose vast, open, subtle, diaphanick or transparent body, the light, afterwards created, might easily transpierce : light for the excellency thereof being the first creature which God called good, whole creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chrysostom calleth a vital operation, Aquis a Deo insitam, ex qua aquæ non solum motionem, sed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A vital operation given by God unto the waters, whereby the waters had not only motion, but also power to procreate or bring forth living creatures.

SECT. VII.

Of the light created, as the material substance of the sun, and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it : and of the excellency and use of it : and of motion, and heat annexed unto it.

THESE waters were afterwards congregated, and called the sea : and this light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and united, and called the sun, the organ and instrument of created light.

For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceive) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the sun's creation, and the uniting of the dispersed light therein. This is proved by these words, ^f Let there be lights in the firmament, to separate the day from the night : which lights in the firmament of heaven, were also made for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and for years, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which, days and years are distinguished ; after which succeeded time, or together with which, that time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three days which preceded the sun's creation, or formal perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the day named in the fifth verse ; was but such a space, as afterwards by the sun's motion made a civil or natural day. And as waters were the matter of air, of the firmament, and of the lower and upper waters, and of the seas, and creatures therein ; earth, the matter of beasts, plants, minerals, and man's body : so may light (for expression sake) be called the chaos, or material substance of the sun, and other lights of heaven : howbeit, neither the sun, nor any thing sensible, is that light it self, ^g Quæ causa est lucidorum, Which is the cause that things are lightsome (tho' it make it self and all things else visible :) but a body most illightned, which illuminateth the moon, by whom the neighbouring region (which the Greeks call æther, the place of the supposed element of fire) is effected and qualified, and by it all bodies living in this our air. For this light Avicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium cælestium virtutum, & impressionum ; The conductor, and preserver, or nourisher of all celestial virtues and impressions, nothing descending of heavenly influences, but by the medium, or means of light. Aristotle calleth light a quality, inherent or cleaving to a diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inherens diaphano : but this may be better avouched of the heat, which it transporteth, and bringeth with it, or conducteth : which heat (say the Platonicks) ^h Abeunte lumine residet in subiecto ; The light being departed, doth reside in the subject, as warmth in the air, tho' the same be deprived of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academics make incorporeal, and so doth Montanus, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium ; Which neither hardness resisteth, nor space leaveth.

Aristotle findeth corporality in the beams of light ; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, saith ⁱ Picolominus, Democritus, Leuippus, and Epicurus, give materiality to light itself, but improperly : for it passeth at an instant, from the heaven to the earth ; nor is it resisted by any hardness, because it pierceth thro' the solid body of glass, or other cristalline matter ; and whereas it is withstood by unclean, and unpure earthy substances, less hard, and more easy to invade than the former, the same is, ^k Quod obstatulum natura terreum atque sordidum, non capit candilam luminis puritatem ; Because an obstacle, by nature earthy and foul, doth not receive the pure cleanness of light : alluding to that most divine light, which only shineth on those minds, which are purged from all worldly dross, and human uncleanness.

But of this created light there is no agreement in opinion ; neither do I marvel at it, for it cannot be found either in the fathers, philosophers, school-men, or other ancient or latter writers, that any of them understood either it or themselves therein : all men (to cast off ignorance) have disputed thereof, but there is no man that hath been taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferior to any in wit) as he hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others : so is his own judgment herein, as weak as any man's ; and most of the schoolmen were rather curious in the nature of terms, and more subtile in distinguishing upon the parts of doctrine already laid down, than discoverers of any thing hidden, either in philosophy or divinity : of whom it may be truly said, Nihil sapientie odiosius acumine nimio ; Nothing is more odious to true wisdom, than too acute sharpness. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men (which the same time hath brought forth and devoured) resolved us, whether this light be substantial, corporal, or incorporeal : corporal they say it cannot be, because then it could neither pierce the air, nor those hard, solid, and diaphanous bodies, which it doth ; and yet every day we see the air illightned : Incorporeal it cannot be, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the fathers so esteemed. Others say (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, because no form so excellent as it self to inform it : neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subject : for light being taken from the sun, the sun is no more the sun in existence. 2dly, If light were proceeding from matter and form, then either, or both, must be one of these, lucid or bright, dark or opaque, diaphanous or transparent ; but darkness cannot be parent of light, and things diaphanous (being neither light nor darkness, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or form, or both, be lucid and shining. 3dly, Lucid and shining obtain their so being of the light ; and therefore if we derive this being of light from a former, then would the progress go on infinitely and against nature ; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the sun hath his being primarily, and immediately of it self, and is therefore the sun's form, and the form of all lucid and shining bodies : but what is taught hereby, let others judge.

But in my understanding, Lumen (which may be englished by the word shine) is an intentional species of that which may be englished by light ; and so, this shining, which proceedeth from the sun, or other lights of heaven, or from any other light, is an image, or intentional species thereof ; and an intentional species may be understood by the example of a red or green colour, occasioned by the shining of the sun through red or green glass : for then we perceive the same colour cast upon any thing opposite ; which redness or other colour we call the intentional species of the colour in that glass. And again, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet understood, so it is disputed, whether this light first created, be the same which the sun inholdeth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer than till the sun's creation.

But by the most wise and unchanged order, which God observed in the works of the world, I gather, that the light, in the first day created, was the substance of the sun : for Moses repeateth twice the main parts of the universal : first, as they were created in matter ; 2dly, As they were adorned with form : first, naming the heavens, the earth, the waters, all confused ; and afterward, the waters congregated, the earth made dry land ; and the heavens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the earth, as it was earth, before it was uncovered, and before it was called Arida, or dry land ; and the waters were waters, before they were congregated and called the sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their virtual forms : so the sun, although it had not its formal perfection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (under the name of light) created ; and this light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day united, and set in the firmament of heaven : for, to light created in the first day God gave no proper place or fixation ; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation (which was to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this light was congregated and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisdom of God find cause why it should move (by which motion, days and nights are distinguished) till then : because there was not yet any creature produced, to which, by moving, the sun might give light, heat, and operation.

But after the earth (distinguished from waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herb, &c. God caused the sun to move, and (by interchange of time) to visit every part of the inferior world ; by his heat to stir up the fire of generation, and to give activity to the seeds of all natures : For, as a king, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that use and end, to which it was ordained ; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the light to be ; which by his all-powerful word he approved, and approving it, disposed thereof to the use and comfort of his future creatures.

But in that it pleased God to ask of Job, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth ? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not under man's understanding ; and therefore let it suffice, that by God's grace we enjoy the effects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (saith Esdra) and those which inhabit the heavens, do only know the Essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in caelo, nihil notum in terra : Nothing unknown in heaven, nothing perfectly known on earth. Res verae sunt in mundo invisibili ; in mundo visibili umbrae rerum : Things themselves are in the invisible world ; in the world visible, but their shadows. Surely, if this light be not spiritual, yet it approacheth nearest unto spirituality ; and if it have any corporality, then of all other the most subtile and pure ; for howsoever it is of all things seen, the most beautiful, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficial. For it ministrerh unto men, and other creatures, all celestial influences ; it dissipateth those sad thoughts and sorrows, which the darkness both begetteth and maintaineth ; it discovereth unto us the glorious works of God, and carrieth up with an angelical swiftness, our eyes unto heaven, that by the sight thereof, our minds being informed of his visible marvels, may continually travel to surmount these perceived heavens, and to find out their omnipotent cause and Creator. Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis ; Our knowledge doth not quiet it self in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cetera mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet ; It is the light (saith St. Ambrose) that maketh the other parts of the world so worthy of praise, seeing that it self communicateth its goodness and beauty unto all. Of which Ovid out of Orpheus :

^a Lucida corpora sunt plena sua luce, alienis tenebris impervia. Opaca sunt plena suis tenebris alieno lumine. ^b Transparentia tenebrae. ^c Diaphana. ^d Carent sui. & lumine & tenebris : alienis & lumine & tenebris permeantur. Scal. subt. ex. 71. ^e Gen. 1. 9. ^f Quomodo enim rex aliquis, &c. Procop. in Gen. 1. ^g Job 38. 24, 9. ^h Eld. 1. 2. c. 6. 40. ⁱ Herm. ^k Ficin.

*a Ille ego sum, qui longum metior annum,
Omnia qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus,
Mundi oculus.*

The world discerns it self, while I the world behold,
By me the longest years, and other times are told,
I the world's eye.

Lastly, if we may behold in any creature, any one spark of that eternal fire, or any far-off dawning of God's glorious brightness, the same in the beauty, motion, and virtue of this light, may be perceived. Therefore was God called Lux ipsa, and the light, by Hermes named lux sancta, and Christ our Saviour said to be b that light, which lightneth every man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect of God's incomprehensible sublimity, and purity, this is also true, that God is neither a mind, nor a spirit of the nature of other spirits; nor a light, such as can be discerned. Deus profecto non mens est, at vero ut sit mens causa est; nec spiritus, sed causa qua spiritus extat; nec lumen, sed causa qua lumen existit. God (saith Hermes in Poemandro) certainly is not a mind, but the cause that the mind hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.

So then the mass and chaos being first created, void, dark, and informed, was by the operative spirit of God, pierced and quickned, and the waters having now received spirit and motion, resolved their thinner parts into air, which God illightned: the earth also by being contiguate, and mixt with waters (participating the same divine virtue) c brought forth the bud of the herb that seedeth seed, &c. and for a mean and organ, by which this operative virtue might be continued, God appointed the light to be united, and gave it also motion and heat, which heat caused a continuance of those several species, which the earth (being made fruitful by the spirit) produced, and with motion began the time and times succeeding.

SECT. VIII.

Of the firmament, and of the waters above the firmament: and whether there be any crystalline heaven, or any primum mobile.

After that the spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarification and evaporation were ascended, and those of the earth and sea.

But these waters, separate above this extension, which the Latin translation calleth firmamentum, or expansum (for so Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius turn it) are not the crystalline heavens created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Basilius Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the same place many learned arguments against this fancy. For the waters above the firmament, are the waters in the air above us, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the neather waters by a firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the words Raquia (which Montanus writeth Rakiagh) and Shamajim, being indifferently taken for the heaven and for air, and more properly for the air and æther, than for the heavens, as the best Hebricians understand them, d Quo suprema ac tenuia ab infirmis crassis diducta, intersectaque disflarent; For that whereby the supreme and thin bodies were placed in distance, being severed and cut off from low and gross matters: and

And that the word heaven is used for the air, the scriptures every where witness; as in the c blessings of Joseph, and in the 104th Psalms, By these springs shall the fowl of the heaven dwell; and upon Sodom and Gomorrah it rained brimstone and fire out of the heaven; and in Isaac's blessing to Jacob, God give thee therefore of the dew of heaven: and in b Deuteronomy the 11th, But the land whither you go to possess it, is a land that drinketh water of the rain of heaven: and in i Job, Who hath ingendered the frosts of heaven? and in St. k Matthew, Behold the fowls of heaven, for they sow not. So as in all the scriptures of the Old Testament throughout, is the word heaven very oft used for air, and taken also hyperbolically for any great height, as, l Let us build us a tower, whose top may reach to heaven, &c. And in this very place Basil avoucheth, that this appellation of heaven for the firmament, is but by way of similitude: his own words be these; Et vocavit Deus firmamentum cælum. Hæc appellatio alii quidem proprie accommodatur, huic autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the firmament heaven: this appellation (saith Basil) is properly applied to another (that is, to the starry heaven) but to this (that is, to the firmament dividing the waters) it is imposed by similitude. And if there were no other proof, that by the firmament was meant the air, and not the heaven; the words of Moses in the 8th verse, conferred with the same word firmament in the 20th verse, make it manifest: for in the 8th verse it is written, that God called the firmament, which divided waters from waters, heaven; and in the 20th verse he calleth the firmament of heaven, air; in these words, And let the fowl fly upon earth in the open firmament of heaven. And what use there should be of this icy, or crystalline, or watery heaven, I conceive not, except it be to moderate and temper the heat, which the primum mobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in very truth, instead of this help, it would add an unmeasurable greatness of circle, whereby the swiftness of that first moveable would exceed all possibility of belief. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; But no man ought to be held to impossibilities; and saith it self (which surmounteth the height of all human reason) hath for a forcible conductor the word of truth, which also may be called Lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; The light of all reason and understanding. Now that this supposed first moveable, turneth it self so many hundred thousand miles in an instant (seeing the scriptures teach it not) let those that can believe mens imaginations, apprehend it, for I cannot. But of these many heavens, let the reader that desireth satisfaction, search Orontius; and of this watery heaven, Basilius Magnus, in his Hexam. fol. 40, 41, &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, in his 2d book and 6th chapter. For my self, I am persuaded, that the waters called, 'The waters above the heavens, are but the clouds and waters engendred in the uppermost air.

SECT. IX.

A conclusion, repeating the sum of the works in the creation, which are reduced to three heads: the creation of matter, the forming of it, the finishing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the first chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise God in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but God's incomprehensible eternity. First, he created the matter of all things: and in the first three days he distinguished, and gave to every nature his proper form; the form of levity to that which ascended; to that which descended, the form of gravity: for he separated light from darkness, divided waters from waters, and gathered the waters under the firmament into one place. In the last three days, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the world: he set in the firmament of heaven, the sun, moon, and stars; filled the earth with beasts, the air with fowl, and the sea with fish, giving to all that have life a power generative, thereby to continue their species, and kinds; to creatures vegetative and growing, their seeds in themselves; for ^a he created all things, that they might have their being: and the generations of the world are preserved.

S E C T. X.

That nature is no principium per se; nor form, the giver of being: and of our ignorance how second causes should have any proportion with their effects.

AND for this working-power, which we call nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle; the same is nothing else, but the strength and faculty, which God hath infused into every creature, having no other self-ability, than a clock, after it is wound up by a man's hand, hath. Those therefore that attribute unto this faculty, any first or sole power, have therein no other understanding, than such a one hath, who looking into the stern of a ship, and finding it guided by the helm and rudder, doth ascribe some absolute virtue to the piece of wood, without all consideration of the hand that guides, or of the judgment, which also directeth and commandeth that hand: forgetting in this and in all else, that by the virtue of the first act, all agents work whatsoever they work: Virtute primi actus, agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: For as the mind of man seeth by the organ of the eye, heareth by the ears, and maketh choice by the will: and therefore we attribute sight to the eye, and hearing to the ears, &c. and yet it is the mind only, that giveth ability, life, and motion to all these his instruments and organs; so God worketh by angels, by the sun, by the stars, by nature or infused properties, and by men as by several organs, several effects; all second causes whatsoever, being but instruments, conduits, and pipes, which carry and disperse what they have received from the head and fountain of the universal. For as it is God's infinite power, and every-where-presence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giveth to the sun power to draw up vapours, to vapours to be made clouds; clouds to contain rain, and rain to fall: so all second and instrumental causes together with nature it self, without that operative faculty which God gave them, would become altogether silent, virtuelss, and dead: of all which excellently ^b Orpheus; Per te virescunt omnia; All things by thee spring forth in youthful green. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable virtues which God hath given to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heavenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his works in their virtues praise him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the heathen philosophers, and those that follow them, have taken on them to teach: I say, there is not any one among them, nor any one among us, that could ever yet conceive it, or express it, ever enrich his own understanding with any certain truth, or ever edify others (not foolish by self-flattery) therein. For (saith Lactantius, speaking of the wisdom of the philosophers) Si facultas inveniendæ veritatis huic studio subjaceret, aliquando esset inventa; cum vero tot temporibus, tot ingeniiis in ejus inquisitione contritis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam; If in this study (saith he) were means to find out the truth, it had ere this been found out: but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits have been worn out in the enquiry of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisdom there to be had. ^c Nam si de una re præcisa scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessario haberetur; If the precise knowledge of any one thing were to be had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the philosophers were ignorant in nature, and the ways of her working; so were they more curious, than knowing, in their first matter and physical form. For if their first matter had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaveth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take concrescence, it hath not been taught, neither are these forms (saith a learned author) any thing, si ex ea exprimitur potentia, quæ nihil est. Again, how this first matter should be subjectum formarum, and passive, which is understood to precede the form, it is hard to conceive: for to make form, which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrary to all reason, divine and human: only it may be said, that originally there is no other difference between heat and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kind of rational consideration. Leaving therefore these riddles to their lovers, who by certain scholastical distinctions wrest and pervert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to prove a false eternity of the world, I think it far safer to affirm with St. Augustine, That all species and kinds are from God, from whom, whatsoever is natural proceedeth, of what kind or estimation soever; from whence are the seeds of all forms, and the forms of all seeds and their motions; A quo est omnis species, a quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cujuscunque generis est, cujuscunque estimationis est; a quo sunt semina formarum, forma seminum, motus seminum atque formarum. And thus much Averrois is forced to confess. For all forms (saith he) are, in primo motore; which is also the opinion of ^d Aristotle in the 12th of his Metaph. and of Albertus upon Dionysius.

S E C T. XI.

Of fate; and that the stars have great influence: and that their operations may diversely be prevented or furthered.

AND, as of nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning fate or destiny, of which the opinions of those learned men that have written thereof, may be safely received, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an inevitable necessity, and made it more general, and universally powerful than it is, by giving it dominion over the mind of man, and over his will, of which Ovid, and Juvenal:

Servis regna dabunt, captivis fata triumphos.

'Gainst fate no counsel can prevail.
 Kingdoms to slaves by destiny,
 To captives triumphs given be.

An error of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillianists, the Bardisanists, and others, as ^b Basil, Augustine, and Thomas have observed: but that fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceived of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. ^c Plotinus out of the astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestial orbs, unchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things which a rational mind doth not order nor direct. Ptolemy, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to ^d fate a binding and inevitable necessity; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de unoquoque nostrum fatus est Deus) and the definite lot of all living. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the stars are instruments of far greater use, than to give an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after sun-set: it being manifest, that the diversity of seasons, the winters, and summers, more hot and cold, are not so uncertain by the sun and moon alone, who always keep one and the same course; but that the stars have also their working therein.

And if we cannot deny, but that God hath given virtues to springs and fountains, to cold earth, to plants and stones, minerals, and to the excremental parts of the basest living creatures, why should we rob the beautiful stars of their working powers? for seeing they are many in number, and of eminent beauty and magnitude, we may not think, that in the treasury of his wisdom, who is infinite, there can be wanting (even for every star) a peculiar virtue and operation; as every herb, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beautify the earth alone, and to cover and shadow her dusty face, but otherwise for the use of man and beast, to feed them and cure them; so were not those uncountable glorious bodies set in the firmament, to no other end, than to adorn it; but for instruments and organs of his divine providence, so far as it hath pleased his just will to determine. Origen upon this place of ^e Genesis, Let there be light in the firmament, &c. affirmeth, that the stars are not causes (meaning perchance binding causes;) but are as open books, wherein are contained and set down all things whatsoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of human wisdom: which latter part I believe well, and this saying of Syracides withal: ^f That there are hid yet greater things than these be, and we have seen but a few of his works. And though, for the capacity of men, we know somewhat, yet in the true and uttermost virtues of herbs and plants, which our selves sow and set, and which grow under our feet, we are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestial bodies. For hardly (saith ^g Solomon) can we discern the things that are upon the earth, and with great labour find we out those things that are before us: who can then investigate the things that are in heaven? ^h Multum est de rebus caelestibus aliquid cognoscere: It is much to know a little of heavenly things. But in this question of fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the heathen we do not bind God to his creatures, in this supposed necessity of destiny; so on the contrary, we do not rob those beautiful creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of these second causes despoiled God of his prerogative, or had God himself constrained the mind and will of man to impious acts by any celestial inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some were justifiable; of whom St. ⁱ Augustine, Impia perversitate in malis factis rectissime reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potius auctorem syderum, quam commissorem scelerum; Where we reprehend them of evil deeds, they again with wicked perverseness urge, that rather the author and creator of the stars, than the doer of the evil, is to be accused.

But that the stars and other celestial bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitive appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora caelestia (saith Damascene) constituunt in nobis habitus, complexiones, & dispositiones; The heavenly bodies (saith he) make in us habits, complexions, and dispositions; for the body (though ^k Galen inforce it further) hath undoubtedly a kind of drawing after it the affections of the mind, especially bodies strong in humour, and weak in virtues; for those of cholerick complexions are subject to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselves to be transported, where the mind hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her vassals, not her masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonless mind, I am resolved: for all those which were created mortal, as birds, beasts, and the like, are left to their natural appetites; over all which, celestial bodies (as instruments and executioners of God's providence) have absolute dominion. What we should judge of men, who little differ from beasts, I cannot tell; for as he that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them; so whosoever shall neglect the remedies by virtue and piety prepared, putteth himself altogether under the power of his sensual appetite; ^l Vincetur fatum si resistas, vincit si contempseris; Fate will be overcome, if thou resist it; if thou neglect, it conquereth.

But that either the stars or the sun have any power over the minds of men immediately, it is absurd to think, other than as aforesaid, as the same by the body's temper may be affected. Lumen solis ad generationem sensibilibus corporum confert, & ad vitam ipsam movet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the sun (saith St. ^m Augustine) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moveth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet still as a minister, not as a master: Bonus quidem est sol, in ministerio, non imperio; The sun is good to serve, not to sway (saith St. ⁿ Ambrose.) And St. Augustine, Deus regit inferiora corpora per superiora; God ruleth the bodies below by those above: but he avoucheth not, that superiour bodies have rule over mens minds, which are incorporeal.

But howsoever we are by the stars inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in nature and art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation; and Aristotle himself confesseth, that the heavens do not always work their effects in inferiour bodies, no more than the signs of rain and wind do always come to pass. And it is divers times seen, that paternal virtue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. ^o Est in juvenis patrum virtus; In the young offspring the fathers virtue is; and so on the contrary, patrum vitia: and herein also there is often found an interchange; the sons of virtuous men, by an ill constellation, become inclinable to vice; and of vicious men to virtue.

Egregia est soboles scelerato nata parente :

A worthy son is born of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after God's reserved power) that so much setteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the world so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing up, may fashion anew and reform them; nor any so well disposed, whom (the reins being let loose) the continual fellowship and familiarity, and the examples of dissolute men, may not corrupt and deform. Vessels will ever retain a favour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult either to cleanse the mind once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet favour of virtue first received, when the mind was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a favourable constellation (allowing that the stars incline the will) and a virtuous education do happily arrive, or the contrary in both, thereby it is that men are found so exceeding virtuous or vicious, heaven and earth (as it were) running together and agreeing in one: for as the seeds of virtue may, by the art and husbandry of christian counsel, produce better and more beautiful fruit, than the strength of self-nature and kind could have yielded them; so the plants, apt to grow wild, and to change themselves into weeds, by being set in a soil suitable, and like themselves, are made more unfavoury and filled with poison. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapiens adjuvabit opus astrorum, quemadmodum agricola terræ naturam; A wise man assisteth the work of the stars, as the husbandman helpeth the nature of the soil. And Ptolemy himself confesseth thus much, Sapiens, & omnia sapientis medici dominabuntur astris; A wise man, and the ominous art of a wise physician, shall prevail against the stars. Lastly, we ought all to know that God created the stars, as he did the rest of the universal; whose influences may be called his reserved and unwritten laws. But let us consider how they bind: even as the laws of men do; for although the kings and princes of the world have by their laws decreed, that a thief and a murderer shall suffer death; and though their ordinances are daily by judges and magistrates (the stars of kings) executed accordingly; yet these laws do not deprive kings of their natural or religious compassion, or bind them without prerogative, to such a severe execution, as that there should be nothing left of liberty to judgment, power, or conscience: the law in his own nature, being no other than a deaf tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) do sometimes for causes to themselves known, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves; it were then impious to take that power and liberty from God himself, which his substitutes enjoy; God being mercy, goodness, and charity it self. Otherwise that example of prayer by our Saviour taught; And let us not be led into temptation, but deliver us from evil, had been no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which only knoweth the operation of his own creatures truly) hath assured us, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble prayers and desires may not make frustrate and break asunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceive) that fate or destiny, though depending upon eternal power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependency, that God himself should in a kind have shut up himself therein; How miserable then were the condition of men. (saith Augustine) left altogether without hope.

And if this strength of the stars were so transferred, as that God had quitted unto them all dominion over his creatures; be he Pagan or Christian that so believeth, the only true God of the one, and the imaginary Gods of the other, would thereby be despoiled of all worship, reverence, or respect.

And certainly, God which hath promised us the reward of well-doing, which Christ himself claimed at the hands of the Father (I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do;) and the same God, who hath threatened unto us the sorrow and torment of offences, could not, contrary to his merciful nature, be so unjust, as to bind us inevitably to the destinies or influences of the stars, or subject our souls to any imposed necessity. But it was well said of Plotinus, that the stars were significant, but not efficient, giving them yet something less than their due: and therefore as I do not consent with them, who would make those glorious creatures of God virtuous: so I think that we derogate from his eternal and absolute power and providence, to ascribe to them the same dominion over our immortal souls, which they have over all bodily substances, and perishable natures: for the souls of men loving and fearing God, receive influence from that divine light it self, whereof the sun's clarity, and that of the stars, is by Plato called but a shadow, Lumen est umbra Dei, & Deus est lumen luminis; Light is the shadow of God's brightness, who is the light of light: But to end this question, because this destiny, together with providence, prescience, and predestination, are often confounded, I think it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two; for every man hath not observed it, though all learned men have.

SECT. XII.

Of PRESCIENCE.

Prescience, or foreknowledge (which the Greeks call Prognosis, the Latins Præcognitio, or Præscientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speak of God after the manner of men) goeth before providence: for God foreknew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and prescience is no other than an infallible foreknowledge. For whatsoever our selves foreknow, except the same be to succeed accordingly, it cannot be true that we foreknow it. But this prescience of God (as it is prescience only) is not the cause of any thing futurely succeeding: neither doth God's foreknowledge impose any necessity, or bind. For in that we foreknow that the sun will rise, and set; that all men born in the world shall die again; that after the winter the spring shall come; after the spring, summer, and harvest; and that according to the several seeds that we sow, we shall reap several sorts of grain, yet is not our foreknowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neither doth the knowledge in us bind or constrain the sun to rise and set, or men to dye; for the causes (as men persuade themselves) are otherwise manifest and known to all. The eye of man (saith Boetius) beholdeth those things subject to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is an horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their own natures. And again out of the same author; Divina providentia rebus generandis non imponit necessitatem, quia si omnia evenirent ex necessitate, præmia bonorum, & pœna malorum periret; Divine providence (saith he) imposeth no necessity upon things that are to exist; for if all come to pass of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of evil.

SECT. XIII.

Of PROVIDENCE.

NOW providence (which the Greeks call Pro-noia) is an intellectual knowledge, both foreseeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not only behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which prescience (simply taken) is not: and therefore providence by the philosophers (saith St. Augustine) is divided into memory, knowledge, and care: memory of the past, knowledge of the present, and care of the future: and we our selves account such a man for provident, as, remembering things past, and observing things present, can by judgment, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the future, and times succeeding. That such a thing there is as providence, the scriptures every where teach us; Moses in many places, the prophets in their predictions, Christ himself and his apostles assure us hereof; and besides the scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the providence of God; yea the Turks themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other in the most pestilent diseases, nor shun any peril whatsoever, though death therein do manifestly present it self.

The places of scripture proving providence, are so many, both in general and particular, as I shall need to repeat but a few of them in this place: Sing unto God (saith ^a David) which covereth the heavens with clouds, and prepareth rain for the earth, and maketh the grass to grow upon the mountains, which giveth the beasts their food, and feedeth the young raven that cries: ^b All these wait upon thee, that thou mayst give them food in due season: ^c and thou shalt drink of the river Chereth (saith God to Elijah) and I have commanded the ravens to feed thee there. ^d Behold, the fowls of the air, they sow not, nor reap, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: Again, ^e Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea, all the hairs of your head are numbered: And St. ^f Peter, Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you: And his judgments are written, saith ^g David.

God therefore, who is every where present, ^h Who filleth the heavens and the earth, whose eyes are upon the righteous, and his countenance against them that do evil, was therefore by Orpheus called oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things; and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other; for it is contrary to his own word, ⁱ Gloriam meam alteri non dabo; I will not give my glory to another. No man commandeth in the king's presence, but by the king's direction; but God is every where present, and king of kings. The example of God's universal providence is seen in his creatures. The father provideth for his children: beasts and birds and all living, for their young ones. If providence be found in second fathers, much more in the first and universal: and if there be a natural loving care in men, and beasts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whose divine love was the beginning, and is the bond of the universal: Amor divinus rerum omnium est principium, & vinculum universi (saith Plato): Amor Dei est nobis perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumque ejus immobile sustentaculum, ac universæ machinæ fundamentum; The love of God is the perpetual knot, and link or chain of the world, and the immovable pillar of every part thereof, and the basis and foundation of the universal. God therefore, who could only be the cause of all, can only provide for all, and sustain all; so as to absolute power, to every where presence, to perfect goodness, to pure and divine ^k love; this attribute transcendent hability of providence is only proper and belonging.

SECT. XIV.

Of PREDESTINATION.

NOW for predestination, we can difference it no otherwise from providence and prescience, than in this; that prescience only foreseeth; providence foreseeth and careth for, and hath respect to all ^l creatures, even from the brightest angels of heaven, to the unworthiest worms of the earth: and predestination (as it is used, especially by divines) is only of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their salvation properly, in the common use of divines; or perdition, as some have used it. Yet ^m Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernensis Theologus, and others, take the word predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicity. Divers of the fathers take it more largely sometimes: among whom St. Augustine speaking of two cities, and two societies, useth these words: Quarum est una, quæ prædestinata est in æternum regnare cum Deo, altera æternum supplicium subire cum diabolo; whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reign for ever with God, but the other is to undergo everlasting torment with the devil; for according to Nonius Marcellus, Destinare, est præparare; and of the same opinion are many protestant writers, as ⁿ Calvin, Beza, Bucanus, Daneus, and such like: and as for the manifold questions hereof arising, I leave them to the divines; and why it hath pleased God to create some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour, I will answer with Gregory, who saith, ^p Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his own infirmity, perceiveth the reason of his blindness. And again with St. ^q Augustine, Occulta esse causa potest, injusta esse non potest; Hidden the cause of his predestination may be, unjust it cannot be.

SECT. XV.

Of fortune: and of the reason of some things that seem to be by fortune, and against reason and providence.

LASTLY, seeing destiny or necessity is subsequent to God's providence, and seeing that the stars have no other dominion, than is before spoken, and that nature is nothing, but, as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificiosum Dei organum; The art, or artificial organ of God: And Cusanus, divini præcepti instrumentum; The instrument of the divine precept: we may then with better reason reject that kind of idolatry, or God of fools, called, fortune or chance; a goddess, the most revered, and the most reviled of all other, but not ancient: for Homer maketh her the daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Messenicks. call her τυχην, signifying a relative being, or betiding, so as before Homer's time this great lady was scarce heard of; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit gods, hath not a word of Fortune; yet afterwards she grew so great and omnipotent, as from kings and kingdoms, to beggars and cottages, she ordered all things, resisting the wisdom of the wisest, by making the possessor thereof miserable; valuing the folly of the most foolish, by making their success prosperous: inasmuch as the actions of men were said to be but the sports of fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens lives, but her pastimes: of which ^a*Palladius*, Vita hominum ludus fortunæ est; The life of man is the play of fortune: and because it often falleth out, that enterprizes guided by ill counsels, have equal success to those by the best judgment conducted, therefore had fortune the same external figure with sapience; whereof Athenæus:

*Longissime a sapientia fors diffidet,
Sed multa perficit tamen simillima:*
From wisdom fortune differs far,
And yet in works most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly understood) is nothing else but a power imaginary, to which the success of human actions and endeavours were for their variety ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be given, then was it attributed to fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant; contrary to this true ground of Plato, Nihil est ortum sub sole, cujus causa legitima non præcesserit; Nothing ever came to pass under the sun, of which there was not a just preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatsoever may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, besides the intention of the inferior, but not besides the intention of the superior; Præter intentionem inferioris, sed non præter intentionem superioris (to wit, the ordinance of God;) and therefore (saith ^b*Melanchton*) Quod poetæ fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; whom the poets call fortune, we know to be God. And that this is true, the scripture in many places teacheth us; as in the Law of murder, He that smiteth a man, and he die, shall die the death; and if a man hath not laid wait, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the scripture hath these words, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, if he hurt him by chance: and in ^d*Deuteronomy*, where the slipping the ax from the helve, whereby another is slain, was the work of God himself; we in our phrase attribute this accident, to chance or fortune: and in ^e*Proverbs*, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casual and subject to fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicks, to this effect, that the same power which they called Animam mundi, the soul of the world, was no other than that incomprehensible wisdom, which we express by the name of God, governing every being as well in heaven as in earth; to which wisdom and power they sometime gave the title of necessity or fate, because it bindeth by inevitable ordinance: sometime, the style of fortune, because of many effects there appear unto us no certain causes. To this effect speaketh St. Augustine in his questions upon Genesis the first book: the same hath Seneca in his 4th of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which sect he was: ^f*For whatsoever* (saith he) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, distinguished by divers terms, according as he useth, and exerciseth his power diversly.

But it may be objected, that if fortune and chance were not sometimes the causes of good and evil in men, but an idle voice, whereby we express success; how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depend upon so many unworthy and empty-headed fools? That riches and honour are given to external men, and without kernel; and so many learned, virtuous, and valiant men wear out their lives in poor and dejected estates? In a word, there is no other inferior, or apparent cause, beside the partiality of man's affection, but the fashioning and not fashioning of our selves according to the nature of the time wherein we live: for whosoever is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath withal an honest and open heart and loving truth: if princes, or those that govern, endure no other discourse than their own flatteries: then, I say, such an one, whose virtue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall evermore hang under the wheel; which kind of deserving well and receiving ill, we always falsely charge fortune withal. For whosoever shall tell any great man or magistrate, that he is not just; the general of an army, that he is not valiant; and great ladies, that they are not fair; shall never be a counsellor, a captain, or a courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wise with a wise prince, valiant with a valiant, and just with him that is just, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperity; but he must also change with the successor, if he be of contrary qualities; sail with the tide of the time, and alter form and condition, as the estate or the estate's master changeth: otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attain to honour and riches, but by such an observant slavish course? These men having nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kind of wondering at other men, and by making them believe that all their vices are virtues, and all their dusty actions crystalline, have yet in all ages prospered equally with the most virtuous, if not exceeded them. For, according to Menander, Omnis insipiens arrogantiæ & plausibus capitur; Every fool is won with his own pride, and others flattering applause: So as whosoever will live altogether out of himself, and study other mens humours, and observe them, shall never be unfortunate; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and virtue (except the season wherein he liveth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodness, fruitful) shall never prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to war or contend in vain against the nature of times wherein he liveth: for such a one is often the author of his own misery; but best it were to follow the advice, which the pope gave the bishops of that age, out of Ovid, while the Arian heresy raged:

While fury gallops on the way,
Let no man fury's gallop stay.

^a Sen. ep. 91. ^b An. viét. de Pertinace, Sen. ep. 74. What more fooliſh than for him that deſpairs (eſpecially of the effect) to be entangled with endleſs contentions? Whoſoever therefore will ſet before him Machiavel's two marks to ſhoot at (to wit, riches, and glory, muſt ſet on and take off a back of iron to a weak wooden bow, that it may fit both the ſtrong and the feeble; for as he, that firſt deviſed to add ſails to rowing veſſels, did either ſo proportion them as being faſtened aloft,

But of this diſpute of fortune, and the reſt, or of whatſoever Lords or Gods, imaginary powers, or cauſes, the wit (or rather fooliſhneſs) of man hath found out: let us reſolve with St. Paul, who hath taught us, that there is ^a but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him, and one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diverſities of operations, but God is the ſame, which worketh all in all.

CHAP. II.

Of Man's eſtate in his firſt Creation, and of God's reſt.

SECT. I.

Of the image of God, according to which man was firſt created.

THE creation of all other creatures being finiſhed, the heavens adorned, and the earth replenished, God ſaid, ^a Let us make man in our own image, according to our likenesſs.

Man is the laſt and moſt admirable of God's works to us known: ^b Ingens miraculum homo; Man is the greateſt wonder (ſaith Plato out of Mercurius;) Naturæ ardentiffimæ artificium; The artificial work of the moſt ardent or fire-like nature (as ſaith Zoroaſter;) though the ſame be meant, not for any excellency external, but in reſpect of his internal form, both in the nature, qualities, and other attributes thereof: in nature, becauſe it hath an eſſence, immortal and ſpiritual in qualities, becauſe the ſame was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, becauſe man was made lord of the world, and of the creatures therein.

More holy than the reſt, and underſtanding more,
A living creature wants, to rule all made before,
So man began to be.

Of this image and ſimilitude of God, there is much diſpute among the fathers, ſchoolmen, and late writers: ſome of the fathers conceive, that man was made after the image of God, in reſpect chiefly of empire and dominion, as St. Chryſoſtom, Ambroſe, and ſome others: which St. Ambroſe denieth to the woman in theſe words, Ut ſicut Deus unus, ab eo fieret homo unus; & quomodo ex Deo uno omnia, ita ex uno homine omne genus eſſet ſuper faciem totius terræ: unus igitur unum ſecit, qui unitatis ejus haberet imaginem; That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kind ſhould be upon the face of the whole earth: therefore he being one, made one, that ſhould have the image of his unity. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the ſame verſe, that man was after the image of God in reſpect of rule and power; it is written Dominamini in the plural number; and let them rule over the fiſh in the ſea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceive, that man is ſaid to be after the image of God in reſpect of his immortal ſoul only: becauſe as God is inviſible, ſo the ſoul of man is inviſible; as God is immortal and incorporeal, ſo is the ſoul of man immortal and incorporeal; and as there is but one God which governeth the world, ſo but one ſoul which governeth the body of man; and as God is wholly in every part of the world, ſo is the ſoul of man wholly in every part of the body: Anima eſt tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The ſoul is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in every part thereof, according to Ariſtotele; though Chalcidius, and other learned men, deny that doctrine; which that it is otherwiſe than potentially true, all the Ariſtotelians in the world ſhall never prove. Theſe and the like arguments do the Jews make (ſaith Toſtatus) and theſe reſemblances, between the infinite God, and the finite man.

The ſchool-men reſemble the mind or ſoul of man to God, in this reſpect eſpecially; becauſe that as in the mind there are three diſtinct powers, or faculties (to wit) memory, underſtanding, and will; and yet all theſe being of real differences, are but one mind: ſo in God there are three diſtinct perſons, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, and yet but one God. They alſo make the image and ſimilitude divers; and again, they diſtinguiſh between imaginem Dei, and ad imaginem Dei; and ſpin into ſmall threds with ſubtile diſtinctions many times the plainneſs and ſincerity of the ſcriptures: their wits being like that ſtrong water, that eateth thro' and diſſolveth the pureſt gold. Victorinus alſo maketh the image of God to be ſubſtantial, but not the ſimilitude: Sed in ſubſtantia nomen qualitatis declarativum; A word declaring quality in the ſubſtance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inferred, that as the image and ſimilitude do greatly differ, ſo the ſinful ſoul doth not therefore leave to be the image of God; but it hath not his ſimilitude, except it be holy and righteous. St. Auguſtine alſo againſt Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by sin, the perfection of this image is lost in man; and in his retractions maintaineth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the similitude is more largely taken, than the image.

But howsoever the school-men and others distinguish, or whatsoever the fathers conceive; sure I am, that St. Paul maketh the same sense of the image, which Victorinus doth of the similitude, who saith, As we have borne the image of the earthly, so shall we bear the image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the scriptures, that the words image and similitude were used but in one sense, and in this place the better to express each other; whatsoever Lombard hath said to the contrary. For God knows, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himself in the scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, ever conceived. Now as St. Paul useth the word (image) for both: so St. James useth the word (similitude) for both, in these words: There-with bless we God even the Father, and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude of God. Howsoever therefore St. Augustine seemeth, out of a kind of elegancy in writing, to make some difference: as where he writeth, Confitemur imaginem in eternitate, similitudinem in moribus inveniri; We confess that this image is found in eternity, but his similitude in manners, that is, in the spiritual dispositions and qualities of the mind; yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly: Quasi vero possit esse imago aliqua, in qua similitudo non sit: si enim omnino similis non est, proculdubio nec imago est; As if (says he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeness, there is no image. The very words of the text make this most manifest, as, Let us make man in our image, according to our likeness; which is, Let us make man in our image, that he may be like us: and in the next verse following, God himself maketh it plain; for there he useth the word (image) only as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguity, in the first verse of the fifth chapter, the word (similitude) is used again by it self, as, In the day that God created Adam, in the likeness of God made he him. And this similitude St. Paul, calleth the image; Put on (saith he) the new man which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him. And in Syracides it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may believe St. Paul before Peter Lombard and other school-men, then it is as manifest as words can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same; for St. Paul useth both the words directly in one sense. For they turned the glory of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanchius laboureth to prove, that man was formed after the image of God, both in body and mind: Nulla pars in homine, que non fuerit huiusce imaginis particeps; No part in a man (saith he) which was not participating God's image; for God said, Let us make man according to our own image. But the soul alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole man compounded of body and soul. The body of man (saith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his body, must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his own objection seemeth to me sufficient, where he alledgeth that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortal man, yet is not the whole man mortal, but the body only: so when God said, Let us make man after our image, he meant the soul of man, and not the body of earth and dust: Maledictus qui deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (saith St. Augustine;) Cursed is he that referreth the Deity of God to the lineaments of man's body: Deus enim non est humane forme particeps, neque corpus humanum divine (saith Philo;) God is not partaker of human form, nor human body of the form divine. The Hebrew word for image, is Tselem, which signifieth a shadow or obscure resemblance: In imagine pertransit homo; Man passeth away in shadow: Let us then know and consider, that God, who is eternal and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition, for it is both against his nature and his word; an error of the Anthropomorphite, against the very essence and majesty of God.

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more divine understanding than these gross Hereticks: Ad similitudinem Dei propius accedebat humana virtus, quam figura; The virtue which is in man (saith he) came nearer the similitude of God than the figure. For God is a spiritual substance, invisible, and most simple; God is a just God, God is merciful, God is charity it self, and (in a word) goodness it self, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himself to teach us, and to make us known of himself. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherein can man be said to resemble his unexcogitable power and perfectness? Certainly, not in dominion alone; for the devil is said to be the prince of this world, and the kingdom of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father: neither because man hath an immortal soul, and therein the faculties of memory, understanding, and will; for the devils are also immortal, and participate those faculties, being called demonies, because scientes of knowledge and subtilty: neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts: for who have rebelled against God? who have made gods of the vilest beasts, of serpents, of cats, of owls, yea, even of shameful parts, of lusts and pleasures, but reasonable men? Yet do I not condemn the opinion of St. Crisostom and Ambrose, as touching dominion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with justice and piety; for God did not only make man a ruler and governor over the fishes of the sea, the fowls of heaven (or of the air) and over the beasts of the field; but God gave unto man a dominion over men, he appointed kings to govern them, and judges to judge them in equity. Neither do I exclude reason, as it is the ability of understanding. For I do not conceive, that Irenaeus did therefore call man, the image of God, because he was animal rationale only; but that he understood it better, with Sybilla; Imago mea est homo, rectam rationem habens; Man that is endued with right reason is said to resemble God (that is) by right reason to know and confess God his Creator, and the same God to serve, love, and obey; and therefore said St. Augustine (who herein came nearer the truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & similitudinem suam in mente; God made man in respect of the intellect after his own image and similitude; and

SECT. II.

Of the intellectual mind of man, in which there is much of the image of God; and that this image is much deformed by sin.

BUT mens is not taken here for anima physica, according to Aristotle, which is, forma vel natura hominis; The form or nature of man; but this faculty or gift of God, called mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principal strength of the mind, [or soul] cujus actus est perpetua veritatis contemplatio; whose act [exercise, or office] is the perpetual contemplation of truth; and therefore it is also called ^b*intellectus divinus, intellectus contemplativus, & anima contemplativa*; A divine understanding, and an intellect or mind contemplative. ^c*Est autem mens nostra* (saith Cusanus) vis comprehendendi; & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compositum; Our intellectual mind (saith he) is a power of comprehending; even the whole, that is in this kind powerful, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: unto which Mercurius attributeth so much (if his meaning accompany his words) that he esteemeth it to be the very essence of God (which was also the error of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwise separate from God (saith he) than the light from the sun: for this mens, or understanding (saith Mercurius) ^d*est Deus in hominibus*; Is God in men; or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For, as the sun is not of the same essence or nature with the divine light, but a body illighted, and an illumination created; so is this mens or understanding in men, not of the essence of God's infinite understanding, but a power and faculty of our souls the purest; or, the lumen animæ rationalis, by the true and eternal light illighted. And this mens others call animam animæ, the soul of the soul; or, with St. Augustine, the eye of the soul, or receptacle of sapience and divine knowledge, Quæ amorem sapientie tanquam ducem sequitur; Which followeth after the love of sapience as her guide (saith Philo;) between which and reason; between which and the mind, called anima; between which and that power which the Latins call animus, there is this difference: reason, is that faculty by which we judge and discourse; anima, by which we live. Hereof it is said, Anima corpus animat, id est, vivificat; [or] The soul is that which doth animate the body, that is, giveth it life; for death is the separation of body and soul: and the same strength (saith Philo) which God the great director hath in the world, the same hath this anima, or mind, or, soul in man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Basil agreeth, which calleth this mens, or divine understanding, Perspicacem animæ partem; The perceiving part of the mind, or, the light by which the soul discerneth: Dormientium mens, non anima, sopitur; & in furiosis mens extinguitur, anima manet: In men that sleep it is this (mens, or) understanding, and not the mind or soul, which resteth, during which time it is but habitual in wise men, and in mad men this (mens) is extinguished, and not the soul; for mad men do live, though distract.

Therefore this word being often used for the soul giving life, is attributed abusively to mad men, when we say that they are of a distract mind, instead of a broken understanding: which word (mind) we use also for opinion, as, I am of this mind, or, that mind: and sometimes for mens conditions or virtues, as, he is of an honest mind, or, a man of a just mind: sometimes for affliction, as, I do this for my mind's sake: and Aristotle sometimes useth this word (mens) for the phantasy, which is the strength of the imagination: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we have without discourse: oftentimes for spirits, angels, and intelligences: but as it is used in the proper signification, including both the understanding agent and possible, it is described to be a pure, simple, substantial act, not depending upon matter, but having relation to that which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large thus; a part or particle of the soul, whereby it doth understand, not depending upon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion coming from without, and apt to be dislevered, as, eternal from that which is mortal. Hereof excellently Mercurius; Anima est imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus menti præest, mens animæ, anima corpori; The soul (meaning that which giveth life) is the image of this understanding, or mens; and this (mens) or understanding is the image of God. God is president or ruler over this understanding, this understanding over the soul, and this soul over the body. This division and distinction out of the Platonicks, and Peripateticks, I leave to the reader to judge of. That Mens humana hath no need of any organ, ^e*Marsilius Ficinus* in his 9th book of the soul's immortality, laboureth to prove. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words; for (saith he) ^f*Ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam, non eget mens organo; tanquam medio, per quod intelligat: quanquam eget objecto in quod intueatur, & ex quo intellectionem concipiat. Hoc autem objectum sunt phantasmata, seu rerum a sensibus perceptarum simulachra ad phantasi- am prolata*: To exercise the faculty of understand, the mind of man (saith he) needeth no instrument, as a mean, by which it may understand: but it needeth an object, whereon to look, and whence to conceive the act of understanding. This object are the phantasms, or the resemblances of things received from the sense, and carried to the phantasy. But in effect, this conclusion seemeth to carry a contrary sense, when he maketh the phantasy, in representing the object to the understanding, to be a corporal Organum; neither can it be understood to be an Organum of any thing, but of the understanding. And he addeth, that the resemblance of things in man's imagination, are, to his understanding and mind, as colours are to the sight; whence it so followeth, that the imagination or phantasy it self is to the faculty of understanding, as the eye is to the faculty of seeing: and as this is an Organum, so that. Of this question, how the mind in all her actions maketh use of the body, and hath communion with the body, I refer the reader to a most grave and learned discourse in the last reply of *M. D. * Bilson*, late bishop of Winchester, unto Hen. Jacob. Howsoever the truth be determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discourse, nor in respect of the mind it self, by which we live, nor in respect of our souls simply, by which we are immortal, that we are made after the image of God. But most safely may we resemble our selves to God in mente, and in respect of that pure faculty, which is never separate from the contemplation and love of God. Yet this is not all; for St. Bernard maketh a true difference between the nature and faculties of the mind or soul, and between the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the image of God: whose words are these, Non propterea imago Dei est, quia sui meminit mens, seque intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of St. Augustine;) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere, ac diligere eum a quo facta est, (that is) The mind (or mens) was not therefore the image of God, because it remembereth, understandeth, and loveth it self; but because it can remember, understand, and love God, who created it. And that this image may be deformed and made unprofitable, hear Basil; Homo ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus est, peccatum vero imaginis hujus pulchritudinem deformavit, & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentiæ affectibus immergit: Man was made after the image and similitude of God, but sin hath deformed the beauty of this image, and made it unprofitable, by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscence.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of immortality, nor in reason, nor in dominion, nor in any one of these by it self, nor in all these joyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and understanding, with the other faculties of the soul, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of original righteousness, most perfectly infused by God into the mind and soul of man in his first creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberality, that we were printed with the seal of God's image (though reason may be said to be of her gift, which, joined to the soul, is a part of the essential constitution of our proper species) but from the bountiful grace of the Lord of all goodness, who breathed life into earth, and contrived within the trunk of dust and clay, the imitable hability of his own piety and righteousness.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which dominion hath) do those that are powerful retain the image of God, as according to his commandments they exercise the office or magistracy to which they are called, and sincerely walk in the ways of God, which in the scriptures is called, “walking with God; and all other men so long retain this image, as they fear, love, and serve God truly, that is, for the love of God alone, and do not bruise and deface his seal by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obstinate sins. For the unjust mind cannot be after the image of God, seeing God is justice it self; the blood-thirsty hath it not, for God is charity and mercy it self; falshood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of satan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soul, together with God: and to be short, there is no likelihood between pure ^b light and black darkness, between beauty and deformity, or between righteousness and reprobation. And though nature, according to common understanding, have made us capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receive this image of God's goodness, which the sensual souls of beasts cannot perceive; yet were that aptitude naturally more inclinable to follow and embrace the false and duple pleasures of this stage-play world, than to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanship of God's wisdom, and the liberality of his mercy, formed eyes to our souls, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impurity of our flesh, behold the highest heavens, and thence bring knowledge and object to the mind and soul, to contemplate the ever-during glory, and termless joy, prepared for those which retain the image and similitude of their Creator, preserving undefiled and unrent the garment of the new man, which, after the image of God, is created in righteousness, and holiness, as faith St. Paul. Now whereas it is thought by some of the fathers, as by St. Augustine, with whom ^d St. Ambrose joyneth, that by sin, the perfection of the image is lost, and not the image it self: both opinions by this distinction may be reconciled (to wit) that the image of God, in man, may be taken two ways; for, either it is considered according to natural gifts, and consisteth therein; namely, to have a reasonable and understanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the image of God is more lost by sin than the very reasonable or understanding nature, &c. is lost (or sin doth not abolish and take away these natural gifts:) or, the image of God is considered, according to supernatural gifts, namely, of divine grace and heavenly glory, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the natural image; and this manner of similitude and image of God is wholly blotted out, and destroyed by sin.

SECT. III.

Of our base and frail bodies: and that the care thereof should yield to the immortal soul.

THE external man God formed out of the dust of the earth, or (according to the signification of the word, Adam) of Adamath, of red earth, or ex limo terræ, out of the slime of the earth, or a mixed matter of earth and water. “Non ex qualibet humo, sed ex ghaphar adamath (id est) ex pinguisima & mollissima: Not that God made an image or statue of clay, but out of clay, earth, or dust, God formed and made flesh, blood, and bone, with all parts of man.

That man was formed of earth and dust did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble tear he called unto God, to save Sodom: “Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speak, I that am but dust and ashes: And, In these houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, do our souls inhabit, according to Job. And though our own eyes do every where behold the sudden and resistless assaults of death, and nature assureth us by never-failing experience, and reason by intallible demonstration, that our times upon the earth have neither certainty nor durability; that our bodies are but the anvils of pain and diseases, and our minds the hives of unnumbered cares, sorrows, and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posts, against which envy and fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true unhappiness of our condition, and the dark ignorance which covereth the eyes of our understanding, that we only prize, pamper, and exalt this vassal and slave of death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast away leisure) the imprisoned immortal soul, which can neither die with the reprobate, nor perish with the mortal parts of virtuous men: seeing God's justice in the one, and his goodness in the other, is exercised for evermore, as the ever-living subjects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that we examine this great account? never while we have one vanity left us to spend: we plead for titles, till our breath fail us; dig for riches, while our strength enableth us; exercise malice, while we can revenge; and then when time hath beaten from us both youth, pleasure, and health, and that nature is felt hateful the house of old age, we remember with Job, that we must go the way from whence we shall not return, and that our bed is made ready for us in the dark; and then, I say, looking over-late into the bottom of our conscience (which pleasure and ambition had locked up from us all our lives) we behold therein the fearful images of our actions past, and withal this terrible inscription: That God will bring every work into judgment, that man hath done under the sun.

But what examples have ever moved us? what persuasions reformed us? or what threatnings made us afraid? we behold other mens tragedies play'd before us, we hear what is promised and threatened: but the world's bright glory hath put out the eyes of our minds; and these betraying lights (with which we only see) do neither look up towards termless joys, nor down towards endless sorrows, till we neither know, nor can look for any thing else, at the world's hands. Of which excellently Marius Victor:

*Nil hostes, nil dira fames, nil denique morbi
Egerunt, fuimus, qui nunc sumus, iisque periculis
Tentati; nibilo meliores reddimur unquam,
Sub vitiis nullo culparum sine manentes.*

Diseases, famine, enemies, in us no change have wrought, [caught:
What erst we were, we are; still in the same snare
No time can our corrupted manners mend,
In vice we dwell, in sin that hath no end.

But let us not flatter our immortal souls herein; for to neglect God all our lives, and know that we neglect him, to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him, casting our hopes on the peace, which we trust to make at parting, is no other than a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) even a contemptuous laughing to scorn, and deriding of God, his laws and precepts. Frustra sperant, qui sic de misericordia Dei sibi blandiuntur; They hope in vain, saith Bernard, which in this sort flatter themselves with God's mercy.

SECT. IV.

Of the spirit of life, which God breathed into man in his creation.

IN this frame and carcass God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a living soul: (that is) God gave a body of earth and of corruptible matter, a soul spiritual and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodily instruments as men use, but God breathed the spirit of life and immortality into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into such as love and fear him. The spirit of God (saith Elibu in Job) bath made me, and the breath of the Almighty bath given me life: In qua sententia (saith Rabanus) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formasse corpus hominis, vel saucibus aut labiis suis inspirasse in faciem formati, ut vivere possit & spiraculum vite habere: nam & propheta cum ait, manus tue fecerunt me, &c. tropica hac locutione magis quam propria (id est, juxta consuetudinem, qua solent homines operari) locutus est: In which sentence (saith he) the beggarliness of carnal sense is to be avoided, lest perhaps we should think, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with jaws or lips upon his face (being formed) that he might live, and have the spirit of life: for the prophet also when he saith, thy hands have made me, spake this tropically, rather than properly (that is) according to the custom which men use in working. Quantum est periculis his, qui scripturas sensu corporeo legunt? In what danger are they that read the scriptures in a carnal sense? By this breath was infused into man, both life and soul, and therefore this (soul) the philosophers call Animam, quæ vivificat corpus, & animat; Which doth animate and give life to the body. The inspiration of the Almighty giveth understanding, saith Job, and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soul of man, returneth again to God that gave it, as the body returneth unto the earth, out of which it was taken; according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall return to the earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall return to God that gave it. Neither is this word (spirit) usually otherwise taken in the scriptures, than for the soul; as when Stephen cried unto God: Domine, suscipe spiritum meum, Lord Jesus receive my spirit: and in St. John, And Jesus bowed his head, and gave up the ghost, or spirit; (which was) that his life and soul left his body dead. And that the immortal soul of man differeth from the souls of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing, and let the earth bring forth the living thing according to his kind, the beast of the earth, &c. But of man it is written, Let us make man in our own image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the water and earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence received life; so shall they again be dissolved into the same first matter, whence they were taken: but the life of breath everlasting, which God breathed into man, shall, according to Ecclesiastes, return again to God that gave it.

SECT. V.

That man is (as it were) a little world: with a digression touching our mortality.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or model, or brief story of the universal: in whom God concluded the creation, and work of the world, and whom he made the last and most excellent of his creatures, being internally endued with a divine understanding, by which he might contemplate and serve his Creator, after whose image he was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might govern and rule the world, and all other God's creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of living natures (to wit) angelical, rational, and brutal; giving to angels an intellectual, and to beasts a sensual nature, he vouchsafed unto man, both the intellectual of angels, the sensitive of beasts, and the proper rational belonging unto man, and therefore (saith Gregory Nazianzene) Hommo est utriusque nature vinculum; Man is the bond and chain which tyeth together both natures: and because in the little frame of man's body there is a representation of the universal, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little world. Deus igitur hominem factum, velut alterum quendam mundum, in brevi magnum, atque exiguo totum, in terris statuit; God therefore placed in the earth the man whom he had made, as it were another world, the great and large world in the small and little world; for out of the earth and dust was formed the flesh of man, and therefore heavy and lumpish; the bones of his body we may compare to the hard

Et documenta damus qua sumus origine nati:*

From thence our kind hard-hearted is,
Enduring pain and care,
Approving that our bodies of A stony nature are.

His blood, which disperseth it self by the branches of veins through all the body, may be resembled to those waters, which are carried by brooks and rivers over all the earth; his breath to the air, his natural heat to the inclosed warmth which the earth hath in it self, which, stirred up by the heat of the sun, assisteth nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the earth bringeth forth; Our radical moisture, oyl, or balsamum (whereon the natural heat feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertility of the earth; the hairs of man's body, which adorns, or overshadows it, to the grafs, which covereth the upper face and skin of the earth; our generative power, to nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light wandring, and unstable clouds, carried every where with uncertain winds; our eyes, to the light of the sun and moon; and the beauty of our youth, to the flowers of the spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the sun's heat, dry up and wither away, or the fierce puffs of wind blow them from the stalks; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure understanding (formerly called mens, and that which always looketh upwards) to those intellectual natures, which are always present with God; and lastly, our immortal souls (while they are righteous) are by God himself beautified with the title of his own image and similitude. And although, in respect of God, there is no man just, or good, or righteous (for, ^b In angelis deprehensa est stultitia, Behold, He found folly in his Angels, saith Job;) yet, with such a kind of difference, as there is between the substance and the shadow, there may be found a goodness in man: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man, the image and similitude of his own righteousness. In this also is the little world of man compared, and made more like the universal (man being the measure of all things; ^c Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the four complexions resemble the four elements, and the seven ages of man the seven planets; whereof, our infancy is compared to the Moon, in which we seem only to live and grow, as plants; the second age to Mercury, wherein we are taught and instructed; our third age to Venus, the days of love, desire, and vanity; the fourth to the Sun, the strong, flourishing, and beautiful age of man's life; the fifth to Mars, in which we seek honour and victory, and in which our thoughts travel to ambitious ends; the sixth age is ascribed to Jupiter, in which we begin to take account of our times, judge of our selves, and grow to the perfection of our understanding; the last and seventh to Saturn, wherein our days are sad, and over-cast, and in which we find by dear and lamentable experience, and by the loss which can never be repaired, that of all our vain passions and affections past, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more we are accompanied with plenty, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when time hath made unfociable to others, we become a burthen to our selves: being of no other use, than to hold the riches we have from our successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and never before, prepare for our eternal habitation, which we pass on unto with many sighs, groans, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of death, finish the sorrowful business of a wretched life; towards which we always travel both sleeping and waking: neither have those beloved companions of honour and riches any power at all to hold us any one day, by the glorious promise of entertainments; but by what crooked path soever we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death, whose doors lie open at all hours; and to all persons. For this tide of man's life, after it once turneth and declineth, ever runneth with a perpetual ebb and falling stream, but never floweth again: our leaf once fallen, springeth no more; neither doth the sun or the summer adorn us again, with the garments of new leaves and flowers.

*Redditur arboribus florens revirentibus atas;
Ergo non homini, quod fuit ante, redit.*

To which I give this sense.

The plants and trees made poor and old
By winter envious,
The spring-time bounteous
Covers again from shame and cold:
But never man repair'd again
His youth and beauty lost,
Though art, and care, and cost,
Do promise nature's help in vain.

And of which,

*Soles occidere & redire possunt:
Nobis cum semel occidit brevis lux,
Nox est perpetua una dormienda.*

The sun may set and rise:
But we contrariwise
Sleep after our short light
One everlasting night.

For if there were any baiting place, or rest, in the course or race of man's life, then, according to the doctrine of the Academics, the same might also perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in natural living things, and as the sap and juice, wherein the life of plants is preserved, both evermore ascend or descend; so is it with the life of man, which is always either increasing toward ripeness and perfection, or declining and decreasing towards rottenness and dissolution.

SECT. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first creation, to dispose of himself.

THESE be the miseries which our first parents brought on all mankind, unto whom God in his creation gave a free and unconstrained will, and on whom he bestowed the liberal choice of all things, with one only prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortal and immortal life, a nature celestial and terrene, and (indeed) God gave man to himself, to be his own guide, his own workman, and his own painter, that he might frame or describe unto himself what he pleased, and make election of his own form. ^a God made man in the beginning, (saith Siracides) and left him in the hands of his own counsel. Such was the liberality of God, and man's felicity: whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonless, brought with them into the world (saith Lucilius) and that even when they first fell from the bodies of their dams, the nature, which they could not change; and the supernal spirits or angels were from the beginning, or soon after, of that condition, in which they remain in perpetual eternity. But (as aforesaid) God gave unto man all kind of seeds and grafts of life (to wit) the vegetative life of plants, the sensual of beasts, the rational of man, and the intellectual of angels; whereof which soever he took pleasure to plant and cultivate, the same should futurely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his own choice and plantation. This freedom of the first man Adam, and our first father, was enigmatically described by Asclepius Atheniensis (saith Mirandulæ) in the person and fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagoreans, and ancient poets, wherein it was feigned, that men were transformed into divers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from reason to brutality, from virtue to vice, from meekness to cruelty, and from justice to oppression. For by the lively image of other creatures did those Ancients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortal men; as by serpents were signified deceivers; by lyons, oppressors and cruel men; by swine, men given over to lust and sensuality; by wolves, ravening and greedy men; which also St. Matthew resembleth to false prophets, ^d which come to you in sheeps clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves: by the images of stones and stocks, foolish and ignorant men; by vipers, ungrateful men; of which ^e St. John Baptist, O ye generation of vipers, &c.

SECT. VII.

Of God's ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the universal created was exceeding good.

IN this work of man, God finished the creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisse est fecisse; With whom to will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that he left the world made, and the creatures therein to themselves: for ^d My father worketh to this day (saith Christ) and I work; but God rested (that is) he created no new species or kinds of creatures, but (as aforesaid) gave unto man a power generative, and so to the rest of living creatures, to plants and flowers, their seeds in themselves; and commanded man to ^e multiply and fill the earth, and the earth and sea to bring forth creatures according to their several kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his works were good, not that he foreknew not, and comprehended not, the beginning and end before they were; for God made every plant of the field before it was in the earth; but he gave to all things which he had created the name of good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose simple purity and from so excellent a cause there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberal choice, purchased by disobedience his own death and mortality; and for the cruelty of man's heart, was the earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first age destroyed, but the righteous man Noah and his family, with those creatures which the ark contained, reserved by God to replenish the earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of PARADISE.

SECT. I.

That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvel that men should err.

CONCERNING the first habitation of man, we read, that the Lord God planted a garden east-ward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, Gen. ii. 6. Of this seat and place of Paradise, all ages have held dispute; and the opinions and judgments have been in effect, as divers, among those, that have written upon this part of Genesis, as upon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: Some there are, that have conceived the being of the terrestrial Paradise, without all regard of the world's geography, and without any respect of east and west, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the heavens) the way how to find out and judge, in what region of the world this garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding respective and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first interpretation; or trusting to their own judgments, understood one place for another; and one error is so fruitful, as it begetteth a thousand children, if the licentiousness thereof be not timely restrained. And thirdly, those writers which gave themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things so observant sectators of those masters, whom they admired and believed in, as they thought it safer to condemn their own understanding, than to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his epistle of Paradise) magno errore, magnorum virorum auctoritate persuasi, transmittimus; We pass over many gross errors, by the authority of great men led and perswaded. And it is true, that many of the fathers were far wide from the understanding of this place. I speak it not, that I my self dare presume to censure them, for I reverence both their learning and their piety, and yet not bound to follow them any further, than they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should be proud of himself, God hath distributed unto men such a proportion of knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their own weakness: Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus; God never gave the knowledge of all things to any one. ^f St. Paul confess'd that he knew not, whether he were taken up into the third heaven in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himself acknowledges thus much, ^g that neither men, nor angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to ^h St. Jude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi invenitur? (saith Job) But where is wisdom found? ⁱ and where is the place of understanding? Man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the land of the living. And therefore seeing God found folly in his angels, mens judgments (which inhabit in the houses of clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and so the fathers,

S E C T. II.

A recital of strange opinions touching Paradise.

NOW touching paradise, first it is to be enquired, Whether there were a paradise, or no? or whether Moses's description were altogether mystical and allegorical? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others, have affirmed; and that under the names of those four rivers, Pison, Gebon, Hiddekel and Perath, the tree of life, and the tree of knowledge, there were delivered unto us other mysteries and significations; as, that by the ^a four rivers, were meant the four cardinal virtues, Justice, Temperance, Fortitude and Prudence; or (by others) Oil, Wine, Milk and Honey. This allegorical understanding of Paradise by Origen divulged, was again by Fran. Georgius received (saith Sixtus Senensis;) whose frivolous imaginations Sixtus himself doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34th annotation of his 5th book, fol. 338. the last edition.

^bSt. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the allegorical construction, and set Paradise in the third heaven, and in the virtues of the mind, Et in nostro principali, which is, as I conceive it, in mente, or in our souls: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the soul or mind; by Adam, mens or understanding; by Eve, the sense; by the serpent, delectation; by the tree of good and evil, sapience; and by the rest of the trees, the virtues of the mind, or in the mind planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, upon 1 Corinth. cap. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celestial and terrestrial Paradise; the one, into which St. Paul was wrap'd; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysamenis was of opinion, that a Paradise had been; but that there was not now any mark thereof on the earth: the same being not only defaced, but withal the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Muniches also understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole earth; to which opinion Vadianus inclineth, as I conceive his words, in two several places. First, upon this; Fill the earth, Gen. 10. of which he gives this judgment: Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini universis animantibus, subijcite terram, clarissime docet, totam terram extantem, Et omnigenis (ut tum erat) fructibus consistam, sedem Et hortum illum Adæ, Et posteritatis futuræ fuisse; These words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule over every creature, do clearly shew, that the universal earth, set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and seat of Adam, and of his future posterity. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the ^c*Acts, Apostolus ex uno sanguine omne genus humanum ideo factum docet, ut habitarent super universam faciem terre: tota igitur terra paradisus ille erat*; The apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell over all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith he) was that Paradise. Which conjectures I will answer in order. Goropius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certain place, and peculiar garden; which place Goropius findeth near the river of Acesines, in the confines of India.

^d*Tertullian*, Bonaventure, and Durandus, make Paradise under the equinoctial; and Postellus, quite contrary, under the north pole: the Chaldeans also for the most part, and all their sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs; who would either make Paradise a figure, or sacrament only, or else would have it seated out of this sensible world, or raised into some high and remote region of the air. Strabus and Rabanus were both sick of this vanity, with Origen and Philo: So was our venerable ^e*Bede* and ^f*Peter Comestor*, and ^g*Moses Barcephas* the Syrian, translated by Musius. But as Hopkins says of Philo Judeus, that he wonder'd, Quo malo genio afflatus, By what evil angel he was blown up into this error; so can I but greatly marvel at the learned men, who so grossly and blindly wander'd; seeing Moses, and after him the prophets, do so plainly describe this place by the region in which it was planted, by the kingdoms and provinces bordering it, by the rivers which water'd it, and by the points of the compass upon which it lay, in respect of Judea, or Canaan.

Noviomagus also upon Beda, De natura rerum, believeth that all the earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole earth (saith he) hath the same beauty ascribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the ocean was that fountain from whence the four rivers, Pison, Gebon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning; for he could not think it possible, that these rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates (whereof the one ran through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one fountain, were it not out of the fountain of the ocean.

S E C T. III.

That there was a true local Paradise eastward in the country of Eden.

TO the first therefore, that such a place there was upon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made: and howsoever the vulgar translation, called Jerom's translation, hath converted this place thus, Plantaverit Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis a principio: The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for eastward: it is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a region. For, what sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his treatise of Paradise) that he planted a garden of pleasure, or, that a river went out of pleasure to water the garden? but the seventy interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, The Paradise of Eden; and so doth the Chaldean paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a place, and for a noun appellative; which region, in respect of the fertility of the soil, of the many beautiful rivers and goodly woods, and that the trees (as in the Indies) do always keep their leaves, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, pleasantness, or delicacy; as the Spaniards call the country, opposite to the isle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, that as Florida was a country, so called for the flourishing beauty thereof; so was Eden a region, called pleasure or delicacy for its pleasure or delicacy: and as Florida signifieth flourishing; so Eden signifieth pleasure: and yet both are the proper names of countries; for Eden being the proper name of a region (called pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choice seat of all that region, Paradise was truly the garden of Eden, and truly the garden of pleasure.

Now, for eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrary to the translation of the seventy; to the ancient Greek fathers, as Basil, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Gregory; and to the Rabines, as Ramban, Rabbi Solomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latins, Severinus, Damascenus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a region, and set the word (eastward) for ab initio; for Damascene's own words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad orientem mirabiliter confitus; Paradise is a place marvellously planted by the hands of God in Eden, towards the east.

And after all these fathers, Guilhelmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of latter times, do both understand these words of Eden and of the east, contrary to the vulgar translation; Parisensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their own words; After this I will begin to speak of Paradise terrestrial, which God planted from the beginning, or eastward, &c. Post hæc incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantasse Deum ab initio vel ad orientem, &c. And then Senensis; Moses enim clarissime prodit, Paradisum a Deo constitum in regione terre orientalis, quæ dicitur Eden: Eden autem esse proprium nomen, apparet ex quarto capite Gen. ubi legimus, Cham habitasse ad orientalem plagam Eden; For Moses (saith he) doth shew most clearly, that Paradise was planted of God in a region of the east country, which is called Eden: but that Eden is a proper name, it appeareth in ^a Genesis, where we read, that Cham dwelt on the east border of Eden. Pererius endeavoureth to qualify this translation; for this particle (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very first day; alledging this place of Christ, that although the devil was said to be a ^b Man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I think (referring my self to better judgment) the devil was from the instant of his fall a man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till man's creation. And for conclusion, St. Hierome (if that be his translation) adviseth himself better in the end of the 3d chapter of Genesis, converting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (a principio) as, God did set a cherubin before the garden of Eden; Collocavit Deus ante paradisum voluptatis, cherubin; and Pererius himself acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew, Posuit a parte orientali horti Eden, cherubin; He set on the east side of the garden of Eden, a cherubin. Becanus affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the text beareth this sense; That God planted a garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followeth this construction, only to the end to find Paradise upon the river of Acesines; for there he hath heard of the Indian fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and would therefore draw Paradise to the fig-tree: which conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses towards the east, thence came the custom of praying towards the east, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our churches are built east and west, as to the point where the sun riseth in March, which is directly over Paradise (saith Da- masceus;) affirming, that we always pray towards the east, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the temple of Solomon had their priests and sacrifices, which turned themselves in their service and divine ceremonies, always towards the west, thereby to avoid the superstition of the Egyptians and Chaldeans.

But because east and west are but in respect of places (for although Paradise were east from Judea, yet it was west from Persia) and the serving of God is every where in the world; the matter is not great, which way we turn our faces, so our hearts stand right; other than this, that we who dwell west from Paradise, and pray turning our selves to the east, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adam's fall we have lost the Paradise on earth; so by Christ's death and passion we may be made partakers of the Paradise celestial, and the kingdom of heaven. To conclude, I conceive, that there was no other mystery in adding the word (east) to Eden by Moses, than to shew, that the region of Eden, in which Paradise was, lay eastward from Judea and Canaan: for the scriptures always called the people of those nations, the sons of the east which inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and Persia: of which Ovid,

Eurus ad auroram, Nabathæaque regna recessit, Persidaque, & radiis juga subdita matutinis.

The east wind with aurora hath abiding
Among th' Arabian and the Persian Hills, Whom Phæbus first salutes at his up-rising.

And if it be objected, that Jeremy the prophet, threatening the destruction of Jerusalem, doth often make mention of northern nations, it is to be noted, that the north is there named, in respect of those nations that followed Nabuchodonosor, and of whom the greatest part of his army was compounded; not that Babylon it self stood north from Jerusalem, though inclining from the east towards the north.

Now to the difference of this translation, Peter Comestor giveth best satisfaction: for he useth the word, from the beginning, that is, from the first part of the world (a principio) id est (saith he) a prima orbis parte; and afterward he affirmeth, that a principio, and ad orientem, have the same signification: from the beginning, and eastward, is all one; a principio idem est quod ad orientem.

But to return to the proof of this place, and that this story of mankind was not allegorical, it followeth in the text of the 2d chapter and 5th verse, in these words; For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree pleasant to the sight, and good for meat, &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam elsewhere as in the world at large, and then put him into the garden: and the end why, is express'd, verse 18, that he might dress it and keep it: Paradise being a garden or orchard filled with plants, and trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withal) good for meat: which proveth that Paradise was a terrestrial garden, garnished with fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plain, and to take away all opinion of allegorical construction, he affirmeth, verse 10, that it was watered and beautified with a river; expressing also the region, out of which this river sprang, which he calleth Eden; and that Eden is also a country near unto Charon in Mesopotamia, ¹ Ezechiel witnesseth.

But to all these cabalists, which draw the truth and story of the scriptures into allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these words; Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est etiam fons, si non est fons, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gebon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates; non est ficus, non folia, non comedit Eva de arbore, non est Adam, non sunt homines, sed veritas jam fabula est, & omnia ad allegorias revocantur; If Paradise be not sensible, then there was no fountain, and then no river; if no river, then no such four heads or branches, and then not any such river as Pison, or Gebon, Tigris, or Euphrates; no such fig-tree, or fruit, or leaves; Eve then did not eat of the fruit, neither was there any Adam, or any man, the truth was but a fable, and all things esteemed are called back into allegories. Words to the same effect hath St. Hierome upon Daniel; Conticeſcant eorum deliramenta, qui umbras & imagines in veritate ſequentes, ipſam conantur evertere veritatem, ut Paradifum & flumina, & arbores putent allegoriæ legibus ſe debere ſubruere: Let the dotage of them be ſilent, who following ſhadows and images in the truth, endeavour to ſubvert the truth it ſelf, and think that they ought to bring Paradise, and the rivers, and the trees, under the rules of allegory.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the ſtory, is the place made more manifeſt. For, God gave Adam free liberty to eat of every tree of the garden (the tree of knowledge excepted) which trees Mofes in the 9th verſe ſaith that they were good to eat; meaning the fruit which they bare. Beſides, God left all beaſts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and theſe beaſts were neither in the third heaven, nor near the circle of the moon, nor beaſts in imagination: for if all theſe things were enigmatical or myſtical, the ſame might alſo be ſaid of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel, ſpeaking of the glory of the Aſſyrian kings, uſeth this ſpeech; “ All the trees of Eden, which were in the garden of God, envied him; which proveth both Eden, and Paradise, therein ſeated, to be terrestrial: for the prophets made no imaginary compariſons. But Mofes wrote plainly, and in a ſimple ſtyle, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the deſcription of Paradise, than in any other place of ſcripture; of purpoſe to take away all ſcruple from the incredulity of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of prophecy) to be apt to fabulous inventions; and that if he had not deſcribed both the region and the rivers, and how it ſtood from Canaan, many of the unbelieving Iſraelites, and others after them, would have miſconſtrued this ſtory of mankind. And, is it likely, there would have been ſo often mention made of Paradise in the ſcriptures, if the ſame had been an Utopia? For we find that the valley, wherein ^b Sodom and Gomorrah ſtood (ſometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principal cities therein) was before the deſtruction (which their unnatural ſin purchaſed) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the land of Egypt toward Zoar: in like manner was Iſrael reſembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians waſted it: which proveth plainly, that Paradise it ſelf, exceeded in beauty and fertility, and that theſe places had but a reſemblance thereof: being compared to a ſeat and ſoil of far exceeding excellency.

Beſides, whence had Homer his invention of Alcinous's gardens, as Juſtin Martyr noteth, but out of Mofes's deſcription of Paradise? Gen. ii. And whence are their praiſes of the Elyſian fields, but out of the ſtory of Paradise? To which alſo appertain thoſe verſes of the golden age in Ovid:

Mullebant Zephyri natos ſine ſemine flores.*

The joyful ſpring did ever laſt,
And Zephyrus did breed
Sweet flowers by his gentle blaſt,
Without the help of ſeed.

And it is manifeſt, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hefiodus, and Homer, and, alter him, Ovid, one out of another, and all theſe together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their ſectators, did greatly enrich their inventions, by venting the ſtohn treaſures of divine letters, altered by prophane additions, and diſguiſed by poetical converſions, as if they had been conceived out of their own ſpeculations and contemplations.

But beſides all theſe teſtimonies, if we find what region Eden, or Eden was; if we prove the river that ran out of it, and that the ſame afterwards was divided into four branches; together with the kingdoms of Havila, and Cuſh; and that all theſe are eaſtward from Canaan, or the deſerts of the Amorites, where Mofes wrote; I then conceive, that there is no man that will doubt, but that ſuch a place there was. And yet I do not exclude the allegorical ſenſe of the ſcripture; for as well in this there were many figures of Chriſt, as in all the Old Teſtament throughout: the ſtory being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpoſe (ſaith St. Auguſtine) Tres ſunt de Paradifo generales ſententiæ: una eſt eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradifum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui ſpiritualiter tantum (id eſt) eccleſiam: tertia eorum, qui utroque modo Paradifum accipiunt; (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of thoſe men, which will have it altogether corporal: a ſecond of thoſe, which conceive it altogether ſpiritual, and to be a figure of the church: the third of thoſe, which take it in both ſenſes; which third opinion ^d St. Auguſtine approveth, and of which Suidas giveth this allowable judgment: “ Quemadmodum homo ſenſibilis, & intelligibilis ſimul conditus erat: ſic & hujus ſanctiſſimum nemus ſenſibile ſimul & intelligibile, & duplici ſpecie eſt præditum; (that is) As man was created at one time, both ſenſible, and intelligible, ſo was his holy grove, or garden, to be taken both ways, and endued with a double form.

S E C T. IV.

Why it ſhould be needful to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

BUT it may be objected, that it is needleſs, and a kind of curioſity, to enquire ſo diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no uſe. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the ſcripture, but for our inſtruction; and if the truth of the ſtory be neceſſary, then by the place proved, the ſame is alſo made more apparent. For if we ſhould conceive that Paradise were not on the earth, but liſted up as high as the moon; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the known world; from whence, Adam was ſaid to wade through the ſea, and thence to have come into Judea (out of doubt) there would be few men in the world, that would give any credit unto it. For what could ſeem more ridiculous than the report of ſuch a place? and beſides, what maketh this ſeat of Paradise ſo much diſputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Piſſon ſhould be Ganges, which watereth the eaſt India; and Gebon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt: and theſe two rivers ſo far diſtant, as (except all the world were Paradise) theſe ſtreams can no way be comprized therein?

Secondly,

Secondly, If the birth and works, and death of our Saviour, were said to have been in some such country, of which no man ever heard tell, and that his miracles had been performed in the air, or no place certainly known: I assure my self, that the Christian religion would have taken but a slender root in the minds of men: for times and places are approved witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, If we should rely, or give place to the judgment of some writers upon this place of Genesis (though otherwise for their doctrine in general they are worthy of honour and reverence) I say that there is no fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would believe that there were a piece of the world so set by it self, and separated, as to hang in the air under the circle of the moon? or who so foolish to conceive, that from thence the four rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tigris, should fall down, and run under all the ocean, and rise up again in this our habitable world, and in those places where they are now found? which left any man think that I enforce, or strain to the worst, these are Peter Comestor's own words. Est autem locus amœnissimus, longo terræ & maris tractu a nostra habitabili Zona secretus, adeo elevatus, ut usque ad lunarem globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, severed from our habitable Zone, by a long tract of land and sea, elevated so, that it reacheth to the globe of the moon.

And Moses Barcephas upon this place writeth in this manner: Deinde hoc quoque responsum volumus, Paradisum multo sublimiore positum esse regione, atque hæc nostra extet terra, eoque fieri ut illinc per præcipitium delabantur fluvii tantocum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non possis; eoque impetu impulsæ pressique sub oceani vado rapiuntur, unde rursus profiliant ebulliantque in hoc a nobis culto orbe: which have this sense: Furthermore (saith he) we give this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a region far raised above this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to pass, that from thence these rivers fall down with such a headlong violence, as words cannot express; and with that force so impulsed and press'd, they are carried under the deep ocean sea, and do again rise and boil up in this our habitable world: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this: Ephram dicit, Paradisum ambire terram, atque ultra oceanum ita positum esse, ut totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet regione, non aliter atque lunæ orbis lunam cingit; (which is) That Paradise doth compass or embrace the whole earth, and is so set beyond the ocean, as it environeth the whole orb of the earth on every side, as the orb of the moon doth embrace the moon. To the end therefore that these ridiculous expositions and opinions do not bring question unto truth it self, or make the same subject to doubts or disputes, it is necessary to discover the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdom appointed in the very navel of this our world, and (as Melanchton says) in parte terræ meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a center, the universal might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better judge of the beginning of nations, and of the world's inhabitation: for near unto this did the sons of Noah also disperse themselves after the flood, into all other remote regions and countries. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their own forefathers have come, and out of what regions and nations; it cannot be displeasing to understand the place of our first ancestor, from whence all the streams and branches of mankind have followed and been deduced. If then it do appear by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be unprofitable, it followeth in order to examine several opinions before remembred, by the truth it self; and to see how they agree with the sense of the scripture, and with common reason; and afterward to prove directly, and to delineate the region in which God first planted this delightful garden.

SECT. V.

That the flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise, nor caused hills in the earth.

AND first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chrysostomus, that the flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can find any mark or memory thereof (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the flood the cause of those high mountains, which are found on all the earth over, with many other strange effects:) for mine own opinion, I think neither the one, nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the face of Paradise was after the flood withered, and grown old, in respect of the first beauty (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things time hath changed:) yet if there had been no sign of any such place, or if the soil and seat had not remained, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 850 years after the flood, have described it so particularly, and the prophets long after Moses, would not have made so often mention thereof. And though the very garden it self were not then to be found, but that the flood, and other accidents of time, made it one common field and pasture with the land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the rivers still remain the same rivers. By two of which (never doubted of) to wit, Tigris, and Euphrates, we are sure to find in what longitude Paradise lay; and learning out one of these rivers, which afterward doth divide it self into four branches, we are sure that the partition is at the very border of the garden it self.

For it is ^b written, that out of Eden went a river to water the garden, and from thence it was divided, and became into four heads; now, whether the word in the Latin translation (inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it self, or to Paradise; yet the division, and branching of those rivers, must be in the north, or south side of the very garden (if the rivers run as they do, north and south;) and therefore these rivers yet remaining, and Eden manifestly known, there could be no such defacing by the flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered, as future ages knew it not; so is there no probability that either these rivers were turned out of their courses, or new rivers created by the flood which were not, or that the flood (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high hills, or deep valleys. For what descent of waters could there be in a spherical and round body, wherein there is nor high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is either by the strength of wind, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebb or flood of the sea. But that there was any wind (whereby the seas are most enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrary is probable: for it is written, ^c Therefore God made a wind to pass upon the earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that, until the waters sank, there was any wind at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodness, caused the wind to blow, to dry up the abundant slime and mud of the earth, and make the land more firm, and to cleanse the air of thick vapours, and unwholsome mists: and this we know by experience, that all downright rains do evermore disperse the violence of outrageous winds, and beat down, and level the swelling and mountainous billows of the sea: for any ebbs and floods there could be none, when the waters were equal, and of one height, over all the face of the earth, and when there were no indraughts, bays, or gulfs to receive a flood, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round form of the earth and waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calm, than that they moved with any raging or over-bearing violence. And for a more direct proof that the flood made no such destroying alteration, Josephus avoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seen in his days; which pillars were set up above 1426 years before the flood, counting Seth to be an hundred years old at the erection of them; and Joseph himself to have lived some forty or fifty years after Christ: of whom, altho' there be no cause to believe all that he wrote, yet that which he avouched of his own time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruin thereof might then be seen. Now, that such pillars were raised by Seth, all antiquity hath avowed. It is also written that Berosus (to whom, altho' I give little credit, yet I cannot condemn him in all) that the city of Enoch, built by Cain about the mountains of Libanus was not defaced by length of time: yea, the ruins thereof, Annius (who commented upon that invented fragment) saith, were to be seen in his days, who liv'd in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile. And if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent: for, speaking of this city of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: Cujus maximæ & ingentis molis fundamenta visuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Civitas Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge mass is now to be seen, and the place is called by the people of that region, the City of Cain, as both our strangers and merchants report. It is also avowed by Pomponius Mela (to whom I give more credit in these things) that the city of Joppa was built before the flood, over which Cepha was king: whose name, with his brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their religion, was found graven upon certain altars of stone. And it is not impossible, that the ruins of this other city, called Enoch by Annius, might be seen, tho' founded in the first age: but it could not be of the first city of the world, built by Cain; the place rather than the time denying it.

And to prove directly that the flood was not the cause of mountains, but that there were mountains from the creation, it is written, that the waters of the flood overflowed by fifteen cubits the highest mountains. And Masius Damascenus, speaking of the flood, writeth in this manner: Est supra Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confugientes multos, sermo est, diluvii tempore liberatos; And upon Minyada there is an high mountain in Armenia (called Baris) unto which, it is said, that many fled in the time of the deluge, and that they saved themselves thereon. Now, tho' it is contrary to God's word, that any more were saved than eight persons (which Masius doth not avouch, but by report) yet it is a testimony, that such mountains were before the flood, which were afterwards, and ever since, known by the same names, and on which mountains it is generally received that the ark rested; but untruly, as I shall prove hereafter. And again it appeareth, that the mount Sion (tho' by another name) was known before the flood; on which the Thalmudists report, that many giants saved themselves also; but (as Annius saith) without all authority, either divine or human.

Lastly, it appeareth that the flood did not so turn upside down the face of the earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this, that ^bwhen Noah sent out the dove the second time, she returned with an olive-leaf in her mouth, which she had pluck'd, and which (until the trees were discovered) she found not: for otherwise she might have found them floating on the water; a manifest proof, that the trees were not torn up by the roots, nor swam upon the waters, for it is written, folium olive raptum, or decerptum, a leaf pluck'd; which is, to take from a tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparent (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seen to succeeding ages, especially unto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the world's creation, and unto the prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this discovery.

SECT. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole earth, as some have thought: making the ocean to be the fountain of those four rivers.

THIS conceit of Aug. Chrysamensis being answered, who only giveth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noviomagus, Vadianus, Goropius, Becanus, and all those that understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole earth. But in this I shall not trouble the reader with many words, because by those places of scripture formerly remember'd, this universality will appear altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alledgeth, ^cBring forth fruit and multiply, fill the earth and subdue it, rule over every creature, &c. with this of the Acts, ^dAnd hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell on all the face of the earth, do no way prove such a generality: for the world was made for man, of which he was lord and governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his use. Now, altho' all men were of one and the same fountain of blood originally; and Adam's posterity inhabited in process of time over all the face of the earth: yet it disproveth in nothing the particular garden, assigned to ^e*Adam* to dress and cultivate, in which he lived in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had been no other choice, but that Adam had been left to the universal, Moses would not then have said ^feastward in Eden, seeing the world hath not east nor west but respectively. And to what end had the angel of God been set to keep the east side, and entrance into Paradise after Adam's expulsion, if the universal had been Paradise? for then must Adam have been chased also out of the world. For if all the earth were Paradise, that place can receive no better construction than this, That Adam was driven out of the world into the world, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should believe with Metrodorus, that there were infinite worlds. Which to deny, he thinks all one as to affirm, That in so large a field as the universal, there should grow but one thistle. Noviomagus upon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was impossible for those three rivers, Ganges, Nilus and Euphrates (which water three portions of the world so far distant) to rise out of one fountain, except the ocean be taken for the well, and the world for the garden.

And it is true, that those four rivers, being so understood, there could be no conjecture more probable; but it shall plainly appear, that Pison was falsely taken for Ganges, and Gehon falsely for Nilus, altho' Ganges be a river by Havila in India, and Nilus runs thro' Ethiopia. The Seventy write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Noviomagus, Goropius and Vadianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their conjecture far more probable than that of Ephrem, Cyrillus and Athanasius, That Paradise was seated far beyond the Ocean sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the country in which he was created, and was buried at mount Calvary in Jerusalem. And certainly, tho' all those of the first age were of great stature, and so continued many years after the flood, yet Adam's shin-bones must have contained a thousand fathom, and much more, if he had forded the ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disprove it.

SECT. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the moon: and of others which make it higher than the middle region of the air.

THirdly whereas Beda saith, and as the schoolmen affirm, Paradise to be a place altogether removed from the knowledge of men (locus a cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceived, that Paradise was far in the east, but mounted above the ocean, and all the earth, and near the orb of the moon (which opinion, tho' the schoolmen charge Beda withal, yet Pererius lays it off from Beda, upon Strabus, and his master Rabanus) and whereas Rupertus, in his geography of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but finds it seated next or nearest heaven; it may seem, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates: but neither of them (as I conceive) well understood; who (undoubtedly) took this place for heaven it self, into which the souls of the blessed were carried after death.

True it is, that these philosophers durst not for fear of the Areopagites (in this, and many other divine apprehensions) set down what they believed in plain terms, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death for acknowledging one only powerful God; and therefore did the devil himself do him that right, as by an oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Justin Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the scriptures; and St. Augustine gave this judgment of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to me, that both Tertullian and Eusebius conceive, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestial Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightful, and healthful, upon the top of mount Atbo (called Acrithonos) which being above all clouds of rain, or other inconvenience, the people (by reason of their so many years) are called Macrobici (that is) long-liv'd. A further argument is used for proof of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preserved from the violence of the flood: approved by Isidore and Peter Lombard: in which place also Tertullian conceived, that the blessed souls were preserved till the last judgment: which Irenæus and Justin Martyr also believed. But this opinion was of all catholic divines reprov'd, and in the Florentine council damned; of which St. Augustine more modestly gave this judgment: Sicut certum est Enoch & Eliam, nunc vivere: ita ubi nunc sunt, an in paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certain that Enoch and Elias do now live; so where they now live, in paradise, or elsewhere, it is uncertain. But Barcephas gives a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the four rivers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not have had sufficient force to have thrust themselves under the great ocean, and afterward have forced their passage thro' the earth, and have risen again in the far distant regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreams have been answered by divers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing upon this subject; of whose arguments I will repeat these few: (for to use long discourse against those things, which are both against scripture and reason, might rightly be judged a vanity in the answerer, not much inferior to that of the inventor.)

It is first therefore alledged, that such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being set so near the moon, it had been too near the sun, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must have been too joyn'd a neighbour to the element of fire. Thirdly, because the air in that region is so violently removed, and carried about with such swiftness, as nothing in that place can consist or have abiding. Fourthly, because the space between the earth and the moon (according to Ptolemy and Alfraganus) is seventeen times the diameter of the earth, which makes in a gross account about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must have the compass of the whole earth for a basis and foundation. But had it been so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men, seeing it would deprive us of the sun's light all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the east, as they suppose. Now, to fortify the former opinions, Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell near those falls of waters, are deaf from their infancy, like those that dwell near the Catadupæ, or over-falls of Nilus. But this I hold as feigned. For I have seen in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling near them are not deaf at all. Tostatus (better to strengthen himself) citeth Basil and Ambrose together: to which Pererius, Sed ego hæc apud Basilium & Ambrosium in eorum scriptis, quæ nunc extant, nusquam me legere memini; But I do not remember (saith he) that I ever read those things either in Basil or Ambrose.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdom. Their taking up might be into the celestial Paradise, for ought we know. For altho' flesh and blood, subject to corruption, cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith St. Paul) but all shall be changed: which change in Enoch and Elias, was easy to him that is almighty. But for the rest, the scriptures are manifest, that by the flood all perished on the earth saving eight perfons; and therefore in the terrestrial Paradise they could not be.

For Tostatus's own opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but believed that Paradise was raised above the middle region of the air, and twenty cubits above all mountains, that the flood did not therefore reach it (which Scotus and other latter school-men also believed; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to overwhelm it:) this is also contrary to the express letter of the scripture, which directly, and without admitting of any distinction, teacheth us, that ^a the waters over-flowed all the mountains under heaven. And were it otherwise, then might we as well give credit to Masius Damascenus, and the Thalmudists, who affirm, that there were of the giants that saved themselves on the mountain Baris, and on Sion. But to help this, Scotus being (as the rest of the school-men are) full of distinctions, saith; that the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the ^b red sea, and at Jordan; and as the flood was not natural, so was Paradise saved by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifyeth his high conceit with this supposition, that it was not believed, that Paradise was so seated, as Bede and others seem to affirm in words, but by hyperbole and comparatively, for the delicacy and beauty so resembled. But this I dare avow of all those school-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better teach all their followers to shift, than to resolve, by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confess that it is written, that the mountains of Olympus, Atho, and Atlas, over-reach and surmount all winds and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the hills both springs and fruits; and the Pagan priests, sacrificing on these mountain-tops, do not find the ashes (remaining of their sacrifices) blown thence, nor thence wash'd off by rains, when they return: yet experience hath resolved us, that these reports are fabulous; and Pliny himself (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) avoweth the contrary. But were it granted, yet the height of these mountains is far under the supposed place of Paradise; and on these self hills the air is so thin (saith St. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to bear up the body of a bird, having therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of air to mount her self by.

S E C T. VIII.

Of their opinion that seat Paradise under the Equinoctial: and of the pleasant habitation under those climates.

THOSE which come nearer unto reason find Paradise under the Equinoctial line, as Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus; judging, that thereunder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soil: but against it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the distemperate heat, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly under the sun; but this is non causa pro causa; for although Paradise could not be under the line, because Eden is far from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges under it (Ganges being one of the four rivers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper (being but an old opinion) is found to be very untrue, though for the conjecture not to be condemned, considering the age, when those fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that every country, as it lay by degrees nearer the tropick, and so toward the Equinoctial, did so much the more exceed in heat; it was therefore a reasonable conjecture, that those countries which were situated directly under it, were of a distemper uninhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceived better and so did Avicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough: and though (perchance) in those days it might be thought a fantastical opinion (as all are which go against the vulgar;) yet we now find, that if there be any place upon the earth of that nature, beauty, and delight, that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed uninhabitable burnt zone, or within the tropicks, and nearest to the line it self. For hereof experience hath informed reason, and time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden, and could not by any contemplation be discovered. Indeed it hath so pleased God to provide for all living creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconveniences which we contemplate afar off, are found by trial and the witness of mens travels, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vain, or as a fruitless lump to fashion out the rest. For God himself (saith Isaiah) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we find that these hottest regions of the world seated under the Equinoctial line, or near it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of easterly wind (which the Spaniards call the Brize) that doth evermore blow strongest in the heat of the day, as the downright beams of the sun cannot so much master it, that there is any inconvenience or distemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh and equal, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my self have seen, near the line and under it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equal temper, only there are some tracts, which by accident of high mountains are barr'd from this air and fresh wind, and some few sandy parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soils we find also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those regions have so many goodly rivers, fountains and little brooks, abundance of high cedars, and other stately trees casting shade, so many sorts of delicate fruits, ever bearing, and at all times beautified with blossom and fruit, both green and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughs and branches are never unclothed and left naked, their sap creepeth not under ground into the root, fearing the injury of the frost: neither doth Pomona at any times despise her withered husband Vertumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these countries called Terræ vitiosæ, vicious countries: for nature being liberal to all without labour, necessity imposing no industry or travel, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits than vain thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who disliked this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the school-men were gross in this particular.

S E C T. IX.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Coelestria, there is a country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved out of Isaiah xxxvii, and Ezek. xxvii.

THESE opinions answered, and the region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary worlds, nor under Torrida Zona; it followeth that now we discover and find out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficulty of which search resteth chiefly in this, that as all nations have often changed names with their masters, so are most of these places, by Moses remembered, forgotten by those names of all historians and geographers as well ancient as modern.

Besides, we find that the Affyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus only and few others excepted) fought to extinguish the Hebrews. The Grecians hated both their nation and their religion; and the Romans despised once to remember them in any of their stories. And as those three monarchies succeeded each other; so did they transform the names of all those principal places and cities in the east: and after them, the Turk hath fought (what he could) to extinguish in all things the ancient memory of those people, which he hath subjected and intralled.

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates and Tigris, the better to find the way which leadeth to the country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) that it lay eastward from Canaan and Judea; and that it was of all others the most beautiful and fertile. First in respect of situation, the next country to Judea eastward was Arabia Petraea; but in this region was Moses himself when he wrote: and the next unto it eastward also was Arabia the Desert, both which in respect of the infertility could not be Eden, neither have any of the Arabians any such rivers, as are express'd to run out of it: so as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must be eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petraea, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it self, and by the fertility and the rivers only described, we must seek it in other scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour nations better described. In the prophet Isaiab I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent countries, in these words spoken in the person of Senacherib by Rabsakeb. "Have the Gods of the nations delivered them, which my fathers have destroyed, as Gosan and Haran and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaassar? and in Ezekiel, where he prophesieth against the Tyrians: "They of Haran and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Asbur, and Chilmad, were thy merchants, &c.

But to avoid confusion, we must understand that there were two Edens, one of which the prophet Amos remembereth, where he divideth Syria into three provinces, whereof the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapolitan: the second part is that valley called Avenis, otherwise Convallis, or the tract of Chamatb, where Affyria is joyned to Arabia the Desert, and where Ptolemy placeth the city of Averia: and the third is known by the name of Domus Edenis, or Calesyria, otherwise vallis cava, or the hollow valley, because the mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Coile in Greek is cava in Latin. But this is not that Eden, which we seek: neither doth this province lie east from Canaan, but north, and so joyneth unto it as it could not be unknown to the Hebrews. Yet, because there is a little city therein called Paradise, the Jews believed this Calesyria to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his treatise of Paradise reprehend Beroaldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden with the other Eden of Paradise: tho' to give Beroaldus his right, I conceive that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later writers, saving that he failed in distinguishing these two regions, both called Eden: and that, he altogether misunderstood two of the four rivers, to wit, Pison and Gehon, as shall appear hereafter. Now, to find out Eden, which (as Moses teacheth us) lay eastward from the Deserts, where he wrote after he had passed the red sea; we must consider where those other countries are found, which the prophet Isaiab and Ezekiel joine with it. For (saith Isaiab) Gosan, Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaassar. Also Ezekiel joine with Eden, who, together with those of Sheba, Asbur and Chilmad, were the merchants that traded with the city of Tyre, which was then (saith Ezekiel) the mart of the people for many isles. And it hath ever been the custom, that the Persians conveyed their merchandise to Babylon, and to those cities upon Euphrates and Tigris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the port of the Mediterranean sea: as in ancient times to the city of Tyre, afterwards to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarck them at the port of Alexandretta, in the bay of Issicus, now Laiazza. Ezekiel, in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the nations of the east, as the only mart town of that part of the world, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities every country yielded: and having counted the several people and countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them exercised. "They were thy merchants (saith the prophet) in all sorts of things, in rayments of blue silk, and of brodered works, fine linen, coral and pearl: and afterwards speaking of the merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and in what kinds they traded, he hath these words. The merchants of Sheba and Raamah were thy merchants, they occupied in thy fairs, with the chief of all spices, and with all precious stones and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Persia and Arabia felix yield: and because Sheba and Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the sea, called the Persian gulf, therefore did those nations both vent such spice, sweet gums, and pearls, as their own countries yielded, and withal having trade with their neighbours of India, had from them also all sorts of spices, and plenty of gold. The better to convey these commodities to that great mart of Tyre, the Shebans or Arabians entered by the mouth of Tigris, and from the city of Terredon (built or enlarged by Nabuchodonozor, now called Balsara) thence sent up all these rich merchandises by boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as far as it bended westward, and afterwards by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three days journey of Aleppo, and then over land they pass'd to Tyre, as they did afterwards to Tripoly (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now the merchants of Canneh, which Ezekiel joine with Eden, inhabited far up the river, and received this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which themselves had, also which they received out of Persia, which bordered them. St. Jerome understandeth by Canneh, Selencia, which is seated upon Euphrates, where it breaketh into four heads, and which took that name from Selencus, who made thereof a magnificent city. Hierosolymitanus thinks it to be Ctesiphon, but Ctesiphon is seated down low upon Tigris, and Canneh cannot be on that side, I mean on the east side of Tigris, for then were it out of the valley of Shinar. Pliny placeth the Schenite upon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be fordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaveth to be the bound of Arabia the Desart, and where the river of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desart of Palmirena: for these people of Canneh (afterwards Schenitæ) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves from their own city of Canneh in Shinar westward along the banks of Euphrates, as far as the city of Thapsacus, where Ptolemy appointed the fords of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenitæ by Strabo, whose words are these; ^a Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleuciam & Babyloniam euntibus iter est per Schenitas; The merchants which travel from Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those which take Canneh for Charran do much mistake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from ^b Ur in Chaldea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia, not upon Euphrates itself, but upon the river of Chabonias, which falleth into Euphrates: and the merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezekiel, as they of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Ashur, and Chilmad were thy merchants. Wherefore Charran, which is sometimes called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the region of Mesopotamia: or Aran fluviorum, the Greek word Mesopotamia importing a country between rivers: for Mesos in Greek is medius in Latin, and Potamos fluvius. And when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the city itself, to which Abraham came from Ur (as aforesaid.) For Strabo, in the description of Arabia, giveth that tract of land from the borders of Cæle Syria to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenitæ, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, and were in after-ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabit Bactanea and the north part of the Desarts, stretching themselves towards the uninhabited solitude of Palmirena, which lyeth between Syria and Arabia the Desart. So as these of Canneh lay in the very high-way from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the prophet Ezekiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneth, and Eden, &c. But St. Jerome made a good interpretation of Canneth, or Chalne, by Seleucia, for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (witness Appian;) and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his commentaries upon Genesis; the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canne, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other cities, standing in triangle with Seleucia, and almost the next unto it, as Thelbe-canne and Mann-canne, the one a little to the west of Seleucia, and the other opposite unto it, where these rivers of Tigris and Euphrates are ready to join. Therefore which of these the ancient Canne was (being all three within the bound of the valley Shinar) it is uncertain: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certain seat thereof, that so many other cities did retain a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it unlikely, that these additions of Thelbe and Mann to the word Canne, were but to make difference between the east and the west, or the greater and the less Canne, or between Canne the old and the new: which additions to distinguish cities by, are ordinary in all the regions of the world.

Now of the other city joyned with Eden, as Ila- ran, or Charran, St. Jerome on the Judges speaking thereof in these words: ‘Cumque reverterentur, pervenerunt ad Charran, quæ est in medio itinere contra Ninevem, undecimo die; When they returned, they came to Charran (which is the midway against Nineveh) the eleventh day.

This city is by the martyr Stephen, named Charran (speaking to the high-priest:) ‘Ye men, brethren, and fathers, hearken: the God of glory appeared to our father Abraham, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. But the seat of this city is not doubted of: for it is not only remembred in many scriptures, but withal exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Craffus the Roman, who, for his unsatiabable greediness, was called Gurges avaritiæ; the gulf of avarice. Whereof Lucan:

‘Affrias Latio maculavit sanguine carras.

With Roman blood th’ Affryan car he defil’d.

But this city Canne, or Chalne, is made manifest by Moses himself, where it is written of Nimrod: ‘And the beginning of his kingdoms was Babel, and Erech, and Acad, and Chalæ, in the land of Sinaar, or Shinar: where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian empire, and what cities and people were subject unto Nimrod; all which lay in the said valley of Shinar, or near it; and this valley of Shinar is that tract afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldea, into which also Eden stretcheth it self, Chaldea, Babylonia, Sinar, idem sunt (saith Comestor.) Three names of one country: which region of Babylonia, took name of the tower Babel; and the tower, of the confusion of tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proved in these words: ‘And as they went from the east, they found a plain in the land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which plain Babylon was built (as aforesaid.)

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrod’s greatness, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off nations, being one part of his dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proveth that Canneh joyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezekiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth that those of Eden were also the merchants which traded with the Tyrians: and Isaiah in the threats of Senacherib against Jerusalem (with other nations that Senacherib vaunted that his fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telaassar. But before I conclude where Eden it self lyeth, it is necessary to describe those other countries which Ezekiel joyneth therewith, in the places before remembred, as those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis: ‘Moreover the sons of Ham were Cush, &c. And the sons of Cush were Seba, and Havila, and Sabtab, and Raamah, &c. And the sons of Raamah were Sheba, &c. And anon after; Cush begat Nimrod: so as Sheba was the grandchild of Cush, and Nimrod the son of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceive to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and understanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma took that part adjoining to Shinar, toward the sea side and Persian gulf (called afterwards Raama and Sheba, by the father, and his sons, which possessed it.) For (saith Ezekiel) the merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy merchants, they occupied in thy fairs with the chief of all spices and all precious stones, and gold. So as Sheba was that tract of country, which parteth Arabia Deserta from Arabia Felix, and which joyneth to the sea, where Tigris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselves to the ocean. This part and the confining country, Strabo calleth Catabria, where the best myrrh and frankincense is gathered: which people have an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the east side of the Persian gulf. By this it appears who were the Shebeans, spoken of by Ezekiel, and said to have been the merchants of Tyre, for gold, spices, and precious stones: of which they had not only plenty of their own, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their aromatics, and other proper commodities. For, as Strabo reporteth out of Eratosthenes, In Persicæ oræ initio insula est, in qua multi & pretiosi uniones gignantur: in aliis vero, clari & perlucidi lapilli. Eratosthenes (saith Strabo) affirmeth, that, In the beginning of the Persian gulf, there is an island, in which there are many precious pearls bred: and in other, very clear and shining stones. Now, the difference between Sheba the son of Raamah, and Seba the son of Cush, is in this, that Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech;) and Sheba with (Schin;) but whatsoever the difference may be in the Hebrew orthography, their countries and habitations are diverse. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Persian sea, and Saba (whence the queen of Saba) neighboured the red sea; and so that place of the 72d Psalms expounded Reges Arabum & Sabæ, hath in the Hebrew this sense, Reges Shebæ & Sabæ.

The Shebans, Ezekiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited upon the out-let of the same river, upon which the Edenites were seated: and so those of Sheba, towards the sea-coast and upon it, pass'd up the country, by Tigris and Euphrates, being joyned in one main stream, and so through the region of Eden, which Tigris boundeth, thereby the better to convey their merchandize toward Tyre. And as the cities of Charran, and Canneb, border Eden on the west and north-west: so doth Sheba on the south, and Chilmad on the north-east: Chilmad being a region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldean paraphrast: which country, by the geographers is called Coromitenæ (L) placed by exchange for (R) which change the Hebrews also often use.

Thus much of those countries which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chief were the Edenites, inhabiting Telassar: for these Senacherib vaunted, that his fathers had destroyed; and this place of Telassar lay most convenient, both to receive the trade from Sheba and Arabia, and also to convey it over into Syria and to Tyrus. Now, to make these things the more plain, we must remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these monarchies were utterly disjoyned.

For it appeareth both in Esay the 37th, and in the 2d of Kings, by the threats of Rabsache, the while the army of Affyria lay before Jerusalem, that the cities of Gosan, Haran, Reseph, and the Edenites at Telassar, had resisted the Affyrians: tho' by them (in a sort) mastered and recovered. I have the Gods of the nations delivered them whom my fathers have destroyed, as Gosan, and Haran, Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar? But it appeared manifestly after Senacherib's death, that these nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subjection: for Esar-Haddon held Affyria; and Merodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the army of Senacherib, commanded by Rabsache which lay before Jerusalem (Hezekiah then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the angel of God destroyed; the king of Babel sent to Hezekiah, both to congratulate the recovery of his health, and his victory obtained over the Affyrians. After which overthrow, Senacherib himself was slain by his own sons in the temple of his idols, Esar-Haddon succeeding him in Affyria. To the Babylonian ambassadors sent by Merodach, Hezekiah shewed all his treasures as well proper as consecrate, which invited the kings of Babylon afterward to undertake their conquest and subversion. So as, the suspicion of war encreasing between Babylon and Affyria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Sbinar towards the north, and towards Affyria, were employ'd to bear off the incursions of the Affyrians; and their garrison-place was at Telassar: and the very word (Telassar) saith Junius, signifying as much as a bulwark against the Affyrians. This place Hierosolymitanus takes for Resem, others for Seleucia: but this Telassar is the same, which Am. Marcellinus in the history of Julian (whom he followed in the enterprise of Persia) calleth Thilutha instead of Telassar, who describeth the exceeding strength thereof in his 24th book: it is seated in an island of Euphrates upon a steep and unassailable rock, insomuch as the emperor Julian durst not attempt it; and therefore it was a convenient place for a garrison against the Affyrians, being also a passage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the country adjoyning were lodged to defend the same. This place Ptolemy calleth Teridata, having Reseph (which he calleth Resepha) on the left hand; and Canneb (which he calleth Thelbe-Canne) on the right hand; not far from whence, is also found the city of Mann-Canne, upon Tigris; and all these seated together, as Esay and Ezekiel have sorted them. But the understanding of these places is the more difficult, because Affyria (which the Chaldeans call Atturia) and Mesopotamia, were so often confounded; the one taken for the other by interchange of dominion. Affyria & Mesopotamia in Babyloniæ nomen transferunt (saith Niger;) Affyria and Mesopotamia took the name of Babylonia. Lastly, It appeareth, by those adjacent regions by the prophets named, in what part of the world Eden is seated, as, by Charran or Haran in Mesopotamia: also by Canneb and Reseph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these words translateth this place: Plantaverat autem Jehovah Deus hortum in Eden, ab oriente; The Lord God planted a garden in Eden eastward: that is (saith he in his annotations) Jusserat nasci arbores in Eden, regione orientali, in finibus Arabiæ & Mesopotamiæ; He commanded trees to grow in Eden, an eastern region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

SECT. X.

Of divers other testimonies of the land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

AND for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seems by the two epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia: which epistles in the year 1552, they sent to the pope about the confirming of their patriarch, and Andreas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latin. By these epistles (I say) it seems we may have some farther light for the proof of that, which we have said about the region of Eden

in those parts. For in them both, there is mention of the island of Eden in the river Tigris, or at least, Tigris in both these epistles is called the river of Eden. This island, as Masius in his preface to these epistles saith, is commonly called Gozoria (as it were, the island, by an eminency.) It hath (saith he) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the island Eden may (doubtless) remain to this day; tho' in the rest of the region so called, this name be swallowed up with the fame of those flourishing kingdoms of Mesopotamia, Affyria, Babylonia, and Chaldea. This island of Eden hath up the river, and not far beyond it, the city of Hasan-Cepha, otherwise Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Mosal or Mosel, from which (as in that which followeth it shall appear out of Masius) it is not above twelve miles distant. Neither is it to trouble us, that Mosal or Mosel by Marius Niger is remembered among the cities higher up Tigris, in these words, "Juxta autem Tigrim, civitates sunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, quæ nunc Mosel dicitur; magna sane, &c." (that is) By Tigris are these cities, Dorbeta near unto mount Taurus (which is now called Mosel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mosel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I say) needs not here to trouble us: seeing for this matter, the testimony of Masius, informed by the Christians that dwelt there (the seat of whose patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, avowing that this Mosal (or Mosel) is in the confines of Mesopotamia and Affyria, seated upon Tigris, and in the neighbourhood of Nineve; and that it is the famous Seleucia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former epistle, call it Attur in these words: "Ex omnibus civitatibus & pagis quæ sunt circum civitatem Mosal (hoc est) Attur, in vicinia Nineve;" Of all the cities and towns which are about the city of Mosal (that is) Attur in the neighbourhood of Nineve. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesiphon a city thereabout to be called Affur (which is the same as Attur, alter the dialect of those nations, which change sb into t.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesiphon (which is not far off Seleucia) for Seleucia, to be Affur. By this then we may come somewhat near the end of our purpose. For the isle of Eden, which lieth in the breast of Tigris, is but twelve miles from Mosal and that ancient city, which Ptolemy and Tacitus call Nilus, and the scriptures Nineve; Philostratus, and Simon Sethi, Mosula, and John Lean, Mosal, others Mosse (tho' it be not the same with Mosal) is set but a little higher upon the same river of Tigris, near Mosal: so that we are like to find this isle of Eden hereabout. For the same Andreas Masius, which placeth it above Mosal, makes it to be below Hasan-Cepha, which is upon the same river of Tigris.

The only difficulty is this, that some perhaps may think, that the words of the Nestorians in both their epistles, speak not of any isle in Tigris, called the isle of Eden, but of an isle in Tigris, a river of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more improbable. And yet, if this were the meaning here, we have a testimony from the learned of those parts, that not only Euphrates, but also Tigris, was a river of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worn out, tho' the region hath been subject to the same change that all other kingdoms of the world have been, and hath by conquest and corruption of other languages, received new and differing names. For the fourth part of Eden, which stretcheth over Euphrates, was after the flood called Shinar, and then, of the tower of Babel, Babylonia, and the north part of Eden is that tract of Mesopotamia, Affyria, and Armenia, which embraceth both the banks of Tigris between mount Taurus and Seleucia. And of this region of Eden that ancient Ethicus maketh mention (not that latter Ethicus, disciple of Gallinus, otherwise by Plutarch and Athenæus called Ystris, who lived in Egypt in the reign of Philadelphus; but another of a far higher and remote time) the same being made Latin out of the Greek by St. Jerome. And tho' by corruption of the ancient copy it be written, in Ethicus, Adonis for Edenis: yet Adonis, being a river of Phenicia, cannot be understood to be the region named by Ethicus. For Ethicus makes it a country, and not a river, and joyneth it with Mesopotamia and Ethiopia, calling the land of Chus Ethiopia, after the vulgar, and septuagint. And lastly, the river which watereth the regions (saith Ethicus) falleth into the gulf of Persia: which river he calleth Armodius for Tigris; Tigris being but a name imposed for the swiftness thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates have their original: for out of Eden came a river, or rivers, to water the garden, both which rivers (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them traverse Mesopotamia, regions first of all known by the name of Eden, for their beauty and fertility. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia; and the excellent fertility thereof in divers places is not unworthy the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (saith Strabo) the leaves are always green, and therefore therein a perpetual spring. Also Stephanus, de Urbibus, mentioneth the city of Adana upon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in use in Amos's time, tho' he spake not of Eden in the east, but of Eden in Cælessyria. But to the end I may not burthen the readers patience with too long a discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once joined together, and afterwards separate) are two of those four heads, into which these rivers which are said to water the garden of Paradise, were divided: whose courses being known, Eden (out of which they are said to come) cannot be unknown. Now that Hiddekel and Perath were Tigris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all. For the Seventy and all others convert Perath by Euphrates: & Hiddekel, Tigris omnes exponunt; and all men understand Hiddekel by Tigris (saith Varathus.) And because that which I have said of the isle of Eden shall not be subject to the censure of self-invention, I have hereunder set down the words out of the two general epistles of the Nestorians, as Masius (ad verbum) hath converted them into Latin. The occasion of those letters and supplications to the pope, were, that the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Affyria, Persia, Babylonia, and have to this day (at least in queen Mary's time) they had fifty churches in one city called Seleucia Parthorum, or Mosel upon the river Tigris; having no sufficient authority to choose themselves a patriarch (which cannot be done without four or three metropolitan bishops at the least) sent to the bishop of Rome, in the year of Christ 1352 (as aforesaid) a petition to obtain allowance unto such an election as themselves had made: having three hundred years before that, upon the like defect, sent one Marius thither to be constituted; and in this negotiation they made known to the bishop of Rome the state of the Christian church in those parts, for upon the death of their patriarch (who of a covetous desire to enrich himself, had laboured to influence metropolitan bishops, which the places fell worthy they all assembled themselves together to consult of the church-government. And because all the patriarchs for an hundred years had been of one house and family to the prejudice of the church, and that there yet remained one bishop of the same stock and kindred, who aspired to the same dignity which his predecessors had held, the rest of the professors refused to allow him. Upon which occasion, and for the choice of a governour more sufficient, the teachers in all the churches assembled themselves. The words of the general epistle to the pope were these, about the middle of the said epistle; Verum nos non acceptavimus, neque proclamavimus ipsum; sed subito convenimus ex omnibus locis orientalibus, & ex omnibus civitatibus & pagis quæ sunt circum civitatem Mosel (hoc est, Attur) in vicinia Nineves, ex Babylonia, ex Charra, ex Arbella, ex Insula quæ est in medio Tigris, fluminis Eden, &c. i. e. But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selves out of all parts of the east, and out of all the cities and villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbouring upon Nineve; and out of Babylon, Charra, Arbella; and out of the island which lieth in the middle of Tigris, a river, of Eden, or rather out of the isle of Eden, which lieth in the river Tigris. And in a second epistle at the same time sent, they used these words: Neque supersunt apud nos metropolitæ, quorum est ordinare catholicum; sed soli pauci episcopi, episcopus Arbela, episcopus Salmasi, episcopus Adurbeigan; en e vestigio convenimus in insulam, quæ est intra Tigrim flumen, Eden; fecimusque compactum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among us any metropolitan bishops, to whom it belongs to ordain a patriarch, but only a few bishops, as the bishop of Arbela, the bishop of Salmasus, and the bishop of Adurbeigan: but lo, we assembled speedily in the island of Eden, which is in Tigris, and agreed between our selves, &c.

Now this island of Eden, Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceived, the Nestorian epistles, and the state of the church may be in those parts (saith he) the better understood. And after he hath distinguished the four sorts of Christians in those parts of the world, and in the south part of Africa, which he calleth Nestorians, Jacobites, Maronitæ, and Cophti, he goeth on in these words: Mox, audita illius morte, concurrisse aiebant tumultuario in illam quam modo dixi Tigris insulam, quæ duodecim circiter passuum millibus supra Mosal posita, decem fere millia passuum suo ambitu continet, muris undique cincta, & a paucis aliis quam Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the patriarch (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that island of Tigris or Eden before spoken of, which island is situated about twelve miles above Mosal, containing very near ten miles in compass, and every where invironed with a wall, inhabited by few other men than Christians. And afterward, he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian churches; among the rest he addeth the isle of Eden by the name of Geserta, insula Tigris, sive Geserta. Furthermore, describing the city of Mosan-Cepha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra prædictam Tigris insulam, rupi asperæ impositam; Above the aforesaid island of Tigris, being seated on a steep rock. Of this island of Geserta, Andrew Thevet maketh mention in his 10th book of his general cosmography, in these words: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la riviere du Tigre, & pense quæ c'est une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie; Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tigris, the soil the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we may see that the ancient name of Eden liveth; and of that Eden which lieth eastward from Arabia Petraea, and the desert where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezekiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said prophet, and joined with those nations of Reseph, Canneth, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two regions of Affyria, and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Telasar were garrisoned to resist the Affyrians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as above-written;) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tygris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the known rivers of those four, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

S E C T. XI.

Of the difficulty in the text, which seemeth to make the four rivers to rise from one stream.

BUT it may be objected, that it is written in the text, That a river went out of Eden, and not rivers in the plural: which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his chronology: The Latin translation, saith he, hath these words: Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde dividebatur in quatuor capita: quæ verba melius consentiunt cum rei narratione, & ejusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur; & fluvius erat egrediens ex Edene (hoc est) fluvii procedebant ex Edene regione ad rigandum pomarium; & inde dividebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a river went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was divided into four heads; which words (saith Beroaldus) do better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated; And a river was going forth of Eden (that is) rivers went forth, and ran out of the region of Eden to water the orchard; and from thence it was divided, and they became four heads. The Tigurine differs from the vulgar or Latin; for it converts it thus, Et fluvius egrediebatur de deliciis; And a river went out of pleasure, instead of Eden; and the Latin addeth the word locus, or place, Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a river went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a region most delightful and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence, was divided, hath reference to the country of Eden, and not to the garden it self.

And for the word (river) for rivers, it is usual among the Hebrews: for it is written: Gen. i. 11. Let the earth bud forth the bud of the herb that seedeth seed, the fruitful tree, &c. Here the Hebrew useth the singular for the plural, herb and tree, for herbs and trees; and again, Gen. iii. 2. We eat of the fruit of the tree, instead of (trees;) And thirdly, Gen. iii. 8. The man and his wife bid themselves from the presence of God; In medio ligni Paradisi; In the middle of the tree of the garden, for (trees;) And of this opinion is David Kimchi and Vatablus, who upon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrews do often put the singular for the plural, as illud, for unumquodque illorum; and he giveth an instance in this question it self, as, A river (for rivers) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of divers of the learned, may, not without good reason, be given to the objection, that Moses speaketh but of one river, from which the heads should divide themselves. Howbeit I deny not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the four heads, to be four notable passages into famous countries. And so we may take the word (river) verse the 10th for one river (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this river

(after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to have been) divides it self, and ere long yielded four notable passages into several countries, tho' not all the way down stream (for this is no where in the text) where it is noted, that following the river downward, there is conveyance into the countries named in the text, tho' part of the way to one of the countries (to wit, to Affyria) were up Tigris.

To this end the text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the river of Eden, doth not say, it compasseth or washeth the whole region of Affyria (as it had used this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth towards Affyria. The first branch Pison, is Nabar-malcha (by interpretation) Basilus, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tigris under Apamia; whence ariseth the name of Pasi-Tigris, as it were Piso-Tigris. This leadeth to the land of Havila or Susana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in historians is Nabarsares or Narragas, for Nabar-ragas: both which names signify flumen derivatum (a river derived) also Acracanus, quasi Ranosus, by reason of the froggy fens which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seat of Chus, about the borders of Chaldea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the lakes of Chaldea. The third branch Hiddekel, may be expounded the upper stream of Pison, or Basilus, which runneth into Hiddekel, properly so called (that is, into Tigris) above Seleucia, where it sheweth a passage up Tigris into Affyria: where, because at length it is called Hiddekel or Tigris, having before no known proper name, the text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, so called per excellentiam, being the body of the river Euphrates, which runneth thro' Babylon and Otris. But be it a river or rivers, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tigris and Euphrates are noted in the text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradise was not far from these rivers: for that Perath in Moses is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeed) as plain it is that Hiddekel is Tigris. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moses eastward towards Affur, as we find, that Tigris is the river of Affyria proprie dicta, whose chief city was Niveveh, as in Genesis the 10th it is written: That out of that land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Affur, and builded Niveveh, which was the chief city of Affyria.

And as for the kind of speech here used in the text, speaking of four heads; tho' the heads of rivers be (properly) their fountains, yet here are they to be understood, to be spoken of the beginning of their division from the first stream. Caput aquæ (saith Ulpianus) illud est, unde aqua nascitur; si ex fonte nascatur fons; si ex flumine, vel ex lacu, prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a fountain, then is the fountain taken for the head: if out of a lake, then the lake; and if from a main river any branch be separate and divided, then where that branch doth first bound it self with new banks, there is that part of the river, where the branch forsaketh the main stream, called the head of the river.

S E C T. XII.

Of the strange fertility and happiness of the Babylonian soil, as it is certain that Eden was such.

IT may also be demanded, whether this region of Eden, by us described, be of such fertility and beauty, as Eden the seat of Paradise was: which if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the earth, that retained that fertility and pleasure, that it had before the curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the earth, nor the same virtue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before the flood; and therefore this region of Eden may be now no such flourishing country, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I find written of it: First in Herodotus, Clia. lib. 1. who was an eye-witness, and speaketh of the very place it self, for the isle of Eden is but twelve miles or thereabout from Niveveh, and so from Mosal. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, juxta quod urbs Ninus sita erat, hæc regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not far from the place where Ninus is seated; this region, of all that we have seen, is most excellent. And he addeth afterward, Cereris autem fructu procreando adeo ferax est, ut nunquam non seve ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitful in bringing forth corn, that it yieldeth two hundred fold: the leaves of wheat and barley being almost four fingers broad: as for the height of millet and sesam, they are even in length like unto trees, which altho' I know to be true, yet I forbear to speak hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seem very incredible to those, which never were in the country of Babylon. They have commonly in all the country palm-trees growing of their own accord, the most of them bearing fruit; out of which they make both meats, and wine, and honey, ordering them as the fig-trees. Thus far Herodotus.

To this palm-tree, so much admired in the East-India, Strabo and Niger add a fourth excellency, which is, that it yieldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; of which these people make bread, wine, honey, and vinegar. But Antonius the eremite findeth a fifth commodity, not inferiour to any of those four, which is, that from this self-same tree there is drawn a kind of fine flax, of which people make their garments, and with which in East-India they prepare the cordage for their ships; and that this is true, Athanasius in the life of Antonius the eremite confesseth, saying, That he received a garment made thereof from the eremite himself, which he brought with him out of this region. So therefore those trees, which the East-Indies so highly esteem and so much admire (as indeed the earth yieldeth no plant comparable to this) those trees (I say) are in this upper Babylon, or region of Eden, as common as any trees of the field. Sunt etiam (saith Strabo) passim per omnem regionem palmæ sua sponte nascentes; there are of palms over all the whole region, growing of their own accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report, Euntibus a parte læva Arabiæ odorum fertilitate nobilis, regio campestris interest inter Tigrim & Euphratem, jacens tam ubere & pingui solo, ut a pastu repelli pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat (that is) As you travel on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plenty of sweet odours) there lieth a champaign country placed between Tigris and Euphrates, and so fruitful and fat a soil, that they are said to drive their cattle from pasture, lest they should perish by satiety. Ris in anno segetes Babylonii secant; The Babylonians cut their corn twice a year (saith Niger.) And as countries generally are more fruitful to the southward, than in the northern parts: so we may judge the excellency of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the south part of Armonia, which is the north border of Eden, or a part thereof; his words be these in the Latin, Tota enim hæc regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemque semper virentibus; This region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, and trees always green: which witnesseth a perpetual spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies only, by reason of the sun's neighbourhood, the life and stirrer up of nature in a pera perpetual activity. In brief, so great is the fertility of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow down their corn-fields, and a third time to eat them up with sheep : which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the valley of Mexico, for the first forty years, could not make our kind of wheat bear seed, but it grew up as high as the trees, and was fruitless. Besides, those fields are altogether without weeds (saith ^a Pliny) who addeth this singularity to that soil, That the second year the very stubble (or rather falling down of the feeds again) yieldeth them a harvest of corn without any further labour : his words are these : Uben-tatis tantæ sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restibilis fiat seges.

SECT. XIII.

Of the river Pison, and the land of Havilah.

AFTER the discovery of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertility thereof, it resteth to prove that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tigris and Euphrates. For that the knowledge and certainty of these two rivers should trouble so many wise men, it is strange to me, seeing necessity itself (Tigris and Euphrates being known) findeth them out : for Euphrates or Tigris, or both, be that river or rivers of Eden, which water Paradise, which river or rivers Moses witnesseth afterward ; divided into four heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon, &c. Could there be a stranger fancy in the world, than when we find both these, namely, Tigris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seek the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus ? Two rivers as far distant, as any of fame known or discovered in the world : the scriptures making it so plain, that these rivers were divided into four branches ; and with the scriptures, nature, reason and experience bearing witness. There is no error, which hath not some slippery and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability resembling truth, which when men (who study to be singular) find out (straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention and jangling : not doubting but in the variable deformity of mens minds to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their help to nurse and cherish such weak babes, as their own inventions have begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the river of Pison) seemeth to have grown out of the not distinguishing of that region in India, called Havilah, from Havilah, which adjoineth to Babylonia, afterwards known by the name of Susiana. For Havilah upon Tigris took name from Havilah the son of Cush ; and Havilah in India from Havilah the son of Jottan ; the one remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise, the other where ^b Moses setteth down the generations of Noah and his sons after the flood. For the sons of Cush were Seba, Havila, Sabtab, and Raamah ; and the sons of Jottan were Ophir and Havilah, &c. of which latter, to wit, of Ophir and Havilah, the sons of Jottan, that island of Ophir (whence Solomon had gold) and Havilah adjoining had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and a famous river of the East-India, and Havilah a country of the same, and is situated upon Ganges, hence it came, that Ganges is taken for ^c Pison, which river is said by Moses to water the land of Havilah. Or perhaps it was supposed that those four rivers, named by Moses, must of necessity be four of the greatest in the world ; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous river after Tigris and Euphrates, they chose out this river to make one of the four. And yet certainly there is another river, whom in these respects they should rather have chosen than Ganges ; for the river Indus on this side India, for beauty, for nearness, and for ability, giveth no way place to Ganges ; but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceive, that Ganges can be one of the four heads : seeing Indus cometh between it and Tigris ; and between Tigris and Indus is all that large empire of Persia, consisting of many kingdoms. And again, farther towards the east, and beyond Indus, are all those ample dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie between those two proud rivers of Indus and Ganges, now called the kingdom of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the four, because it is removed from Tigris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much less Ganges, which falleth into the ocean, little less than forty degrees to the eastward of Indus ? Surely whosoever readeth the story of Alexander shall find, that there is no river in Asia, that can exceed Indus. For Hydaspis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himself and the greatest part of his army, and in sailing down that branch of Indus, found it so large and deep, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his whole fleet, which was ready to be swallowed up therein : Hydaspis (as aforesaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great as it, having besides this, the rivers of Coas, of Suastus, Acesines, Adris (otherwise Hirodis) Hispalis and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are swallowed up with all their children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one stream, it crosseth athwart Asia, and then at Cambaia visiteth the ocean sea.

But because Pison, which compasseth Havilah, as also ^d Gehon, which watereth Cush, must somewhere be joined with the rest in one body, or at least be found to proceed out of the same country of Eden, out of which the other two heads do proceed, out of doubt they cannot, either the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus : for Nilus riseth in the uttermost of the south, and runneth northward into the Mediterranean sea ; and the river Ganges riseth out of the mountain Imaus, or (as others will have it) Caucasus, which divides the northern Scythia from India, and runneth from north to south into the Indian ocean. And as for Porath and Hiddekal (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, near Georgiana or Iberia, the other not far off in the same Armenia, by the Gordiean mountains, so as Ganges who only travellet in her own India, and Nilus thro' Ethiopia and Egypt, never saw the land of Eden, or joined themselves in one channel, either with themselves, or with either of the other ; and therefore could not at any time from thence be separated or divided into four heads or branches, according to Moses.

Therefore the river Pison, which enricheth Havilah, is the same which by joining itself with Tigris, was therefore called Pisi-tigris, or Piso-tigris, of Pison and Tigris, which river watereth that Havilah, which Havilah the son of Cush gave name unto, and not Havilah of India, so called of Havilah the son of Jottan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the east. And this Havilah of the Cushites hath also ^e gold, bdellium, and the onyx-stone. This bdellium is a tree, of the bigness of an olive, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yieldeth a certain gum, sweet to smell to, but bitter in taste, called also bdellium. The Hebrews take the loadstone for bdellium. Beroaldus affirmeth; that Bdela in Hebrew signifieth pearl: so doth Eugubinus; and Jerome calls it Oleaster: be it what it will, a tree bearing gum or pearl: Havilah or Susiana hath plenty of both. Now this country of Susiana or Havilah stretcheth itself towards the north, as far as the altars of Hercules, and from thence embraceth all the tract of land southward, as far as the Persian gulf, on the east side thereof: from which east-side had the Shebans (which traded with the city of Tyre according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of gold, which Strabo also witnesseth, as was shewed before.

The ^a Greeks had a conceit, that Pison was Danubius: the Rabbins take it for Nilus. Aben-ezra (saith ^b Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia, translateth Pison into Nilus: but Nilus findeth the same impossibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the sea of Hellepont and all Asia the less, between it and Tigris. Now Pison, which runneth through Havilah or Susiana, doth to this day retain some sign of this name; for where it and Tigris embraceth each other under the city of Apamia, there do they agree of a joynt and compounded name, and are called Piso-tigris. And it is strange unto me, that from so great antiquity there should be found remaining any resembling sound of the first name: for Babylon itself, which dwelleth so near these rivers, is by some writers known by the name of Bandas, as, by ^c Postellus, by Castaldus, of Baldach: by Barius, of Bagdad; and of Boughedor, by ^d Andrew Theuet; and yet all those that have lately seen it, call it Bagdet. To this river of Pison, ^e Ptolemy indeed, with many others, give the name of Basilus or Regius, and Gehon they term Maharsares and Marfias, and Baarsares. So is Euphrates, near the spring and fountain, by Strabo and ^f Pliny called Pixirates: by Junius, Puckperab, out of the Hebrew, that is, the profusion or coming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh thro' the mountain Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrews Parath (saith Ar. Montanus;) Pagninus, Perath: Josephus, Phorab: Eusebius, Zozinus: Ammianus, Chalymicus: Gislilanus and Colinutius term it Cobar: which Ezekiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Affyrians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nabor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The same confusion of names hath Tigris, as, Diglito, and Diglatb, Seilax, and Sollax: of the Hebrews it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer upon Genesis conceiveth rightly of these rivers: for Euphrates and Tigris (saith he) stream into four branches, two of which keep their ancient names, and the other two are called Pison and Gehon. The reason why these two rivers joynted in one (below Apamia) lose their names, and are called Pisi-tigris, and the memory of Euphrates extinguished, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the channel of Gehon, sinketh into the lakes of Chaldea, not far from Ur, the city of Abraham, and fall not intirely into the Persian sea, as Tigris accompanied with Pison doth.

This error, that Pison was Ganges, was first broached by Josephus (whose fields, tho' they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weeds) and other men (who take his authority to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For Epiphanius, Augustine, and Jerome, take this for current; whereof it followed, that as Pison was transported into the East India, to find out Havilah: so was Gehon drawn into Africa, to compass Ethiopia. But if Havilah, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a region, adjoyning to Babylon on the one side, and Cush (which is falsely interpreted Ethiopia) fastned to it on the other side, we shall not need then to work wonders (that is) to impose upon men the transportation of rivers, from one end of the world to the other, which (among other uses) were made to transport men. Now it was in the valley of Shinar, where Cush the son of Ilam first sat down with his sons, Sheba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Havilah, the son of Cush, did that region take name, which Pison compasseth; and the land (called Cush) which Gehon watereth, took name of Cush himself. For as the sons of Jostan, Ophir, and Havilah, seated themselves as near together as they could in India, so did the sons of Cush in Shinar or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Havilah or Chavilah was first Chusea of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Susiana.

From this Havilah unto the desarts of Sur, did the Israelites and Amalekites possess all the interjacent countries: for ^g Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah to Sur: which Sur the Chaldean paraphrast converteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the red sea; but this was not meant from Sur upon the red sea, to Havilah in the East India; for Saul was no such traveller or conqueror, and therefore Havilah must be found nearer home, where the sons of Ismael inhabited, and which country Saul wasted: for Amalek and the Amalekites possess that neck of country, between the Persian sea, and the red sea; Havilah being the extreme of the one towards the east, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the west, leaving that great body of Arabia Felix towards the south; and they spread themselves with the Midianites and Edumeans, from the east part, or back-side of the holy land, to the banks of Euphrates, comprising the best parts of Arabia Petraea and Deserta.

SECT. XIV.

Of the river Gehon and the land of Cush: and of the ill translating of the Ethiopia for Cush, 2 Chron. xxi. 16.

NOW, as Havilah in the East India drew Pison so far out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Seventy translated Ethiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Ethiopia by the Greeks, whom the Latins followed, Gehon consequently was esteemed for Nilus. But ^h Ethiopians are, as much, as black or burnt faces, whose proper country is called Thebaides, lying to the southward of all Egypt. And altho' there be many other regions of Ethiopians, and far south in Africa, yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembered in the Egyptian stories, and out of which nation they had many times their kings of Egypt: all which Ethiopians are very near, or else directly under the Equinottial line, which is very far from that land inhabited by the Chusites; who are neither black of colour, nor in any sort neighbouring Torrída Zona. But this translation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualify in this manner. There are (saith he) two Ethiopia's, the east, and the west: and this division he findeth in Strabo, out of Ho- mer. Now because there is no colour to make Cbus Ethiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Cush and the land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petræa, and a part of Arabia the happy, with the region of Midian) to be the east Ethiopia.

Now if it be granted, that Cush and the land of the Chusites, be that tract from Sur to Havilah, according to the scriptures: ^a Habitavit Ismael ab Havilah usque Sur, quæ respicit Ægyptum introcun-ibus Assyrios; Ismael dwelt from Havilah unto Sur, that is, towards Egypt, as thou goest towards Assyria: The same sufficeth to prove that Gebon cannot be Nilus, but a river which watereth Cush, and not Ethiopia. But this place of scripture Habitavit Ismael, &c. hath this sense: Ismael dwelt from Havilah, which is the way of Assyria, or the country bordering Assyria; and Sur, which lyeth towards Egypt, which is as much to say, as, the issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelve princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those regions between the border of Egypt and Assyria. And that they were (according to the word God) so increased and multiplied, it well appeared, when ^c Zerah the Chusite, which others call Tharantba, brought an army of ten hundred thousand against Afa king of Juda. Which army came not out of Ethiopia beyond Egypt; for that had been a strange progress for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, having so mighty a king as the king of Egypt, between Palestina and Ethiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalekites, Midianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Afa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an army, he in following his victory took some of the cities of king Zerah round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a city of the Ethiopians, it cannot be suspected: for these be the words of the scripture disproving it: ^d And Abraham departed thence towards the south country, and dwelt between Cadesh and Sur, and sojourned in Gerar; Now Sur is that part, upon which Moses and the Israelites first set their feet after they passed the red sea, where the ^e Amalekites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had been weary, and unable to resist. Again, in the story of Isaac it is written, ^f Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech, and the Philistines unto Gerar: and I am sure Abimelech and the Philistines were no Ethiopians. And lastly, Moses himself, where he describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these words: ^g Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou comest to Gerar: for Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the north, and Gerar by Gazah towards the south. But indeed, howsoever Pererius cloth with an honest excuse save his translation of Cbus for Ethiopia, yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint, and Josephus did altogether misunderstand this place. And first, for Homer's east and west Ethiopia, they are both found elsewhere. For Pliny in his fifth book and eighth chapter, citeth Homer for an author, of these two Ethiopia's. But the east Ethiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the south of Egypt, and is the south border thereof; now a part of the empire of the Abyssines, under Prester John; and the west Ethiopia is that, which joyneth it self with the river Niger, which we call Senega and Gambra: for thereabouts are these Ethiopians, called Perorsi, Daratites, with divers other names, which ^h Pliny numbereth. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the deserts thereof, saith Pliny out of Homer, Agrippa, and Juba, which regions indeed (I mean that of Niger, and that of Prester John, and the Troglodites) lie due east and west. But as for Cush, and the region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly north from that Ethiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Josephus was exceeding gross herein, it appeareth by that fiction, which he hath of Moses when he served Pharaoh, in the wars against the Ethiopians: for in that (to make Cbus, Ethiopia) he transporteth Midian by miracle over the red sea, and beyond all Egypt, and setteth it in Ethiopia, as shall be shewed more at large in the chapter of the world's plantation. Again, that Gebon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greek copy, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint have converted this place of the prophet Jeremy. ⁱ And what hast thou now to do in the way of Egypt, to drink the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Ægypti, ut bibas aquam Gebon? To this faith Pererius, profecto Hebraice ibi non est vox Gebon sed Sichor, quæ significat nigrum & turbidum; Truly (saith Pererius) the word Gebon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which signifieth black and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and unanswerable argument, that Cbus was ill taken for Ethiopia. ^k Moses married the daughter of Jethro, prince and priest of Midian, whom both the Greek and Latin call a Midianite, and not ^l Ethiopissam, as (with Josephus) the Geneva converts it, though it helps it a little with a marginal note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the country of Midian, which is that part of Arabia Petræa, bordering the red sea; for it is written in Exodus, that Moses ^m fled from Pharaoh into the land of Midian, and sat down by a well, &c. and again, ⁿ When Moses kept the sheep of Jethro his father-in-law, priest of Midian, &c. Indeed, these four nations are every where mixt in the scriptures, because they dwell confusedly with one another (to wit) the Midianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chusites, which were all in one general word, Arabians, and in the scriptures sometimes called by one of those names, and sometimes by another, as in Gen. xxxvii. 25, 27, 28, that Joseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and again, v. 36. it is written, that the Midianites sold Joseph to Potiphar, Pharaoh's steward. The Genevians, in a marginal note (to avoid this confounding of the nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who took the Midianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any man's opinion, he wrote the truth, and these were all Arabians, and so in this very place it appeareth by their merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Joseph: for their ^o camels were laden with spicery, and balm, and myrrh, which are the trades of Arabia Felix, from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the world is served with myrrh and frankincense; and their spices they received from the east side of the Arabian Gulf, as aforesaid. And in chap. 39. ver. 1. it is said: That Potiphar bought Joseph of the Ismaelites, which the Chaldean paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more manifest, it is written, in Judges vi. 3. That when Israel had sown, then came up the Midianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the east, and came upon them: they of the east, were Arabians of the Desart; so as where before, in the buying of Joseph, the Midianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Midianites and Amalekites, are made one nation. For in the prosecution of the story of Gideon, the ^p Midianites only are named; as comprehending both nations; and these nations are all called ^a Ismaelites, and neither Midianites nor Amalekites. As when Gideon desired, that every man would give him the golden ear-rings, which they had taken, after the victory against Zebah and Zalmunna, kings of Arabia, amounting to seventeen hundred sheckles of gold, it is written: ^a For they had gold ear-rings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and valiant nation, and ever in action of war. ^b Manus ejus contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (saith God of Ismael) shall be against all men, and every mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites came the Mahometan Arabians, though some writers think Mahomet to be of the Schenite. And these Ismaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan (saith Josephus) use poison upon their arrows, as the Indians do. Towards the south-east are the Midianites, and Chusites: and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill translation of Ethiopia for Chus, is, amongst other places, made most apparent, in Chronicles, in these words: ^c So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram, the spirit of the Philistines and the Arabians, which confine the Ethiopians; so Jerome reads it; the Geneva translation hath it, which were besides the Ethiopians. Now, how far it is off, between the Philistines, and the Negroes, or Ethiopians, every man that looketh in a map may judge. For the Philistines and Arabians do mix and join with the land of the Chusites, and are distant from Ethiopia about 32 or 33 degrees, and therefore not their next neighbours; but all Egypt, and the Desarts of Sur, and Pharan, are between them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should have been translated in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram, the spirits of the Philistines, and Arabians, which confine and border upon the Chusites, who indeed are their next neighbours. ^d Nulla superest dubitatio, quin Æthiopia in sacris literis sit Arabic propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (saith Steuchius) but Ethiopia in the scriptures is taken for that country, which joineth to Arabia.

Now may we think it is probable, or possible, that Moses could be ignorant of Nilus? No; he knew it, no living man so well, and therefore would never have named Gebon for Nilus, or Nilus for Gebon. Surely if Moses had meant Nilus, when he named Gebon, he would have called the river (into which he was cast upon reeds, and preserved by God, working compassion in the ^e daughter of Pharaoh) a river of Egypt, wherein he was born and bred, and wrought so many miracles. Besides, the river of Nilus is often named in the scriptures, but never by the name of Gebon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had been a river of Paradise, they might justly have thought that he had derided them: for they had lived there all the days of their lives, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof; except we shall believe the Paradise of Hesperides, where (saith ^f Pliny) there was nothing found in his time, but wild olives instead of golden apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in ^g Isaiah, and once in the prophet ^h Jeremy; and yet in those places it is not said to be a river of Ethiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had never any communion or affairs with the Ethiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the south; but the enemies, which they had on the south, and east parts, were these nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Midianites: who being often governed by many little kings, or reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the fathers and heads of those nations; but in one general name were all Arabians. On the north-side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Cœlesyrians, with the Magogians, Tubalines, and others their adherents; and thirdly within themselves, the nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest cities upon the sea-coast, as Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Jerusalem itself was with-held from Israel (from the days of Moses even unto the time of David) by the Jebusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficulty is, that it doth not appear, that any part of Gebon watereth that part of Arabia the stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was, that Matt. Beroaldus lost himself in seeking out Paradise: for he was driven (to my understanding) to create two rivers, and call them Gebon, and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Havilah, for I find none such in rerum natura, as he hath described: by which rivers he also includeth within Paradise, even Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proved that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gebon Nilus: so where to find them elsewhere, it seemeth he knew not. Certainly this river of Gebon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterranean at Gaza, and whose springs he findeth far east in Arabia, is but imaginary: for the current by Gaza is but a small stream, rising between it and the red sea, whose head from Gaza itself is little more than twenty English miles, as shall appear hereafter. But questionless hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their near neighbours, and never looked back to the first seats and plantation of Chus. For after the flood, Chus and his children never rested, till they found the valley of Shinar, in which, and near which himself with his sons first inhabited. Havilah took the river-side of Tigris chiefly on the east, which after his own name he called Havilah (now Sustiana;) Ramath and Sheba farther down the river, in the entrance of Arabia Felix. Nimrod seated himself in the best of the valley, where he built Babel, whereof that region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himself and his brother Mizraim first kept upon Gebon, which falleth into the lakes of Chaldea, and in process of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselves more westerly towards the red or Arabian sea: from whence Mizraim pass'd over into Egypt, in which tract the Chusites remained for many years after. Now because there could be no such river found in Arabia the stony, which they might entitle Gebon, they translated Chus Ethiopia, and Gebon Nilus. And if we do examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceive it as it was. For let us suppose that Brute, or whosoever else that first peopled this island, had arrived upon the river Thames, and calling the island after his name Britannia, it might be said that Thames or Tems was a river that watered Britannia: and when afterwards, in process of time, the same Brute had also discovered and conquered Scotland, which he also entituled by the same name of Britannia, after-ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the river Tems is not found therein. Or let us suppose that Europa, the daughter of the king of Tyre in Phœnicia, gave the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, lib. 1. § 4. and that the first discoverers thereof arrived in the mouth of some river in Thrace, which then watereth as much of Europe, as he first discovered, shall we in like sort resolve, that France, Spain, and Italy, &c. are no part of Europe, because that river is not found in them, or any of them? In like manner was it said by Moses, in his description of Gebon, that it watered the whole land of Chus; but not the whole land which the Chusites should or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit, seeing in after-ages they became lords of many nations, and they might (perchance) have been masters in time (as the Saracens which came of them were) of a great part of the world. For tho' the Babylonian empire, which took beginning in Nimrod the son of Chus, consisted at the first but of four cities (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalne, yet we find, that his successors within a few years after commanded all the whole world in effect: and the fame of Babel consumed the memory of Chusea. For of this tower of confusion did all that land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatness of that empire, founded by Nimrod a younger son, obscured the name and nation of his father Cush in those parts, until they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fastened to the soil and territory by themselves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not think that Chus or any of his could in haste creep thro' those desert regions, which the length of 130 years after the flood had (as it were) fortified with thickets, and permitted every bush and briar, reed and tree, to join themselves (as it were) into one main body and Forrest. For if we look with judgment and reason into the world's plantation, we shall find, that every family seated themselves as near together as possibly they could; and tho' necessity enforced them, after they grew full of people, to spread themselves, and creep out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this advice, as that they might at all times resort, and succour one another by river, the fields being then (without all doubt) impassable. So Nimrod, who out of wit and strength usurped dominion over the rest, sat down in the very confluence of all those rivers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was to which the greatest troops of Noah's children repaired; and from the same place whence mankind had his beginning, from thence had they again their increase. The first father of men Adam, had therein his former habitation. The second father of mankind Noah, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as Nimrod the youngest, yet strongest, made his choice of Babel (as aforesaid) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleansed and enriched; so did Havilah place himself upon Piso-Tigris: Raamah and his son Sheba farther down upon the same river, on the sea coast of Arabia: Chus himself upon Gebon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselves farther off, yet they always fastened themselves to the rivers sides: for Nineveh, Charran, Reseph, Canneh, Ur in Chaldea, and the other first peopled cities, were all founded upon these navigable rivers, or their branches, by which the one might give succour and assistance to the other, as is already often remembered.

BUT now to conclude this dispute, it appeareth to me by the testimonies of the scriptures, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our earth and habitable world, seated in the lower part of the region of Eden, afterwards called Aram fluviorum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this region standing in the most excellent temper of all others (to wit) 35 degrees from the Equinoctial, and 55 from the north pole: in which climate the most excellent wines, fruits, oil, grain of all sorts, are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proveth the excellency of this said soil and temper, than the abundant growing of the palm-trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein soever the earth, nature, and the sun can most vaunt, that they have excelled, yet shall this plant be the greatest wonder of all their works: this tree alone giveth unto man whatsoever his life beggeth at nature's hand. And tho' it may be said, that these trees are found both in the East and West-Indies, which countries are also blessed with a perpetual spring and summer, yet lay down by those pleasures and benefits the fearful and dangerous thunders and lightnings, the horrible and frequent earthquakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venomous beasts and worms, with other inconveniences, and then there will be found no comparison between the one and the other.

What other excellences this garden of Paradise had, before God (for mans ingratitude and cruelty) cursed the earth, we cannot judge; but I may safely think that by how much Adam exceeded all living men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular garden exceed all parts of the universal world, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the trees of life, of knowledge; plants only proper, and becoming the Paradise and garden of so great a lord.

The sum of all this is, that whereas the eyes of men in this scripture have been dim-sighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our known world: some, above the middle region of the air: some, elevated near the moon: others, as far south as the line, or as far north, as the pole, &c.) I hope that the reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like castles in the air, and in mens fancies vainly imagined. For it was eastward in Eden (saith Moses;) eastward, in respect of Judea, that God planted this garden, which Eden we find in the prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A river went out of Eden to water this garden, and from thence divided it self into four branches; and we find that both Tigris and Euphrates swimming thro' Eden do join in one, and afterward taking ways apart, do water Chus and Havilah, according to Moses: the true seats of Chus and his sons then being in the valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pison was Ganges, the scripture, reason, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was never joined cannot be divided. Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the rivers of Eden; that Gebon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibility, and this river is a greater stranger to Tigris and Euphrates, than Ganges is: for altho' there are between Tigris and Ganges above four thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the world; but Nilus is begotten in the mountains of the moon, almost as far off as the Cape of Good Hope,

Hope, and falleth into the Mediterranean sea: and Euphrates distilleth out of the mountains of Armenia, and falleth into the gulf of Persia: the one riseth in the south, and travelleth north: the other riseth in the north, and runneth south, threescore and three degrees the one from the other. In this leaf following, I have added a chorographical description of this terrestrial Paradise, that the reader may thereby the better conceive the preceding discourse; and this is the reward I look for, that my labours may but receive an allowance suspended, until such time as this description of mine be reproved by a better.

Of the two chief trees in the garden of
P A R A D I S E.

S E C T. I.

That the tree of life was a material tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subject to death.

FOR eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of knowledge was Adam driven out of Paradise, in exilium vitæ temporalis, into the banishment of temporal life, saith Beda. That these trees of life and knowledge were material trees (tho' figures of the law and of the gospel) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned writers: altho' the wits of men, which are so volatile, as nothing can fix them, and so slippery as nothing can fasten them, have in this also delivered to the world an imaginary doctrine.

The tree of life (say the Hebrews) hath a plural construction, and is to be understood, Lignum vitarum, the tree of lives, because the fruit thereof had a property, to preserve both the growing, sensitive, and rational life of man; and not only (but for Adam's transgression) had prolonged his own days, but also given a durable continuance to all posterity; and that, so long as a body compounded of elements could last.

And altho' it is hard to think, that flesh and blood could be immortal, but that it must once perish and rot, by the unchanged law of God imposed on his creatures, man (notwithstanding) should have enjoyed thereby a long, healthful, and ungrieved life: after which (according to the opinion of most divines) he should have been translated, as Enoch was. And as before the flood, the days of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred years; and soon after the flood, of two hundred years and upwards even to five hundred: so if Adam had not disobey'd God's first and easy commandment, the lives of men on earth might have continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men have conceived. Chrysostom, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of belief, that (but for Adam's fall and transgression) Adam and his posterity had been immortal. But such is the infinite wisdom of God, as he foresaw that the earth could not have contained mankind; or else, that millions of souls must have been ungenerated, and have had no being, if the first number, wherewith the earth was replenished, had abode thereon for ever: and therefore that of Chrysostom must be understood of immortality of bodies, which should have been translated and glorified.

But of what kind or species this tree of life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many have conceived, that the same was not material, but a mere allegory, taking their strength out of Solomon, where wisdom is compared to the tree of life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the tree of life, and out of the Apocalypsis, I will give to him that overcometh, to eat of the tree of life, which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place St. Augustine's answer may suffice (which is) that the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terrestrial Paradise, so there was a celestial. For altho' Agar and Sara were figures of the Old and New Testament, yet to think that they were not women, and the maid and wife of Abraham, were mere foolishness. And so in this place the sense of the scripture is manifest. For God brought out of the earth every tree fair to sight, and sweet to taste; the tree also of life in the midst of the garden: which sheweth, that among the trees, which the earth by God's commandment produced, the tree of life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this tree was also brought to the ancient poets: for as from the indigested matter or chaos, Hesiodus, Homer, Ovid, and others, steal the invention of the created world; so from the garden of Paradise, they took the platform of the orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Hesperides: and from the tree of life, their Nectar, and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, signifieth making young, and Ambrosia, immortality; and therefore said to be the meat and drink of the Gods.

S E C T. II.

Of Becanus's opinion, that the tree of knowledge was Ficus Indica.

NOW for the tree of knowledge of good and evil, some men have presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giveth himself the honour to have found out the kind of this tree, which none of the writers of former times could ever guess at, whereat Goropius much marvelleth. But as he had an inventive brain, so there never lived any man, that believed better thereof, and of himself. Surely howsoever his opinion may be valued, yet he usurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the invention be at that price at which he setteth it. For Moses Bar-Cephas fastened on this conjecture above six hundred years before Becanus was born: and Bar-Cephas himself referreth the invention to an antiquity more remote, citing for his author Philoxenus Maburgensis, and others, whose very words Goropius useth, both concerning the tree, and the reasons wherewith he would induce other men to that belief. For Moses Bar-Cephas in his treatise of Paradise (the first part, and fol. 48.) saith, that the tree of knowledge was ficus Indica, the Indian fig-tree, of which the greatest plenty (saith Becanus) are found upon the banks of Acesines, one of the rivers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his fleet of gallies in, or near the kingdom of Porus.

This tree beareth a fruit of the bigness of a great pea, or (as Pliny reporteth) somewhat bigger, and that it is a tree se semper serens, always planting it self; that it spreadeth it self so far abroad, as that a troop of horsemen may hide themselves under it. Strabo saith, that it hath branches bending downwards, and leaves no less than a shield. Aristobulus affirmeth that fifty horsemen may shadow themselves under one of these trees. Onesicritus raiseth this number to four hundred. This tree (saith Theophrastus) exceedeth all other in bigness, which also Pliny and Onesicritus confirm: to the trunk of which these authors give such a magnitude, as I shame to repeat. But it may be, they all speak by an ill-understood report. For this Indian fig-tree is not so rare a plant, as Becanus conceiveth, who, because he found it no where else, would needs draw the garden of Paradise to the tree, and set it by the river Acesines. But many parts of the world have them, and I my self have seen twenty thousand of them in one valley, not far from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner. After they are first shot up some twenty or thirty foot in length (some more, some less, according to the soil) they spread a very large top, having no bough nor twig in the trunk or stem: for from the utmost end of the head-branches there issueth out a gummy juice, which hangeth downward like a cord or sinew, and within a few months reacheth the ground; which it no sooner toucheth but it taketh root, and then being filled both from the top-boughs, and from his own proper root, this cord maketh it self a tree exceeding hastily. From the utmost boughs of these young trees there fall again the like cords, which in one year and less (in that world of a perpetual spring) become also trees of the bigness of the nether part of a lance, and as strait as art or nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kind of grove, as no other tree in the world can do. Now one of these trees considered, with all his young ones, may (indeed) shroud four hundred or four thousand horsemen, if they please; for they cover whole vallies of ground where these trees grow near the sea-bank, as they do by thousands in the inner part of Trinidado. The cords which fall down over the banks into the sea, shooting always downward to find root under water, are in those seas of the Indies, where oysters breed, intangled in their beds, so as by pulling up one of these cords out of the sea, I have seen five hundred oysters hanging in a heap thereon; whereof the report came, that oysters grew on trees in India. But that they bear any such huge leaves, or any such delicate fruit, I could never find, and yet I have travelled a dozen miles together under them. But to return to Goropius Becanus. This tree (saith he) was good for meat and pleasing to the sight, as the tree of knowledge of good and evil is described to be.

Secondly, This tree having so huge a trunk (as the former authors report, and Becanus believeth) it was in this tree that Adam and Eve hid themselves from the presence of God, for no other tree (saith he) could contain them. But first it is certain, that this tree hath no extraordinary magnitude, as touching the trunk or stem, for among ten thousand of them it is hard to find any one bigger than the rest, and these are all of a mean size. Secondly, the words of Moses translated in medio ligni, are by all the interpreters understood in the plural number (that is) in the midst of the trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Bar-Cephas, word for word) is, that when Adam and Eve found themselves naked, they made them breeches of fig-leaves; which proveth (indeed) that either the tree it self was a fig-tree, or that a fig-tree grew near it: because Adam being possess'd with shame, did not run up and down the garden to seek out leaves to cover him, but found them in the place it self; and these leaves of all others were most commodious, by reason of their largeness, which Pliny avoweth in these words; Latitudo foliorum peltæ effigiem Amazoniæ habet, the breadth of the leaves hath the shape of an Amazonian shield: which also Theophrast confirmeth; the form of which target Virgil touches:

Penthesilæa furens.*

The Amazon with crescent-formed shield
Penthesilea leads into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to be believed, or rather threatneth us all that read him, to give credit to this his borrowed discovery, using this confident (or rather cholerick) speech. Quis erit tam impudenter obstinatus, si hæc a nobis de ficu hac ex antiquis scriptoribus cum Mosis narratione comparet, ut audeat dicere aliam arborem inveniri posse, quæ cum illa magis quadret; Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things, which we have reported of this fig-tree, and out of ancient writers delivered, with the narration of Moses, as to dare to avow, that any other tree can be found, which doth more properly answer, or agree therewith. But for my self, because I neither find this tree, sorting in body, in largeness of leaves, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: that the earth never brought forth any of these trees neither before nor after; but I leave every man to his own belief, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kind: only thereby, and by the easy commandment by God given to Adam, to forbear to feed thereon, it pleased God to make trial of his obedience: ⁠Prohibita, non propter aliud, quam ad commendandum puræ ac simplicis obedientiæ bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other respect, than thereby to commend the goodness of pure and simple obedience.

SECT. III.

Of Becanus's not unwitty allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

BUT in this I must do Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this tree, allowing his supposition of the tree it self to be true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I have gathered in these few words. As this tree (saith he) so did man grow straight and upright towards God, until such time as he had transgressed and broken the commandment of his Creator; and then like unto the boughs of this tree, he began to bend downward, and stooped toward the earth, which all the rest of Adam's posterity after him have done, rooting themselves therein, and fastening themselves to this corrupt world. The exceeding umbragiousness of this tree he compareth to the dark and shadowed life of man, thro' which the sun of justice being not able to pierce, we have all remained in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climb the tree of the cross for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to find among so many large leaves, may be compared (saith he) to the little virtue, and unperceived knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shadow it over. And as this fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate; so are the delights and pleasures of the world most pleasing while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into choler and bitterness: so are our vanities and pleasures converted into the bitterest sorrows and repentances. That the leaves are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaves) exceeding little, in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shews and publick ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we seek for the fruit, which ought to be their vir-tuous and pious actions, we find it of the bigness of the smallest pea; glory, to all the world apparent; goodness, to all the world invisible. And furthermore, as the leaves, body, and boughs of this tree, by so much exceed all other plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly ability surpass the meanest: so is the little fruit of such men, and such trees, rather fitting and becoming the unworthiest shrub, and humblest briar, or the poorest and basest man, than such a flourishing stateliness and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after he had disobey'd God, and beheld his own nakedness and shame, sought for leaves to cover himself withal, this may serve to put us in mind of his and our sins, as often as we put on our garments, to cover and adorn our rotten and mortal bodies: to pamper and maintain which we use so many uncharitable and cruel practices in this world.

S E C T. IV.

Of the name of the tree of knowledge of good and evil: with some other notes touching the story of Adam's sin.

NOW, as touching the sense of this tree of knowledge of good and evil, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the property of the tree itself, Moses Bar-Cephas, an ancient Syrian doctor (translated by Masius) giveth this judgment, that the fruit of this tree had no such virtue or quality, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if he had been ignorant before; but as Junius also noteth, Arbor scientiæ boni & mali (id est) experientiæ boni & mali ab eventu; The tree of knowledge of good and evil (that is) the experience of good and evil by the event. For thus much we may conceive, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of God's own hand, in greater perfection than ever any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created plant, out of whose seed all men living have grown up; and having received immortality from the breath or spirit of God, he could not (for these respects) be ignorant, that the disobeying of God's commandment was the fearfullest evil, and the observation of his precepts the happiest good. But as men in perfect health do (notwithstanding) conceive, that sickness is grievous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering and experience in themselves they afterwards witness: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the proof thereof in himself another terror than he had forethought, or could image. For looking into the glass of his own guilty soul, he beheld therein the horror of God's judgments, so as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had trial of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased evil, which could not be express'd. He then saw himself naked both in body and mind; that is, deprived of God's grace and former felicity: and therefore was this tree called the tree of knowledge, and not because the fruit thereof had any such operation, by any self-quality or effect: for the same phrase is used in many places of the scriptures, and names are given to signs and sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort as this tree was called the tree of knowledge, because of the event (as is aforesaid) so was the well of contention therefore called Esek, and the well of hatred Sitnath, because the herdsmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them; and the heap of stones, called the heap of witness, between Jacob and Laban, not that the stones bare witness, but for a memory of the covenant. So Jacob called the house of God Bethel: and Hagar, the well in the desert, viventis & videntis.

But Adam being both betray'd and mastered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge than he had perceived in himself, and looking but slightly (as all his issues do) into the miseries and sorrows incident, and greatly affecting the supposed glory which he might obtain by tasting the fruit forbidden, he was transported and blown forward by the gentle wind of pleasing persuasions unawares; his progression being strengthened by the subtile arguments of Satan, who laboured to poison mankind in the very root, which he moistened with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himself perished for ever.

But what means did the devil find out, or what instruments did his own subtilty present him, as fittest and aptest to work this mischief by? even the unquiet vanity of the woman; so as by Adam's hearkening to the voice of his wife, contrary to the express commandment of the living God, mankind by that her incantation became the subject of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being given to man for a comforter and companion, but not for a counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voice of thy wife, &c. (saith God himself) Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; even by the most ugly and unworthy of all beasts, into whom the devil entred and persuaded.

Secondly, What was the motive of her disobedience: even a desire to know what was most unfitting her knowledge, an affection which hath ever since remained in all the posterity of her sex. Thirdly, What was it that moved the man to yield to her persuasions? even the same cause which hath moved all men since to the like consent, namely, an unwillingness to grieve her and make her sad, lest she should pine and be overcome with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Solomon the son of David, God's chosen servant, and himself a man endued with the greatest wisdom, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the persuasion and for the love they bare to a woman, it is not so wonderful as lamentable, that other men in succeeding ages have been allured to so many inconvenient and wicked practices by the persuasions of their wives, or other beloved darlings, who cover over and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeit passion of dissimulate sorrow and unquietness.

Of the cause and the revenge of Cain's sin: and of his going out from God.

THE same pride and ambition which began in angels, and afterwards possess'd Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (envious of the acceptance of his brother's prayer and sacrifice) slew him, making himself the first man-slayer, and his brother the first martyr: the revenge of which unnatural murder, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cried out that his punishment was greater than he could bear. For the same offence chiefly (wherewith the sons of Adam, as it were, urged and provoked God) he destroyed all mankind, but Noah and his family: for it is written, ^a The earth also was corrupt before God: of which in the same place Moses giveth a reason; for, saith he, The earth was filled with cruelty: and anon, after God himself made the cause known unto Noah, saying, An end of all flesh is come before me, for the earth is filled with cruelty through them, and behold, I will destroy them with the earth, or from the earth: Neither was this cruelty meant to have been in taking away the lives of men only, but in all sorts of injustice and oppression. After this murder of Abel, ^b Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod, towards the east-side of Eden: in which words, the going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be understood after the literal sense; God being wholly in all parts of the world. ^c Totus in celo est, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, sed utrumque simul; God (saith S. Augustine) is wholly in heaven, and wholly in earth, and not by interchanged times, but all at once: and that this is true, David witnesseth. ^d If I be in heaven (saith David) thou art there; if in hell, thou art there also: but what is meant thereby? ^e Exiit a facie Dei (saith Chrysostom) Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, that is, he was left of God, disfavoured and bereaved of his protection.

SECT. II.

Of Cain's dwelling in the land of Nod: and of his city Enoch.

THIS word Nod, or Naid, ^f St. Jerome and many others understand to signify wandering, or uncertain habitation: vexation or agitation, saith ^g Junius: but the Seventy convert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a country, and so doth ^h Josephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a vagabond or wanderer in his cogitations, than any thing else, and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the murder committed, justly fearing (by his own words) the like violence: ⁱ And whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me. Now that Nod, or Naid, was a region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word [dwelt] for dwelling signifieth an abiding: and we call those people wanderers and vagabonds that have no dwelling-place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, ^j Moses teacheth in what part of the earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the east-side of Eden. Secondly, It is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or favour of God, he built a city, and called it by the name of his first-born, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather sought to fortify himself against revenge. Cyrillus saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ and of the Jews; and that as Cain, after that he had slain Abel unjustly, had thenceforth no certain abiding in the world: so the Jews, after they had crucified the Son of God, became runnegates: and it is true, that the Jews had never since any certain estate, commonweal, or prince of their own upon the earth. Now this land of Nod, Junius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a region of Nomades; but Arabia the Desert is not eastward, or on the east-part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular people or nation. For all these, in what part of the world soever, which in old time lived by pastorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland) upon white-meat without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greeks Nomades, and by the Latins Pastores vagi, as the northern Tartarians, the Getulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Britons, and the northern Irish: yea, such were the inhabitants of Italy itself, till such time as Italus (who gave them that name) taught them the husbandry of tillage used at this day. But the region eastward from Eden is that part of Affyria, called by Ptolemy, Calena, which also might be derived of Carena, the county of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts it may be gathered by the first possession of his father Adam; for thus it is written, ^k Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden to till the earth whence he was taken: and in the verse following, Thus he cast out man, &c. and at the east-side of the garden of Eden he set the Cherubins: which sheweth that the entry into Paradise was from the east, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was eastward, according to the text: Cain also in the same region sought his dwelling-place. Now, if the word Nod, or Naid, do signify profugus, that is, a fugitive, we can give no longer time to this uncertain habitation of Cain, than till he built the city of Enoch, the first of the world, which he inclosed either for his own defence, or (as Josephus writeth) to oppress others thereby. So as for my own opinion, I am resolved with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a region; and for the word [vagabond] which Cain useth of himself, it seemeth by the perclose of the same verse, that [vagabond] is therein understood for such an one as travelleth in fear of revengement: for whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me; or else [vagabond] is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the favour of God.

And because these Henochians, so called of the city Henoch, were the first society and civil assembly of all other, it is likely that the fame of these people (either for cruelty, strength, or other actions) lived in the memory of Noah and his sons; so that after the flood (as there were of all sorts of natures, some virtuously, some impiously, disposed, and every active mind setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those people, which delighted in cruelty and oppression, took on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Enochians were not the least. Perchance the place it self where Enoch stood before the flood, and whereof the monuments might remain (as the pillars or the foundation of Joppe did) gave occasion to the planters of that place to call themselves by the same names: for of those Enochians there were many nations in the borders of Pontus, and Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, and Bactria, and of the same name many mountains, as those which are otherwise called Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged time hath covered over or defaced, we may (according to the counsel of ^l Plato) exceedingly rejoyce, and therewith satisfy our selves, if of so great and almost worn-out antiquity, if of the eldest people's names and nations, there remain any print or footsteps to posterity.

Seneca ad Albiuum.

In ^a Pliny, P. Mela, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, we find those Henochi described, though diversly written, as in Pliny sometimes Heniochi, in Mela Eniochi, in Flaccus, Heniochi, in Lucan Enochii, all which inhabit upon the sea Euxinus, but yet none of these are on the east side of Eden, or (according to Moses's words) eastward from Eden. For Moses, in all places where he describeth any region, was so exceeding precise, as sometimes he useth the word east or south without borrowing, or addition, at other times with a borrowing, as eastward or southward, or towards the east or south. In the place of Genesis xi. ver. 2. he writeth the word [east] simply and directly. And as they went from the east, they found a plain in the land of Shinar, but this of Cain he addeth the word [towards] as, in the land of Nod towards the east side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two either to the north or to the south of the east.

But as we may conjecture that these nations took name of Enoch, the city of Cain, or of the region wherein it stood, when the same was repeopled after the flood: so it is probable that these Henochii of Colchis, and other parts adjoyning, were not the first of that name, after the sons of Noah began to fill the world again: because, had this Enoch the city of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then been seated north, and not east or eastward from Eden. But as ^b Pliny findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards he goeth on eastward, till he track them or trace them out to their original. For he calleth these of Colchis (now Mengrelia) Sanni Heniochi; ^c Ptolemy Zani; beyond which, an hundred and fifty miles eastward, he findeth another nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond these again he discovereth a third nation, from whence all the rest took beginning, which inhabited on the west side of the mountains of Paro-panisus, between them and the great river of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the north side; and these Henochii are due east from the region of Eden, and eastward from the very garden it fell.

And altho' we cannot be assured, that these Henochii took name from the memory of the city of Enoch directly, yet because they inhabited due east from Paradise, and afterwards spread themselves westward (as all Noah's sons did that came into Shinar) the conjecture is far more probable, than that of Amnius the frier, who sets Enoch in Phenicia, quite contrary to Moses's word: Phenicia from all parts of Eden being directly west.

And besides these several nations of the Henochii, ^d Stephanus findeth a region called Henochia, and the same also in the east, with divers mountains about Bactria and Sogdiana of the same name. Only the Grecians (according to their fabulous inventions of all things else) out of the word [Heniochi] which signifieth carts or coach-men, make these nations to have sprung from the waggoners of Castor and Pollux (to wit) ^e Amphipes and Telebius, who attended them in the enterprise of Jason into Colchis. And tho' I do not deny, but that Jason with other Greeks ranged the coasts of Asia the less, in an open boat or kind of small galley, ^f of whom I shall speak in his own time: yet no man doubteth but that the tale of the golden fleece was for the most part poetical; and withal that in such an open boat, which could hardly carry their own rowers, being fifty-four, there was no place, and less use of coach-horses or waggoners.

S E C T. III.

Of Moses's omitting sundry things concerning Cain's generation.

BUT of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the city of Enoch in prophane story, thus much may suffice; now it followeth to answer some few objections against certain particulars in the fourth and fifth chapter of Genesis: against which for the first it is demanded, how it was possible for Cain (having no other assistance than his son Enoch) to perform such a work as the building of a city, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a mass of all sorts of materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, that of Cain (because he was the parent of an impious race) Moses useth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his divine reason, seeing that he containeth the whole story of the first race, which wast-ed by the least account 1656 years, in five short chapters. Yet thus much may every man borrow of his own weakest reason, that seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generations of mens lives, so long a measure, as 800 and 900 years, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and means to build many such cities as Enoch, be the capacity answering to what other of the world soever: for in what age of Cain's life he built it, the scriptures are silent: as of those times, and the times of his issues Moses had the least care. And as it was said of Cain, that he built a city: so was it said of Noah, that his three sons peopled all the world: but in both, the process of time required to be understood: which advice seeing Moses useth where the space less requireth it, as knowing that he writ the scriptures to reasonable men, we may easily understand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference between the birth of Abel, and oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fuit autem post dies multos, or a fine dierum (that is) in process of time it came to pass that Cain brought an oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to be understood of Cain, that many years fore-gone, and when his people were increased he built the city of Enoch or Enoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of ^g Solomon, that he built the temple of Jerusalem; yet it is well known of Solomon, that he employed in that work 150000 labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selves to say, the king invaded; when he caused an invasion to be made: and he built, when he commanded such a building. And therefore seeing we find, that Moses had no regard to the ages, to the birth, or to the death of any of Cain's issues, it is not to be marvelled at, why he also passeth over in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: ^h Cain also knew his wife, who conceived and bare Enoch, and he built a city, and called the name of the city after the name of his son Enoch. And to Enoch was born Iradd, and Iradd begat Mebujael, and Mebujael begat Methusael, and Methusael Lamech.

Now of Seth, Moses writeth far otherwise, and in this manner. ⁱ And Seth lived 105 years, and begat Enoch, and Seth lived after he begat Enoch 807 years, and begat sons and daughters: so as all the days of Seth were 912 years, and he died, as for the years and times of the wicked they were not numbered in libro viventium, saith Cyril. But in Seth was the church of God established, from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and work Moses walked in, and finished it with care, passing over the reprobate generation (as aforesaid.) Of the line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembreth but eight generations, reckoning Adam for one, and of the line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth:

These be the generations of Adam by Cain, which the scriptures mention: but Josephus giveth unto Lamech threescore and seventeen sons and daughters, by his two wives Ada, and Silla: and to these three sons of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the invention of pastorage, of musick, and the working in metal; for it seemeth that ^a Jubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were untamed, and brought them into herds and droves: ^a Tubal invented musick, and ^a Tubalcain the working in brasse and iron: the one being addicted to husbandry, the other was mechanical, the third given to idleness and pleasure. In whom began these three meaner degrees of shepherds, handy-crafts men, and musicians. And in the issues of Seth began the services of God, divinity, prophecy, and astronomy: the children of the one beheld the heavens, the other the earth.

SECT. IV.

Of the diversities in the ages of the patriarchs when they begat their children.

A Second scruple hath been made, how it came to pass that the patriarchs begat their children at so divers ages as Cainan or Kenan at seventy years, Mahaleel and Enoch at threescore and five years, whereas Jarad begat not any of his until he was 162 years old: Mathusalem begat at 187; Lamech at 182, and Noah at 500 years. Now this difference hath been the more enforced, because it cannot be conjectured, that either Jarad, Mathusalem, or Lamech abstained from marriage out of the religion of abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular sanctities, begat children before he was threescore and ten years old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the generations before the flood precisely, according to the first-begotten and eldest sons of the patriarchs; but he drew down the line of Noah from Seth, and afterwards from Noah to Abraham, by their true ancestors, were they elder or younger, as he found them: for it is likely that Enoch was not the eldest of Jarad, nor Lamech the first-born of Mathusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing known to the contrary, but that Noah might have had many sons before Shem, Ham, and Japhet, though these three were only named, and surviving, and which by God were reserved to be the fathers of mankind after the flood; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to be begotten by Kenan at threescore and ten years who was the first son of Kenan, and then reckon that Mathusalem begat Lamech in the 187th year of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses rejecteth all the other sons of Mathusalem but Lamech only, because he was the father of Noah as aforesaid. Of this St. Augustine hath somewhat else in his 20th and 21st chapters de civitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the generations of the first age, and so to Abraham, and the children of the promise after him; so doth St. Matthew recite the genealogy of Christ, not by the eldest sons, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first-born, who have hereby the prerogative in estates, worldly and transitory only; and therefore the ^b Evangelist nameth Isaac and not Ismael, tho' Ismael were first in time: so doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Esau the elder; neither is Christ derived from any of the three eldest patriarchs, Reuben, Simeon, or Levi, but from Juda a fourth brother, and so from David a younger son of Jessai; and lastly we find, that the kingdom it self of Juda was not given to the heir in nature, but to the heir of grace, namely ^c Solomon.

SECT. V.

Of the long lives of the patriarchs: and some of late memory.

THE third objection is, that the great difference of years between those of the first age, whereof some of them had well near seen a thousand years, makes it disputed, whether the account of times were of the same measure is in after-ages, seeing that soon after the flood men lived not a third part of that time, and in succeeding ages and to this day not the tenth.

^d They that have hereon resolved that those years were but Lunary years (to wit) of a month or thereabouts, or Egyptian years, are easily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enos in the year of his life one hundred and five, if those years be taken but for months, then had Seth lived but eight years and one month when he begat Enos: and if the time of Enos have the same allowance, when he begat Cainan, then could Enos at that time have been but six years and forty-eight weeks old; and so it may be gathered of the rest excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the trees in their kind, bearing fruit and seed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to give an ability of generation at six, seven or eight years, agreeth with the short lives of the pigmies, and not with the constitutions of our first fathers, who being descended from Adam, the workmanship of God's hands, and begotten and born in the strong youth of the world, had length of days and ability of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunary years, then there would follow this extremity, that those which lived longest, and upwards of nine hundred years, had by that account but the time of fourscore and ten and odd years; which were not only less by far than the patriarchs lived after the flood, but short of many mens lives in this decrepit age of the world, wherein many exceed fourscore, and some an hundred years. Further (if need be) to disprove this reckoning, whereas it is written, Gen. xxv. that Abraham died in a good age, an old man, and of great years: all which (if the former account were of Lunary years) makes but seventeen and an half of our years.

^a Gen. i. 2. 22. ^b Mat. i. 2. ^c 1 King. 2. ^d Solm. Pol. lib. 6. 3. ^e Microb. Saturn. l. 1. c. 8. Plin. l. 7. c. 48.

And if we seek for a cause of this long life in nature, then is it reasonable, that the first man, created in highest perfection, should also beget children of equal strength or little differing: for of the first and purest seed there must of necessity spring up the fairest and fruitfulest plants. Secondly, the earth it self was then much less corrupt, which yielded her increase, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any such mixture of harmful quality, as since that time the curse of God for the cruelty of man's heart brought on it and mankind: neither had the waters of the flood infused such an impurity, as thereby the natural and powerful operation of all plants, herbs, and fruits upon the earth received a qualification and harmful change. And as all things under the sun have one time of strength, and another of weakness, a youth and beauty, and then age and deformity: so time it self (under the deathful shade of whole wings all things decay and wither) hath wasted and worn out that lively virtue of nature in man, and beasts, and plants, yea the heavens themselves being of a most pure and cleansed matter shall wax old as a garment; and then much more the power generative in inferiour creatures, who by the ordinance of God receive operative virtue from the superiour.

But besides the old age of the world, how far doth our education and simplicity of living differ from that old time? the tender bringing up of children, first led and nourished with the milk of a strange dug; an unnatural curiosity having taught all women (but the begger) to find out nurses, which necessity only ought to commend unto them: the hasty marriages in tender years, wherein, nature being but yet green and growing, we rent from her, and replant her branches, while her self hath not yet any root sufficient to maintain her own top; and such half-ripe seeds (for the most part) in their growing up wither in the bud, and wax old even in their infancy. But above all things the exceeding luxuriousness of this gluttonous age, wherein we press nature with overweighty burdens, and finding her strength defective, we take the work out of her hands, and commit it to the artificial help of strong waters, hot spices, and provoking sauces; of which Lucan hath these elegant verses:

^b ——— O prodiga rerum

Luxuries, nunquam parvo contenta paratu:

Et quæstorum terra pelagoque ciborum

Ambitiosa fames, & lautæ gloria mensæ,

Discite quam parvo liceat producere vitam:

Et quantum natura petat.

Non auro myrrhaque bibunt: sed gurgite puro

Vita redit: satis est populis fluviusque coresque.

O wastful riot, never well content

With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious

Of cates by land and sea far fetcht and sent:

Vain glory of a table sumptuous,

Learn with how little life may be preserved.

In gold and myrrh they need not to carouse,

But with the brook the people's thirst is served:

Who fed with bread and water are not starved.

The Ægyptians affirm, that the longest time of man's life is an hundred years, because the heart in a perfect body waxeth and groweth to strength fifty years, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenos findeth in his philosophy, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty years, and Berosus to a hundred and seventeen years. These opinions Pliny repeateth and reproveth, producing many examples to the contrary. In the last taxation, number and review of the eighth region of Italy, there were found in the roll (saith Pliny) fifty-four persons of an hundred years of age: fifty-seven of an hundred and ten: two, of an hundred twenty-five: four, of an hundred and thirty: as many that were an hundred and thirty-five, or an hundred and thirty-seven years old: and last of all, three men of an hundred and forty: and this search was made in the times of Vespasian the father and the son.

The simple diet and temperate life of the Æffæans gave them long account of many years: so did it to the secretaries of Egyptian ceremonies, to the Perfian Magicians and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirm out of Homer, that Nestor lived three ages, and Tiresias six, Sybilla three hundred years, Endymion of the less Asia, little less: also Masinissa of Numidia lived very long, and Dando of Illyria. Among the kings of Arcadia many lived three hundred years (saith Ephorus) Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that some of them live full two hundred years: and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians: and that these reports are not fabulous, Josephus bringeth many witnesses with himself, as Marethon, Berosus, Mochus, Esius, Hieronymus Ægyptius, Hecateus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthony Fume, an historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the year 1570. there was an Indian presented to Solyman, general of the Turks army, who had out-lived three hundred years. I my self knew the old countess of Desmond of Inchiquin in Munster, who lived in the year 1589, and many years since, who was married in Edward the fourth's time, and held her jointure from all the earls of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the noblemen and gentlemen of Munster can witness. Strozzius Cicogna, out of Torquemada Maffæus, and the like authors, telleth of some that have not only far exceeded the term prescribed by Epigenes; but been repaired from the withered estate of decrepit age to fresh youth. But for length of life, if we note but the difference between the ability of men in those days wherein Galen the physician lived, it may easily prove unto us what reeds we are in respect of those cedars of the first age. For Galen did ordinarily let blood six pound weight, whereas we (for the most part) stop at six ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting constellations) which are the natural causes of a long and healthful life (to wit) strong parents, a pure and thin air, and temperate use of diet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldering stone, cannot stand long upright; on air we feed always and in every instant, and on meats but at times: and yet the heavy load of abundance, wherewith we oppress and overcharge nature, maketh her to sink unawares in the midway; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure air, and a temperate use of those things which nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

SECT. VI.

Of the patriarchs delivering their knowledge by tradition: and that Enoch writ before the flood.

A fourth scruple hath been made, how the certain knowledge of the creation came to Moses, seeing there was no story thereof written, and if any such had been, yet it is conceived, that all memory of antiquity perished in the universal flood.

But if we consider the curiosity and policy of elder ages, we shall find that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also covered and hid from the vulgar sort, as jewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreverent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoever was attained unto concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was not left to publick dispute, but delivered over by heart and tradition from wise men to posterity equally zealous, Ex animo in animum sine literis, medio intercedente verbo; From mind to mind without letters, by way of tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Esdra, Origen, and Hilarius (as Mirandula conceiveth) that Moses did not only upon the mount receive the law from God, but withal secretiorem & veram legis enarrationem, a more secret and true explanation of the law, which (saith he out of the same authors) he delivered by mouth to Joshua, and Joshua to the elders: for to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quam dare sanctum canibus, & inter porcos spargere margaritas, than to give holy things to dogs, and to cast pearls before swine. In succeeding times this understanding and wisdom began to be written in ciphers, and characters, and letters bearing the form of beasts, birds, and other creatures; and to be taught only to such, as served in their temples, and to their kings and priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Jews was an imitation: the invention of the other is inscribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely.

This Cabala importeth a law received by tradition and unwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptio in Latin, and a receiving in English. And this custom was also held by the Druids and Bards of our ancient Britons, and of later times by the Irish chroniclers called rymers. If then such as would seem wisest in the use of reason, will not acknowledge, that the story of the creation or beginning of all things was written by inspiration, the Holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then used) be delivered unto him by a more certain presumption, than any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had preserved and left to their successors: which their wise men (as they term them) did lay up and defend from the injury of the time and other hazards. For, leaving to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem lived together with Adam himself two hundred forty and three years, and Noah with Methusalem no less than five hundred years: and before Noah died Abraham was fifty and eight years old; from whence this knowledge, by an easy and ordinary way, might come to Israel, and so to Moses.

But besides this tradition, it is questionless, that the use of letters was found out in the very infancy of the world, proved by those prophecies written on pillars of stone and brick by Enoch: of which Josephus affirmeth, that one of them remained even in his time (meaning belike some ruin or foundation thereof) which pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these prophecies of Enoch St. Jude testifieth; and some part of his books (which contained the course of the stars, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia felix in the dominion of the queen Saba (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth that he had seen and read some whole pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the creation and story of the first age, seeing he might receive it both by tradition and letters, had not the spirit of God instructed ed and inspired him as he did: which also his many and strange miracles (performed before he wrote the scriptures) make more manifest.

Now for the books of Enoch, howsoever some men make question of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Gazeus, (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to prove them unwritten traditions, alledgeth that pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphal scriptures (which he rejecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembered out of them, the same was delivered by tradition from the Jews. But I rather think with Pererius that such a book there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the apostles, and many things added thereunto by hereticks, who took occasion upon the antiquity thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the devil about the body of Moses, to frame and add thereunto many inventions of their own. One of the greatest arguments against these books, is that neither Philo, nor Josephus (the most diligent searchers of antiquity) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of St. Augustine, Scriptisse quidem nonnulla divina Enoch illum septimum ab Adam negare non possumus; That Enoch the seventh from Adam did write divers divine things we cannot deny. Now his writings, which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquity, and of fables of giants supposed to be begotten of angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such book was found among those canonical scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew priests in Armario Judaico (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this might be preserved by Noah. Surely that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembered by Jude, no man can deny; how they were delivered to posterity I know not, whether by the Jews Cabala, or by what other means, the same is but man's conjecture. And (certainly) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the heavens, and of the natures and conjunctions of the stars; and afterwards to some of his sons, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had seen and might preserve this book. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly invented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath been said before. And therefore if letters and arts were known from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah lived with Methusalem, who lived with Adam, and Abraham lived with Noah: it is not strange (I say) to conceive how Moses came to the knowledge of the first age, be it by letters, or by Cabala and tradition, had the undoubted word of God need of any other proof than self-authority.

SECT. VII.

Of the men of renown before the flood.

NOW let us consider the relation of Moses, who named seven descents of Cain's children, and of Adam by Seth ten: Seth being given by God instead of Abel; and of Seth was Enoch begotten, in whose time men began to profess religion, and to offer sacrifice in publick. For altho' Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enoch, men began publickly to call on the name of the Lord, that is, they served and praised God by communion and in publick manner, or calling upon the name of the Lord, and thereby were the sons of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enos the son of Seth, to the time of Enoch the son of Jarad, there is nothing remembered by Moses, but their own births, the births of their sons, the length of their lives, and deaths. But of Enoch it is written, that he walked with God, and he was no more seen: for Good took him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a just and upright man, and that he feared, loved, and obey'd God. For the same phrase Moses useth of Noah. Noah was a just and upright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Seventy convert it, Enoch placuit Deo; Enoch pleased God. And altho' Aben-Ezra and others understand this place [tulit eum Deus] scilicet, mortuus est, God took him away (that is) he died, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phrase of the scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God took him away, when he died; yet the difference which Moses maketh between the piety of Enoch and the rest of the patriarchs, and by omitting the word [death] which he useth to all else, makes it manifest, that Enoch was not dissolved as the rest. For to all the rest of the patriarchs, Moses useth these words, and he died; but of Enoch he spake otherwise, saying only, he was missing, or he was not seen. Et non inveniebatur (saith the apostle to the Hebrews) quia Deus eum transtulit; And he was not found, for the Lord took him away. In the same place it is expressly added, that he saw not death.

But whether this taking away of Enoch were not with the same kind of changing, which St. Paul promisseth when he saith, that when the end shall come, we shall not all die, but all shall be changed, I leave it to the learned divines.

After Enoch, Moses passeth over to Methusalem and Lamech, remembring (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: saying that Lamech prophesied of his son Noah, saying, This same shall comfort us concerning our work, and sorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply, than of any of the rest of Adam's children by Seth, being the last of the ten generations of the first age, whom God (with his family) preserved, because he was an upright man in his time, and feared God.

But of the war, peace, government, and policy of these strong and mighty men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memory remaining, whose stories if they had been preserved, and what else was then performed in that newness of the world, there could nothing of more delight have been left to posterity. For the exceeding long lives of men (who to their strength of body and natural wits had the experience added of eight hundred and nine hundred years) how much of necessity must the same add of wisdom and undertakings? Likely it is, that their works excelled all whatsoever can be told of after-times, especially in respect of this old age of the world, when we no sooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to Hippocrates, Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus praeceps (which is) life is short, art is long, and time is headlong. And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses, These were mighty men, which in old time were men of renown. But these men of renown (whom the scripture afterwards calleth giants, both for strength of body and cruelty of mind) trusted so much to their own abilities, as they forgot altogether the piety of Seth, and the ways wherein Enoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were evil, only evil, and continually evil. And this wickedness was not only found in the issues of Cain, but it was then universal, when the children and sons of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and misled by their idolatrous wives, the daughters of Cain, or of those other men loving themselves and the world only.

That these sons of God were angels, which being taken with the beauty of women accompanied them and begat giants, some of the fathers supposed, namely, Lactantius and Eusebius misled by Josephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterwards changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many writers have taken great advantage, and have troubled themselves with large answers and very needful: the question being incapable of dispute, especially since St. Chrysostom and St. Augustine have answered it largely long ago. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of God's children, it doth every where appear in the scripture; and on the contrary, to think that angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) behold the face of God (that is) always attend his commandments, should, after a separation from the rest which fell with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrary both to nature and grace, were more than madness to imagine.

SECT. VIII.

That the giants, by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also divers in latter times.

OF these giants which Moses calleth mighty men, Goropius Becanus an Antwerpian (who thought his own wit more gigantical than the bodies of Nimrod and Hercules) hath written a large discourse, intituled Gigantomachia, and strained his brains to prove, that there were never any such men: his reasons (whosoever desires to lose time) he may find them in the treatises before named. It is true, that Cyrillus reproves the Grecian poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirm shamelessly, that the giants have in elder times not only cast up mountains upon mountains, but removed islands out of the sea, with like fooleries. And for that invention of casting up hills, and making war with the gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the story of Nimrod, as before remembred; and even out of this scripture, that the sons of God saw the daughters of men, of whom the first giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Hesiodus, that giants were the sons of the heaven and the earth; meaning by the heavens the sons of God, and by the earth the daughters of men: which verses of Orpheus are by John Cassian (who hath written a witty discourse of this subject) thus changed into Latin:

*Nomine caelestes illos dixere gigantes,
Orti quod terra fuerint & sanguine caeli.*

From the earth, and from thy blood, O heaven they came,

Whom thereupon the gods did giants name.

But what will not opiniators and self-believing men dispute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceive that there were in the first age such kind of men; and of which there have been in all times since? seeing the scriptures avow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

^a Gen. 5. 24. ^b Gen. 6. 9. ^c 1 Cor. 15. 51. ^d Gen. 5. 29. ^e Gen. 6. 9. ^f Aphor. 1. ^g Gen. 6. 4. ^h Gen. 6. 5.

And for that superlative straining of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of giants was given to oppressors and tyrants, and not to strength of body and eminent stature: such men might with better reason call them oppressors because they were giants, and therefore had ability to oppress, than say, that they were called giants only because oppressors. For first Moses himself calleth them mighty men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards, men of renown (that is) of great undertaking and adventurous action. And if the same stature of body, and ability had not been found among divers nations after the general flood, then might this place of Moses have more willingly bearkened to a dispute, and yielded to interpretation.

But besides all these famous giants found in prophane histories (which I will reserve to accompany the giants of Abion in the story of Britany) the scriptures do clearly and without all allegorical construction avow, that, besides Nimrod, there were found of these giants in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Joshua, and of David; namely, the Rephaims in Asteroth; the Zuzai or Zanzummims in Ham, and the Emims, which dwelt anciently in the land of Moab: whom Moses (for stature) compareth with the Anakims, which dwelt in Hebron; for they also were taken for giants as the Anakims: likewise where Moses speaketh of the land of Ammon, he useth these words, That also was taken for a land of giants, for giants dwell therein aforesimes: and whom the Ammonites call Zanzummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these giants called Rephaims in Asteroth and Kernaim, and the Zuzai or Zanzummims, Chedorlaomer King of Elam overthrew, assisted by other kings his associates. Also the prophet Amos found among the Ammonites men of giant-like stature, whom he compareth to the cedar, and whose strength to the oaks; and the prophet Baruch, These were the giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature, and so expert in war. Particularly it is written of Og, king of Basan, that his bed of iron was nine cubits long, and four cubits broad: for only Og king of Basan remained of the remnant of the giants, who commanded the kingdom of Basan, four hundred years after the expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreover those discoverers and searchers of the land of promise (sent by Moses from Cadesbarne in Paran) made report at their return of the great stature of those people in general, and especially of the sons of Anak, in these words. All the people which we saw in it are men of great stature: for there we saw giants, the sons of Anak which come of the giants, so that we seemed in our fights like grass-hoppers, and so we were in their fight (that is) the searchers found in their own judgments a marvellous difference between the Anakims and themselves: insomuch that the Israelites were so stricken with fear, as they rather fought and desired to return again into Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former slavery, than to fall by the strokes of those fearful nations. Furthermore the scriptures put us out of doubt, that Goliath the Philistine of Gath was a giant of six cubits and a span long: the armour which he wore weighed five thousand sheekles of brass: the shaft of his spear was like a weavers beam, and his spear-head weighed six hundred sheekles of iron. Also in Samuel there is mention of another Goliath surnamed Gethens, because he was of Gath: and of three other giants; of which the first was slain by Jehonathan, David's nephew, who had twelve fingers, and as many toes: a man of great stature, and his fingers were by fives, even four and twenty.

Also that Sampson was of surpassing strength no man doubteth, who tore a lion as it had been a kid, and after ^m slew thirty of the Philistines, and (after that) a thousand more of them with a jaw-bone of an ass; and lastly he took the ⁿ gates of Azzah, and the two posts, and lifted them away with the bars, and put them upon his shoulders, and carried them to the top of the mountain before Ebron. If then it be approved by every judgment, that both nature and the heavens wax old, and that the great age of time hath (with it self) infeebled and almost worn out the virtue of all things; then I say, that as in all other kinds the earth (before that sin had increased the curse and corruption) brought forth her young ones more strong and beautiful than it did in after-ages: so also those giants, those mighty men, and men of renown, as far exceeded the proportion, nature and strength of those giants remembered by Moses of his own time, and after him their successors, as the ordinary proportion of all men in general, soon after the flood and in times far off, exceeded the bulks and bodies of men which are now born in the withered quarter and winter of the world: If therefore giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the first flourishing youth and newness of the world.

But the wickedness (especially in cruelty and oppression) of these men was such, as God therefore by the flood gave end to all flesh, but to the just Noah and his family. ^o And God repented him that he had made man; which St. Augustine thus expoundeth: Neque enim sicut hominem, ita Deum facili sui poenitet, cujus est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia, quam certa praescientia. Sed si non utatur scriptura talibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiaris insinuat omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consultum: ut & perterreat superbientes, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quærentes, & alat intelligentes. God (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done (as men use to do:) but if the scripture did not use those words, or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it self familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrify the proud, stir up the negligent, exercise the searchers of truth, and nourish those that understand.

CHAP. VI.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the reliques of truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in fables and old legends.

SECT. I.

That in old corruptions we may find some signs of more ancient truth.

HERE before we proceed any further, the occasion offereth it self for us to consider, how the Greeks and other more ancient nations, by fabulous inventions, and by breaking into parts the story of the creation, and by delivering it over in a myssical sense, wrapping it up mixed with other their own trumpery, have sought to obscure the truth thereof; and have hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receive those intermix'd discourses of God and nature for the inventions of poets and philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stolen out of the books of God. But as a skilful and learned Chymist can as well by separation of visible elements draw helpful medicines out of poison, as poison of the most healthful herbs and plants (all things having in themselves both life and death) so, contrary to the purposes and hopes of the heathen, may those which seek after God and truth find out every where, and in all the ancient poets and philosophers, the story of the first age, with all the works and marvels thereof, amply and lively express'd.

SECT. II.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

BUT this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in angels, and afterwards in men (the one having erred but once, the other ever) as concerning mankind it took such effect, that thereby (the liberal grace of God being withdrawn) all the posterity of our first parents were afterwards born and bred in the world, suffering a perpetual eclipse of spiritual light. Hence it was that it produced plants of such imperfection and harmful quality, as the waters of the general flood could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Yea, even among the few sons of Noah there were found strong effects of the former poison. For as the children of Shem did inherit the virtues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the sons of Cham did possess the vices of the sons of Cain, and of those wicked giants of the first age. Whence the Chaldeans began soon after the flood to ascribe divine power and honour to the creature, which was only due to the Creator. First, they worshipped the sun, and then the fire. So the Egyptians and Phenicians did not only learn to leave the true God, but created twelve several gods, and divine powers, whom they worshipped; and unto whom they built altars and temples. For Herodotus saith, “Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Egyptios in usu habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis cepisse mutuatos, eosque prius aras, & imagines & templa Diis sibi crexisse.” The Egyptians (saith he) first devised the names of the twelve gods, which the Greeks received from them, who first erected unto themselves altars, images, and temples for the gods.

SECT. III.

That in process of time these lesser errors drew on greater: as appeareth in the gross superstitions of the Egyptians.

BUT as men once fallen away from undoubted truth, do then after wander for evermore in vices unknown, and daily travel towards their eternal perdition: so did these gross and blind idolaters every age after other descend lower and lower, and shrink and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby err in worshipping mortal men only, but they gave divine reverence, and had the same respect to beasts, birds, fishes, fowls, winds, earth, water, air, fire, to the morning, to the evening, to the plants, trees and roots, to passions and affections of the mind, to paleness, sickness, sorrows, yea to the most unworthy and basest of all these. Which barbarous blasphemy Rhodius Anaxandrides derideth in this manner.

*“Bovem colis, ego Deis mæsto bovem.
Tu maximum anguillam Deum putas: ego
Obsoniorum credidi suavissimum,
Carnes suillas tu caves, at gaudeo
Hijs maxime: canens colis, quem verbero
Edentem ubi deprehendo forte obsonium.”*

I sacrifice to God the beef, which you adore:
I broil the Egyptian eels, which you (as God) implore:
You fear to eat the flesh of swine, I find it sweet.
You worship dogs, to beat them I think meet,
When they my store devour.

And in this manner Juvenal.

*“Porrum aut caepe nefas violare aut frangere morsu:
O sanctas gentes, quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis Numina!”*

The Egyptians think it sin to root up, or to bite Their leeks or onions, which they serve with holy rite:

O happy nations, which of their own sowing
Have store of gods in every garden growing.

SECT. IV.

That from the reliques of ancient records among the Egyptians and others, the first idols and fables were invented: and that the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

BUT in so great a confusion of vanities, where among the heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of these inventions were borrowed, or after what ancient pattern they erected their building, were it not certain, that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first age, and of whatsoever was done therein; partly from some inscriptions upon stone or metal remaining after the flood; and partly from Mizraim the son of Cham, who had learnt the same of Cham, and Cham of his father Noah. For all that the Egyptians write of their ancient kings and date of times cannot be feigned. And tho' other nations after them had by imitation their Jupiters also, their Saturns, Vulcans, and Mercuries, with the rest which St. Augustine out of Varro; Eusebius out of many prophane histories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more have observed, to wit, the Phenicians, Phrygians, Cretans, Greeks, and other nations; yet was Cain the son of Adam (as some very learned men conceive) called and reputed for the first and ancient Jupiter; and Adam for the first Saturn: for Jupiter was said to have invented the founding of cities; and the first city of the world was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Enochii before remembered. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Higinius in his 275th chapter confirmeth. For besides that many cities were founded by divers men, Tamen primam latissimam a primo & antiquissimo Jove ædificatam; yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient Jupiter, seated in the east parts, or in India, according to that of Moses: “And Cain dwelt towards the east side of Eden, &c. where also the Enochii were found after the flood. And therefore was Jupiter by the Athenians called Polieus, a founder of cities, and Herceios, an incloser or strengthner of cities; (say ^a*Phornutus* and Pausanias;) and that to Jupiter Herceios there were in very many places altars and temples erected. And that there were cities built before the flood, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soon after mankind began to increase, they built many cities; which as his meaning he delivereth in plain terms, in his third book of laws: for he saith, that cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great flood.

This Jupiter of the Ethnicks was then the same Cain, the son of Adam, who marrying his own sister (as also Jupiter is said to have done) inhabited the east, where Stephanus de urbibus placeth the city Henochia. And besides this city of Henoch, Philo Judeus conceiveth that Cain built six others, as Maich, Jared, Tebe, Jesca, Selet and Gebat: but where Philo had this I know not. Now as Cain was the first Jupiter, and from whom also the Ethnicks had the invention of sacrifice: so were ^b*Jubal*, Tubal and Tubalcain (inventors of pastorage, smiths craft, and musick) the same, which were called by the ancient prophane writers ^c*Mercurius*, Vulcan and Apollo: and as there is a likelihood of name between Tubalcain and Vulcan; so doth Augustine expound the name of Noema or Naamah, the sister of Tubalcain, to signify Venuſta, or beautiful, voluptas, or pleasure: as the wife of Vulcan is said to be Venus, the lady of pleasure and beauty. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturn, Cain the eldest Jupiter, Eva, Rhea, and Noema or Naamah the first Venus: so did the fable of the dividing of the world between the three brethren the sons of Saturn arise, from the true story of the dividing of the earth between the three brethren the sons of Noah: so also was the fiction of those golden apples kept by a dragon taken from the serpent, which tempted Eva: so was Paradise it self transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the garden of the Hesperides: the prophecies, that Christ should break the serpent's head, and conquer the power of hell, occasioned the fables of Hercules killing the serpent of Hesperides, and descending into hell, and captivating Cerberus: so out of the taking up of Enoch by God was borrowed the conversion of their Heroes (the inventors of religion and such arts as the life of man had profit by) into stars and heavenly signs, and (withal) that leaving of the world, and ascension of Astrea; of which Ovid.

Astrea last of heavenly wights the earth did leave.

For altho' thereby the ^c*Ethnicks* would understand justice it self to have failed, as it is a virtue abstract, and may be considered without a person; yet as it is usual among the ancient poets to describe virtues and vices by the persons of men and women, as desire by Cupid, valour by Mars, beauty or lust by Venus, so do they also the persons of men by like virtues and vices; and therefore by justice and Astrea, Enoch: the justice and piety of Enoch being in the same manner exprest, as that of Noah was by Moses, for Noah was said to be a just man; ^d*And Noah walked with God*. And of Enoch it is written, ^e*that he walked with God, and he was no more seen: for God took him away*.

From this story also of the first age, and from that part where Moses remembreth the giants begotten by the sons of good men upon the daughters of the wicked (whom Moses calleth mighty men, and men of renown) did they steal those wondrous great acts of their ancient kings, and powerful giants and again their war undertaken against the Gods, from the building of the tower of Babel by the giant Nimrod, as ^f*St. Augustine* termeth him. Which war of their giants Cornelius Severus thus describeth:

*Tentavere (nefas) olim detrudere mundo Sydera, captivique Jovis transferre gigantes:
Imperium, & victo leges imponere caelo.*

The giants did advance their wicked hand
Against the stars, to thrust them headling down;
And robbing Jove of his impartial crown,
On conquered heavens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deep, nor by any conjunction of the stars, should bury them under the moisture of a second flood, but that by this building (if they had been herein victorious) they would have given the law to heaven it self. Also the making of leagues, peace and covenants among heathen nations and kings, confirmed by sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Aeneids hath a touch, was as it seemeth borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. Who, when he read the book of the covenant, sprinkled the people with blood.

^gWe find also many remembrances of Seth, the paternal ancestor of Enoch and Noah: for Amenophis, the same king of Egypt, which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the children of Israel (as of late some learned men, mistaking his time, supposed) called his son and successor Setho, of Seth, and of the same Seth (as many men of good judgment have granted) were the princes of Thrace called Seuthes, whereof there were many very famous. ^hBut herein was the memory of Seth most manifestly preserved, that the Egyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient parent, and of the first tradition, in honour of whom they called a principal province Setheica. ⁱWe also find in Bithynia the city of Sethia, and others of the same name elsewhere. And sure from the Egyptians did the Grecians borrow this kind of theology, tho' they scorned to acknowledge any antiquity preceding their own; and that they might not seem to learn elsewhere, they gave the same names to their own idols which the Egyptians did to theirs.

SECT. V.

Of the three chiefest Jupiters; and the strange story of the third.

BUT of all those armies of Jupiters remembred by the ancients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other writers have also done, who sought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Jupiter, the son of Aether and Dies, so called, because the one had reference to his celestial conditions (for Aether is as much as shining or pure fire) the other discovered his natural virtues, which days and times make more perfect, and are the witnesses of mens actions.

The second was said to be the son of Caelum or heaven, for the same former respect; and this Jupiter was an Arcadian, and king of Athens.

^a Phorn. l. de natura Deorum. Pausan. l. 4, 5, & 10. in Protag. l. 1. ^c Nat. Com. l. 2 c. 2. ^d Gen. 7. ^e Gen. 5. 22, 24. ^f Lib. de Civitate Dei ^g Joseph. l. 1. contra Appian ^h Plut. in Isid. ⁱ Strabo, l. 17.

The third, of whom all the Grecian fables were devised, was of Crete (now Candie) the son of Saturn and Ops. The name derived from the Latin is taken of Juvans Pater, from the Greek word Zeus, it signifieth life, but somewhat strained. Boccas in his genealogy of the Gods conceiveth, that his name was borrowed from Jupiter the planet; but whether that star had such a name, before the same was given to men, I know not. Jupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, adventurous, liberal, merciful, loving, and faithful (that is) giving these inclinations. And therefore those ancient kings beautified with these conditions, might be called there after Jupiter; but howsoever they were, or were not with those virtues enriched, yet, by imitation, all kings in the eldest times assumed those titles and surnames: great princes affecting as high titles of honour and reputation of the world (howsoever deserved) as the worthiest, that ever were, acquired by their well-deservings. Joves omnes reges vocarunt antiqui; The ancients called all kings Jupiters, as Tzetzes in his varia historia confirmeth: Reges olim Joves vocarunt omnes: In old time all nations called their kings Jupiters. But where this last and most remembred Jupiter was born it is uncertain. Some there are that make him of Crete: others, that he was but sent thither by his mother Ops or Opis, to be fostered and hidden from the fury of Titan his uncle: because it was conditioned between Saturn and Titan, that Saturn being a younger brother, and reigning (for his own life) by Titan's permission, he should put to death all his male children, lest the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their succession; which agreement because Saturn performed in his first born, it is feigned that Saturn devoured his own children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latin.

Haud sit pinguior, Crudis sepulchrum quod sit ipse filius.

Saturn to be the fatter is not known,
By being the grave and burial of his own.

This composition between Titan and Saturn, Sylla also witnesseth in these:

*Conceptis verbis; Titan jurare coegit
Saturnum, de se natum ne nutriat ullum,
Quo possint regnare senis post fata nepotes.*

Things thus agreed: Titan made Saturn swear,
No son to nourish; which by reigning might Usurp the right of Titan's lawful heir.

But Opis, the mother of Jupiter, being delivered at once both of Jupiter and Juno, conveyed Jupiter (first called Iysanias) into Crete, as she did afterwards his two brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where he was brought up in Gnossus, the chief city of that island, by Cressa the king, or by the Curetes, a people and nation thereof.

Others challenge him to be of Thebes, and a Theban: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Messena. The like contention is found among the Greeks touching his education and first fostering. Some affirm, that he was fed by honey-bees: in recompence whereof he changed their black coats and skins into yellow; a reward well fitting such a God: others, that he was nourished by bears: others, by goats: and of all these the idle Greeks have many pretty tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge, that Saturn had broken his faith, he set on him, and took him and his wife prisoners, whom Jupiter again rescued and delivered.

But lastly, the father and the son equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturn being the less powerful fled into Italy, and left his kingdoms in Greece to his son. And altho' this prince at the first purchased great honour, and for his many virtues the name of Jupiter was given him; yet, after he was once settled and became potent, he gave himself over wholly to palliardise and adultery, without all respect of honour, law, or religion. And it is reported by such, as do ascribe the actions of many to one Jupiter, that not therewith satisfied, he was afterwards known to offend in the sin of Sodom with Ganymedes and others; and did not only begin with incest, marrying his own sister Juno, but he ravished, betrayed, stole away, and took by strong hand all the beautiful women born in his time, within the limits of his own kingdoms, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greatest fame, Niobe, Laodemia and Alcmena the wife of Amphitryon, by whom he had Pelaeus, Sarpedon, Argus and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus, of whom the mountain Taygetus took name, with another son called Saxo, of whom Saxona: by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Leda, Castor and Pollux, Helen and Clytemnestra: by Danae Perseus: by Jordana Deucalion: by Charme (the daughter of Eubulus) Britomartis: by Protogenia he had Atblus the father of Eudymion; and by Io (the daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the founder of Memphis in Egypt: which Epaphus married Libya, of whom that country took name, for so the Greeks afterwards called Africa. He ravished Aegina, the daughter of Aisopus, and carried her into the island Oenopia or Oenotria, afterwards called Aegina, on whom he begat Aiacus: by Torhebia he had Archebius and Carbius: by Ora Colaxes: he had also Dardanus by Electra, who built Dardanium, afterwards Ilium and Troy. He begat the brothers Talici, on Tbalia, and on Garamantis Iliarhas. He had besides these (if they belie not their chief God) Phileus and Pilumnus, inventors of bakers craft, and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be father to all these, who were born in ages so far differing. And of these his several ravishments, betrayings, stealing away of mens wives, daughters and sons, buying of virgins, and the like, came in all those ancient fables of his transformations into showers of gold, eagles, bulls, birds, and beasts, and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Grecian forgeries. And yet did not the Greeks and Romans fear to entitle this monster, Optimus Maximus, tho' Cicero in his second book de natura deorum affirms, that he deserv'd nothing less: And in his oration pro domo sua reproacheth Clodius for his incest, by the name of Jupiter. His burial was in Crete (saith Lucian) Cretenses non solum natum apud se & sepultum Jovem testantur, sed etiam sepulchrum ejus ostendunt. The Cretans or Candians do not only avow that Jupiter was born and buried among them, but they shew his grave and sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth, for in his time there remained the monuments of his tomb in the mountain Jasius. This Callimachus in his hymns also witnesseth, but as offended thereat, saith thus:

The Cretans ever liars were, they care not what they say: [liv'st always.
For they a tomb have built for thee, O king, that ^a Diodorus Siculus tells by way of report from the Libyan fables, confirmed (as he saith) by some Greek writers, that the original of these gods was from the western parts of Africk. For there among the Atlantide reigned one Uranus (which signifieth heaven) called so for his great skill in Astrology, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a God after his death. He had by many wives, forty-five sons; but by his principal wife Titea he had seventeen sons and two daughters, all which were called after their mother's name Titanes. Of Titea likewise it is said, that she for her goodness was canonized as a goddess, being dead, and called the Earth, as her husband was stiled Heaven. But of all the children of Titea, her daughter Bastlea (which name founding as queen in Englisb, she is by the Latin translator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as far in virtue as in years, was by general consent of her brethren, and of the people, appointed to rule as queen after her father's death, being as yet a virgin. She took to husband her brother Hyperion, to whom she bare a son and a daughter, called Sun and Moon. The beauty and towardliness of these children moved her brethren to envy, and bred in them a fear of being excluded from the succession: wherefore they took the boy and drowned him in the river Eridanus, now called Po. The loss of this child caused his sister to break her own neck; and the loss of both her children made the mother to play many mad pranks, dancing with cymbals, after a wild fashion, in sight of all the people, before whom she is said to have vanished away. Ere she died, her son (as the fable hath it) signified unto her in a dream, that he and his sister by the providence of God should become immortal, that also the Sun and Moon should be called by their names, and that their death should be revenged upon their murderers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two planets, and withal held herself as a goddess, and termed her the great mother, which name they had formerly given to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren whilst they were young. Hyperion and his race being extinguished, the other sons of Uranus divided the kingdom. Of these Atlas and Saturn were chief. Atlas reigned over the countries lying about the mountains, which afterwards bare his name; a just and wise prince, deeply skilful in Astrology, and for invention of the sphere said to have supported heaven. He had many sons, but the principal of them, called Hesperus, being of his father's qualities and studies, was said to have been carried away by the wind, from the top of an high hill in the midst of his contemplations, and his name, in honour of him, imposed by the people upon the morning star. The seven daughters of Atlas were also said to have been excellent ladies, who accompanying such as came to be deified, or registred among the worthies, brought forth children, answerable in quality to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the seven stars called Pleiades took name. Saturn the brother of Atlas reigned in Sicilia, part of Africk and Italy. Jupiter, another of the sons of Uranus, reigned in Crete, who had ten sons which he called Curetes; he called that island after his wife's name Ida; in which isle he died, and was buried. But this Jupiter must not have been that great one, but uncle to the great Jupiter, if these fables of the Libyans were true. Saturn (as these Libyans tell the tale) was a great tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keep his people in subjection. His sister Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africk. Hammon loving others as well as his wife, or better, got a daughter, called Minerva, near to the river Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. He also begat on Amalthea a son called Bacchus, whom he caused secretly, for fear of his life, to be brought up at Nysa, an island in the river Triton, under the tuition of his daughter Minerva, and certain nymphs. To Amalthea he gave in reward a goodly country, that lay on the sea coast, bending in form of a horn, whence grew the tale of Amalthea's plentiful horn, famous among the poets. When Rhea heard this news, she fled from her husband to her brother Saturn, who not only entertained her as a sister, but took her to wife, and at her instigation made war upon Hammon, vanquished him by the assistance of the Titans, and made him fly into Crete. The Curetes, Jupiter's children before-mentioned, held the island at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Creta the king's daughter, whom he took to wife, and had with her (women as may seem being very gracious in those times) the kingdom. Bacchus was grown a proper young man, had found out the making of wine, the art of planting trees, and many things else commodious for mankind, before the flight of his mother-in-law. Now therefore hearing report of all that happened, and that Saturn was coming against him with the Titans; he levied an army, to which the Amazons, living not far from Nysa, added great forces, in love of Minerva who was entred into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerva the women, they set forward against Saturn, met him, overthrew him, and taking many of the Titans prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second expedition. In the second expedition he behaved himself so well, that he won the love of all the people by whom he passed; insomuch, that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturn's rigorous government, he was greatly strengthened, and the enemy as much enfeebled by daily revolts. Coming to the city of Hammon, he won a battle of Saturn, before the very walls. After which Saturn with his wife Rhea fled by night, setting the town on fire to despite Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entreated. Saturn had a young son by Rhea, called Jupiter. This child Bacchus took with him in a great expedition that he made into the east countries; and coming into Egypt, he left this Jupiter, being then a boy, governor of the country; but appointed unto him as an overseer, one Olympius, of whom Jupiter grew to be called Olympius. Whilst Bacchus travelled thro' all nations, as far as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titans had found out his father Hammon in Crete, and began to war upon him. But Bacchus returned out of India; with whom Jupiter from Egypt, and his sister Minerva, together with the rest that afterwards were held as gods, joining all their forces, went into Crete, overthrew the Titans, chased them, took, and slew them, and freed the world of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deify'd; and the great Jupiter the son of Saturn succeeding them, reigned lord alone over all the world, having none of the Titans left alive, nor any other to disturb him. Between this tale of the Libyan gods, and the Egyptian fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked images of some one true history. For the expeditions of Osiris, and of Bacchus; the wars of the giants in the one story, of the Titans in the other; the kingdom of Egypt given by Hercules Libycus to Orus, by Bacchus to Jupiter, the rattles of Isis, and the cymbals of Bastlea, with many petty circumstances, nearly enough resemble each other, howsoever not alike fitted to the right persons. Sanchoniatu choniato (as ^a Eusebius cites him) would have all these to be Phenicians, and is earnest in saying, that it is a true story, and no allegory. Yet he makes it seem the more allegorical, by giving to Uranus or heaven for daughters, Fate and Beauty, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, tho' Diodorus have enough. To the genealogy he adds Elius or the Sun, as father of Uranus; and among the children of Uranus, Japetus, Bætilus, and Dagon (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giving withal to Uranus the proper name of Terrenus or indigena, and of Illus to Saturn, but omitting Jupiter of Crete. The pedigree of them is this.

SECT. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some got, some affected the name of gods.

OF Jupiter Belus, the son of Saturnus Babylonius, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard (at least by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three by him remembered: for long after these times were the Greeks but salvages, if they seek no farther off for their gods.

But the Egyptians, even after the flood, began (somewhat before this Chaldean Jupiter) to intitle Cham, the parent of their own Mizraim, Jupiter Chammon, or Hammon. For the etymology of this word [Hammon] which the Greeks deduce ab arenis, from the sands, is ridiculous (saith ^b Peucer) neither yet is his own much better, who brings it from Hammatb, which signifieth heat: because the said temple of Jupiter Hammon was seated in Libya, where the air is exceeding hot and scorching. And as for the antiquity of the latter Jupiter (among the Greeks and Romans the most renowned) it is certain that he was born not long before the war of Troy, as by many of his sons is made manifest; namely, Castor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which lived in that age of Priamus, under whom, and with whom, Troy was destroyed.

Now seeing that mortal men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortal among the heathen; it was not to be wondred at, that Alexander Macedon, Tiberius, Nero, Caligula, and others sought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed monsters as the rest: For by what reason could the same deity be denied unto Laurentia and Flora, which was given to Venus? seeing they were as notorious and famous harlots as she was.

SECT. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient heathen had far better opinions of God.

BUT that ever Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, believed in any of these fooleries, it cannot be suspected, tho' some of them (over-busily) have mixed their own inventions with the scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiod in hell, where he feigned that they were perpetually stung and pinched with serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read over all the books of Moses, as by places stolen thence almost word for word, may appear; of which Justin Martyr remembreth many in that treatise converted by Mirandula. As for Plato, tho' he dissembled in some things, for fear of the inquisition of the Arcopagites, yet St. Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembred) Et mirifice iis delectatus est, quæ de uno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Justin Martyr. Now however Lactantius pleased to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledge from the Egyptians and the Chaldeans, neglecting the Jews and books of Moses: ^a Eusebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, find reason to believe the contrary, thinking that from thence he took the grounds of all by him written of God, or favouring of divinity: and the same opinion had St. Ambrose of Pythagoras.

But whether it were out of the same vanity, which possess'd all those learned philosophers and poets, that Plato also publish'd (not under the right authors names) those things which he had read in the scriptures; or fearing the severity of the ^b Arcopagites, and the example of his master Socrates, by them put to death by poison, I cannot judge. Justin Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to Plato's fear, whose words among many other of the same effect, are these, Plato Mosi mentionem facere, ob id, quod unum solumque Deum docuerat, sibi apud Athenienses tutum non putavit, veritus Arcopagum; Plato fearing the Arcopagites thought it not safe for him among the Athenians to make mention of Moses, that he taught that there is but one God. But for that divinity which he hath written in Timæo; Id ipsum de Deo differuit quod & Moses; He discoursed and taught the same of God (saith Justin Martyr) which Moses did. For where it pleased God by his angel to answer Moses, Ego sum existens (which is) ^d I am; and existens misit me ad vos, I am hath sent me unto you; herein did Plato (saith Justine Martyr) no otherwise differ than that Moses used the word [qui] and Plato the word [quod]. Moses enim qui existit (inquit,) Plato quod existit. For Moses saith, He who is; Plato, That which is. Now of God's incomprehensible nature, and of the difficulty either to conceive, or express the same, he giveth this testimony: Genitorem universitatis tam difficile est invenire, quam inventum impossibile digne profari; It is as hard to find out the Creator of the universal, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speak of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the majesty of God's nature, than this property by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus causa bonorum; malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good; but of any thing that is evil he is no cause at all; and again, Charitas Dei fuit causa factiōis mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The love of God was the cause of the world's creating, and the original of all things. Apuleius the Platonist, Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci exclusione, sed etiam naturæ dignitate: & nihil est Deo similis & gratius, quam vir animo perfecto bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not only by exclusion of place, but by the dignity of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God, than a man of a perfect heart: ⁸ Thales affirmed; that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient, quia nunquam esse cœpit, because he never had any beginning: Zeno, that God beheld even the thoughts of Men: Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be careful in the actions of their life, because God was every where present, and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses's story of the creation, than this opinion and description of the world's beginning in Euripides, scholar of Anaxagoras?

*Cælum terraque unius formæ fuit:
Sed cum fuissent abjuncta amplexu mutuo,
Emersit omnis in lucem res progenita,
Arbores, aves, feræ, quasque affert mare,
Genusque mortalium.*

Heaven and earth one form did bear:
But when disjoined once they were
From mutual embraces.
All things to light appeared then,
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still remaining races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: so we find the same excellent understanding in Orpheus, who every where expressed the infinite and sole power of one God, tho' he uses the name of Jupiter, thereby to avoid the envy and danger of the time; but that he could attribute those things to the sons of men and mortal creatures, which he doth to this Jupiter, there is no man who hath ever heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith Mirandula) quos Orpheus canit, non decipientium dæmonum, a quibus malum & non bonum provenit; sed naturalium virtutum divinarumque sunt nomina; The names of those gods whom Orpheus doth sing, are not of deceiving devils, from whom evil comes, and not goodness; but they are the names of natural and divine virtues. Yea, that he yet reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himself, this his instruction to Museus, and the hymn following teach us. Respicens vero ad divinum hunc sermonem ei diligenter animum adverte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascende viam, & solum aspice mundi regem. Unus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse vero in illis versatur, nec quisquam eum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truly lend Thy heart, that's reason's sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the world's sole king. First, he is simply one Begotten of himself, from whom is born alone
All else; in which he's still, nor could it ere befall
A mortal eye to see him once, yet he sees all.

And again the same author.

The first of all is God, and the same last is he.
 God is the head and midst, yea from him all things be.
 God is the base of earth, and of the starred sky.
 He is the male and female too, shall never die.
 The spirit of all is God, the sun, and moon, and what is higher.
 The king, th' original of all, of all the end.
 For close in holy breast he all did comprehend, Whence all to blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

Now besides these former testimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Grecians, and other nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions, and leave the reader to those large and learned collections of Justin Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Eusebius, Engubinus, Peucer, Plessis, Daneus, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, describ'd him by these attributes and properties, Bonus, iustus, sanctus, seipsum possidens, utilis, speciosus, optimus, severus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, gloriosus, charitas, &c. Good, just, holy, possessing himself, profitable, beautiful, best, severe, free, always doing good, safe without fear, glorious, and self-charity. Epicharmus affirm'd, that God who beheld all things, and pierced every nature, was only and every where powerful: agreeing with Democritus. Rex omnium ipse solus; He is the only King of all kings; and with Pindarus the poet, Deus unus, Pater, Creator summus, atque optimus Artifex, qui progressus singulis diversos secundum merita præbet; One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best Artificer, who giveth to every thing divers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith Antisthenes) cannot be resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere known; Nisi in patria illa perenni, cujus imaginem nullam habes; Save only in that everlasting country, whose image thou hast none at all. Hereof also Xenophanes Colophonius, Unus Deus inter Deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus similis; There is one God among Gods and men most powerful, neither corporally, nor mentally like unto mortals: and Xenophon, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potensque, quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsi soli, qui luce sua omnia perlustrat; God who shaketh all things, and setteth all thing at rest, is great and mighty, as is manifest to all: but of what form he is, it is manifest to none, save only to himself, who illuminateth all things with his own light. Finally, Plato saith, Totius rerum naturæ Causa, & Ratio, & Origo Deus, summus animi Genitor, æternus animantium Sospitator, assiduus mundi sui Opifex, sine propagatione Genitor, neque loco neque tempore ullo comprehensus; eoque paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the Cause, Ground, and Original of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soul, the eternal Preserver of living creatures, the continual Framer of his world, a Beggetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceive him in thought, none can express what he is. Therefore was it said by St. Jerome, "Si enim cunctos philosophorum revolvās libros, necesse est ut in eis reperias aliquam partem vasorum Dei, ut apud Platonem, Fabricatorem mundi, Deum: apud Zenonem Stoicorum principem, inferos & immortales animas, &c." If thou consider all the books of the philosophers, thou canst not but find in them some part of the vessels of God, as in Plato, God the Creator of the world: in Zeno prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal souls. And this is certain, that if we look into the wisdom of all ages, we shall find, that there never was man of solid understanding or excellent judgment; never any man whose mind the art of education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterwards blinded; whose apprehensions are sober, and by a pensive inspection advis'd; but that he hath found by an irresistible necessity, one true God, and everlasting Being, all for ever causing, and all for ever sustaining; which no man among the heathen hath with more reverence acknowledged, or more learnedly express'd, than that Egyptian Hermes, howsoever it failed afterwards in his posterity: all being at length by devilish policy of the Egyptian priests purposely obscur'd; who invented new Gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the devil persuaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keep in awe and order their common people.

That Heathenism and Judaism, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

BUT all these are again vanished: for the inventions of mortal men are no less mortal than themselves. The fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a God, is crept into every man's chimney, which the lack of fuel starveth, water quencheth, and want of air suffocateth: Jupiter is no more vexed with Juno's jealousies; death hath persuaded him to chastity, and her to patience; and that time which hath devoured it self, hath also eaten up both the bodies and images of him and his: yea, their stately temples of stone and dureful marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found upon the earth; nor any monument of that glorious temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phenicia, that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Libya, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can ask counsel or help from Jupiter. The great God Pan hath broken his pipes; Apollo's priests are become speechless; and the trade of riddles in oracles, with the devil's telling mens fortunes therein, is taken up by counterfeit Egyptians, and cozening astrologers.

But it was long ere the devil gave way to these his overthrows and dishonours: for after the temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chief mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enrich'd, repair'd, and re-edified again, till by the hand of God himself it received the last and utter subversion. For it was first robbed of all the idols and ornaments therein by the Eubean pirates; secondly, By the Phlegians utterly sack'd: thirdly, By Pyræus the son of Achilles: fourthly, By the army of Xerxes: fifthly, By the captains of the Phoenices: sixthly, By Nero, who carried thence five hundred brazen images: all which were new made, and therein again set up at the common charge. But whatsoever was gathered between the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian army made spoil of, defacing as much as the time permitted them; notwithstanding all this it was again gloriously rebuilt, and so remain'd till such time as Julian the Apostate sent thither to know the success of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was utterly burnt and consumed with fire from heaven; and the image of Apollo himself, and all the rest of the idols therein molten down and lost in the earth.

The like success had the Jews in the same Julian's time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem: for while they were busied to lay the foundations, their buildings were overthrown by an earthquake, and many thousands of the Jews were overwhelmed with the ruins, and others slain, and scattered by tempest and thunder: though ^a Am. Marcellinus reports it more favourably for the Jews, ascribing this to the nature of that element. For, saith he, Allypius and the ruler of the province of Judea, being by Julian busied in the re-edifying of this temple, flaming balls of fire issuing near the foundation, and oft consuming the workmen, made the enterprize frustrate.

SECT. IX.

Of the last refuges of the devil to maintain his kingdom.

NOW the devil, because he cannot play upon the open stage of this world (as in those days) and being still as industrious as ever, finds it more for his advantage to creep into the minds of men; and inhabiting in the temples of their hearts, works them to a more effectual adoration of himself than ever. For whereas he first taught them to sacrifice to monsters, to dead stones cut into faces of beasts, birds, and other mix'd natures; he now sets before them the high and shining idol of glory, the all-commanding image of bright gold. He tells them that truth is the goddess of dangers and oppressions; that chastity is the enemy of nature: and lastly, that as all virtue (in general) is without taste: so pleasure satisfieth and delighteth every sense: for true wisdom (saith he) is exercised in nothing else, than in the obtaining of power to oppress, and of riches to maintain plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-politician find in his pupils any remorse, any feeling or fear of God's future judgment, he persuades them that God hath so great need of mens souls, that he will accept them at any time, and upon any conditions: interrupting by his vigilant endeavours all offer of timely return towards God, by laying those great blocks of rugged poverty, and despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his Divine Presence. But as the mind of man hath two ports, the one always frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and overgrown with grass, by which enter our charitable thoughts and divine contemplations: so hath that of death a double and twofold opening: worldly misery passing by the one, worldly prosperity by the other: at the entrance of the one we find our sufferings and patience to attend us: (all which have gone before us to prepare our joys) at the other our cruelties, covetousness, licentiousness, injustice, and oppressions (the harbingers of most fearful and terrible sorrow) slaying for us. And as the devil, our most industrious enemy was ever most diligent: so he is now more laborious than ever: the long day of mankind drawing fast towards an evening, and the world's tragedy and time near at an end.

CHAP. VII.

Of NOAH's flood.

SECT. I.

Of God's fore-warning: and some human testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noah's flood.

OF this destruction it pleased God to give warning unto Noah: who (saith ^b Josephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Scedens cum suis, in aliam regionem migravit; He departed with his children, and travelled into another region. And of these giants, from whom Noah withdrew himself, Berosus writeth in this manner: That they exceeded in all sorts of inhuman and unnatural wickedness, and that they were contemptores & religionis & Deorum; Contemners of religion and of the Gods: among which mighty men (saith Berosus) Unus erat qui Deorum venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. huic nomen erat Noah; There was one more wise and reverencing the Gods than the rest, whose name was Noah: who with his three sons Sem, Japhet and Cham, and with their wives, and the wife of Noah (namely Titea the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla) preserved themselves in the ark. This ark God commanded Noah to prepare: And God said unto Noah, make thee an ark of pine-trees: thou shalt make cabins in the ark, and shalt pitch it within, and without, with pitch. For God made ^d Noah to know that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graves of the rebellious and cruel generations were already fashion'd in the clouds, which soon after should swallow up and cover all living creatures, which breathed in the air: Noah and his family excepted.

But this universal grave of waters, and general deluge, hath not been received by all: for divine testimonies do not persuade all natural men to those things, to which their own reason cannot reach: Dum obvoluta in obscuro veritas latet; Whilst the truth lieth wrapp'd up in obscurity. Many there are who have disputed against the universality of this overflowing, and have judged that this flood of Noah fell but in some particular places and kingdoms: moved so to think, because in elder ages there have been many other floods (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicolaus Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by Josephus, Esl super Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes sermo est diluvii tempore liberatos, & quendam simul in arca devectum in hujus vertice hæsisse, lignorumque reliquias multo tempore conservatas, qui fortasse is fuit, de quo etiam Moses Judeorum legislator scribit: thus far this author. There is (saith he) above Minyada (or the country of Minya) an exceeding high mountain in Armenia, called Baris; on which it is reported, that many having fled thither, were saved in the time of the deluge: and that one was carried in an ark, and rested upon the top of the mountain, whereon there remained a long time after certain pieces thereof; and this might be the same, of which Moses the law-giver of the Jews maketh mention. And of this opinion were the Thalmudists (saith Annius) that many giants saved themselves upon mount Sion.

But Berosus (who after Moses was one of the most ancient, howsoever he have been since deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the general flood, taking from thence the beginning of his history in these words: Ante aquarum cladem famosam, qua universus periit orbis, &c. Before that famous destruction of waters, by which the world universal perished: witnessing withal, that Noah, with his wife Titaa, and his three sons, with their wives (in all eight persons) were only saved.

S E C T. II.

Of the flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noah's flood.

BUT from the vanity of the Greeks, the corrupters of all truth (saith Lactantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their antiquity, came the error first of all: who therein flattering themselves also, sought to persuade the world, that there was no flood preceded the flood of Ogyges, king of the Thebans in Bæotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore saith Rhodoginus, ^a Ogygium id appellant poetæ tanquam pervetus dixeris, ab Ogyge vetustissimo; The poets gave the name of Ogygia to things exceeding ancient, as of Ogyges the most ancient.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest, that he lived but in Jacob's time (tho' ^b Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses's time) and was born 67 years after him.

There is also an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he far later) as Rhodoginus in the ninth book of his antiquities remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Ægypto regnasse autument hunc; unde fit Cadmus qui in Græciam profectus Thebas condidit, à bove jugulato sic nuncupatus; quoniam Syrorum lingua bos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith he) who think that this Ogyges did reign in Egypt, whereby he should be Cadmus, who travelling into Greece built Thebes, so named of a beef slain: because in the Syrian language a beef is called Thebe.

But this flood of Ogyges fell in the year of the world 3440, according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the flood of Noah in the year 2242, after the same account; and so there came 1200 years between these floods, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronology. Now although the very year and time of this overflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set down, but that there is a great difference among writers, yet whosoever makes it most ancient, finds above 500 years difference between that and the general flood.

For ^c Paulus Orosius affirms, that this tempest fell upon the Athenians but 1040 years before Rome was built. Bucholzerus saith it was 1043 elder than Rome; which was founded (according to the same Bucholzerus) in the world's year 3219, tho' alter the account which I follow (and whereof I will give my reasons in the story of Abraham) it was built in the world's year 3280. Now the general flood preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzerus) 1563 years: and the flood of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easy calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference between these two floods must be 520 years, to which we (allowing 60 more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah Ogyges prius, ^d as some do) it appears by this, that the flood of Ogyges then king of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it self any farther than the banks of Archipelago, or Ægean sea. For whereas ^e Mela, Pliny, and Solinus witness, that the city of Joppe in Judea was founded before the flood; and that (notwithstanding the weight of waters) their remained on certain altars of stone the title of the king, and of his brother Phineus, with many of the grounds of their religion: sure, it is no where found among prophane historians, nor in the scriptures, that ever the flood of Ogyges spread it self over any part of Syria, much less over all the earth. But that it drown'd both the regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were swallowed up (cities seated on the north part of Peloponnesus) of which Ovid.

Bura and Helice on Achaian ground
Are sought in vain, but under sea are found.

Of this flood of Ogyges was invented the fable of ^g Apollo and Diana. For Latona, the daughter of Cæus, the son of Titan, being beloved and forced by Jupiter, and by him gotten with child, Juno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the earth to be delivered on; and withal caused the monstrous serpent Python to follow and affright her, wheresoever she travelled, till at length arriving at the isle of Ortygia she was there received: in which she was delivered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being twins; whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the deluge (which happened in Ogyges's reign) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mix'd) there were exhaled such thick mists and fogs, that in Attica, and along the coasts of the Ægean sea, neither the beams of the sun by day, nor of the moon by night, could pierce the air, or be perceived by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the earth being dried, and these vapours dissipated) the air began to be clear, the people of ^h Ortygia espied the light of the moon somewhat before day, and in the same morning the sun also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the moon, and Apollo the sun) they were reported to be born in the isle of Ortygia thereof afterwards called Delos, which signifieth manifestation.

And surely it is not improbable, that the flood of Ogyges, being so great as histories have reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the air sensibly discerned in those parts, and some unusual face of the skies. Varro in his books De gente populi Romani (as he is cited by ⁱ St. Augustine) reporteth out of Castor, that so great a miracle happened in the star of Venus, as never was seen before, nor in after-times: for the colour, the greatness, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out as Adraffus Cyzicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians, affirmed, in the time of Ogyges.

Now concerning the course of that or any planet, I do not remember, that I have any where read of so good astrologers flourishing among the Greeks, or elsewhere, in those days, as were likely to make any calculation of the revolutions of the planets so exact, that it should need no reformation. Of the colour and magnitude. I see no reason why the difference found in the star of Venus should be held miraculous; considering that lesser mists and fogs, than those which covered Greece with so long darkness, do familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the sun and moon. That the figure should vary, questionless it was very strange : yet I cannot hold it any prodigy ; for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the sun beholds, being enlightened by him, the opposite half should remain shadowed ; whereby that planet would, unto our eyes, descrying only that part whereon the light falleth, appear to be horned, as the moon doth seem ; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

Galileus, a worthy Astrologer now living, who by the help of perspective glasses hath found in the stars many things unknown to the ancients, affirmeth so much to have been discovered in Venus by his late observations. Whether some watery disposition of the air might present as much to them that lived with Ogyges, as Galileus hath seen thro' his instrument ; I cannot tell : sure I am, that the discovery of a truth formerly unknown, doth rather convince man of ignorance, than nature of error. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular flood of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of St. Augustine) accompanied with such unusual (and therefore the more dreadful, tho' natural) signs testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation ; whereas the flood of Noah, which was general and altogether miraculous, may seem to have had no other token, or foreshewing, than the long preaching of Noah himself, which was not regarded : * for they were eating and drinking, when the flood came suddenly, and took them all away.

SECT. III.

Of Deucalion's flood : and that this was not Noah's flood : nor the Umbri in Italy a remnant of any universal flood.

A Second flood of great fame, and of which the time is more certain, was that of Deucalion in Theffalia, of which St. Augustine out of Varro. His temporibus (ut Varro scribit) regnante Atheniensibus Cranao, successore Cecropis (ut autem nostri, Eusebius & Hieronymus) adhuc eodem Cecrope permanente, Diluvium fuit, quod appellatum est Deucalionis ; (that is) In these times (as Varro reporteth) Cranaus the successor of Cecrops governing the Athenians, or (as our Eusebius and Jerome say) Cecrops yet living, that flood (called Deucalion's) happened.

And in the beginning of the 11th chapter of the same 18th book, he useth these words. Eduxit ergo Moses ex Aegypto populum Dei novissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensium regis, cum apud Assyrios regnaret Ascatades, apud Sicyonios Marathus, apud Argivos Triopas. Moses led the people of God out of Egypt about the latter times of Cecrops king of the Athenians, Ascatades reigning over the Assyrians, over the Sicyonians Marathus, and over the Argives Triopas : so as leaving the curiosity of a few years, more or less, it appeareth, that this flood of Deucalion was either at the egression of the children of Israel out of Egypt, or near it : and then after Noah 753 years, according to Functius, who makes Cecrops to live in the year of the world 2409, or if we follow Mercator, then 739 years after Noah, and in the year of the world 2395. But if Deucalion were born in the age of the world 2356, according to Codoman ; then giving unto Deucalion 40 years of age when this flood happen'd, it falleth within one year of Mercator's account. But Deucalion by all approved historians is said to have been 82 years old at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this flood of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaëton's time, by the reign of Crotopus king of the Argives ; but Crotopus lived king of the Argives 6 years after Israel departed Egypt, which makes 20 years difference according to Functius, who will have this flood and burning to have fallen 14 years before Moses left Egypt : for he gave of the world's years to the flood and burning the year 2440, and to Moses's egression the year 2454. And yet ^b Cedrenus thinks that Moses was more ancient, and lived with Inachus ; but that cannot be true : for then had the flood of Deucalion, and the burning of Phaëton, preceded the flood of Ogyges, which is deny'd by all : for that of Theffaly (called Deucalion's) follow'd that of Attica (called Ogygia) at least 250 years, or thereabouts. Eusebius, in his Chronology, makes it 230 years, and so doth P. Orosius : Eusebius about the 50th year of Moses's life, and Cyrillus about the 67th, and both after Noah's flood 770 years : for these be Clemens Alexandrinus's words : Fuit autem in Grecia tempore quidem Phoronei, qui fuit post Inachum, inundatio quæ fuit tempore Ogygis ; There happened in Greece in the time of Phoroneus, who lived after Inachus the flood of Ogyges. Now if the flood of Ogyges in Attica were 1020 or 1016 years before the first Olympiad, according to Eusebius and Orosius (as before) then is it manifest, that taking 763 out of this number of 1020, it falls out that Ogyges's flood happened before the Hebrews left Egypt 250 years, or 260 years, according to the difference between the opinions of ^d Eusebius and Orosius. And for my self (who rather follow those Chronologers, which give 60 years more to Abraham after the flood, than the rest) I reckon the times which come between these floods in this sort. The general flood was in the year of the world 1656. Jacob was born in the year of the world 2169, so as from the beginning of the flood to Jacob's birth, there were consum'd 513 years. Ogyges's flood happened 100 years after Jacob was born ; and therefore after the general flood 613 years. Now Deucalion was born in the year of the world 2356, and had lived 82 years, when his kingdom of Theffaly was overwhelmed (which added to 2356, make 2438) his flood was after Noah's flood ended 782 years. And hereto Annius's Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700 years between the general flood and Deucalion's birth ; to which add 82 years of his age (as before) and then the flood of Theffaly followed the general 782 years. The words of that Xenophon are these : Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum Deucalionis, secundo anno Sphæri, septingenti supputantur anni, qui natus annos duos & octoginta Theffaliam vidit inundatam : From the drowning of the world to the birth of Deucalion, in the second year of Sphærus are numbred 700 years, and when Deucalion was 82 years old, he saw Theffalia drowned. This flood happened in the winter time about Parnassus : witness Aristotle in the first of his Meteors. And Varro (whom St. Augustine so often citeth for his excellent learning, especially in antiquities) findeth this flood of Deucalion to have happened in the time of Cranaus, who succeeded Cecrops : Orosius thinks it somewhat later, Amphitryon reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops. Only this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not only over Theffaly it self, and the regions adjoining westward ; but it covered the greatest part of Italy : and either the same, or some other particular flood then happening oppress'd Egypt, saith Eusebius. And therefore did the Greeks either think it, or feign it to be universal; and Deucalion, then king, saving himself and some others on the mountain of Theffaly (of all other the highest, saith ^a Solinus) was by reason thereof (as ^a Strabo witnesseth) said to be the preserver of mankind. That this flood covered a great part of Italy, ^a Pliny and Solinus make it probable: who affirm that the people then inhabiting Italy were therefore called ὀμβροί, quia ab imbris diluvii superfuissent; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first book, and Trezenius in his second: which Umbri these authors make the parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Bruttii, and all others inhabiting anciently the banks of the Mediterranean sea. But that these Umbri were not the inhabitants of Italy before the flood of Noah, and so took name by saving themselves upon the Apennine mountains, the scriptures teach us: shewing who, and who only, then were preserved, which is sufficient. ^b Report hath adventured further, telling us that the first people, which after the general flood inhabited Italy, were the Camefenes (so named from Camefe, whom Cato in originibus, another of Annius's authors, names for a consort of Janus) which people lived altogether a savage life; till such time as Saturn arriving on those coasts, devised laws to govern them by; the memory of whose acts in that region Diodore and Thallus among the Greeks, Nepos, Cassius and Varro among the Latins have preserved; and of whom Virgil;

Arma Jovis fugiens, & regnis exul adeptis.
Is genus indocile, ac dispersum montibus altis
Composuit, legesque dedit, Latiumque vocari Maluit.*

Saturn descended from the heavens high,
Fearing the arms of Jupiter his son,
His kingdom lost, and banish'd thence doth fly.
Rude people on the mountain tops he won
To live together, and by laws: which done,
He chose to call it Latium.

And afterwards in the verses following he speaketh of the Aufones, and after them of the Sicani: nations, which again sought to displant the ancient inhabitants:

Tum manus Aufonia, & gentes venire Sicani.

Then came th' Aufonian bands, and the Sicanian tribes.

Of these Sicani (which left Spain and sat down in Italy) ^c Thucydides and Pliny give testimony: who were again expelled by the Ligii, saith Thucydides. After all these plantations and replantations came the Umbri, descended of the Gauls (saith ^d Annius) not of those Gauls of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italy, even all Hetruria and Campania, as ^e Herodotus, Pliny, and Dionysius, have assured us; and therefore this flood of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all those nations were planted in Italy, and dispossest'd of Italy again, before the Umbri were ever heard of, or had being. So that kingdom was first called Camefene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Aufonia, then Sicania, before the Umbri (in whose time Deucalion's flood happened) possess'd the same, about 306 years before the war of Troy: Lycæon then governing Arcadia; who being the father of twenty-two sons, the youngest, called ^h Oenotrius, invaded Italy, who gave it the name of Oenotria. This name it held until Italus of the same nation chang'd it into Italy, after his own name, about ⁱ 250 years before the fall of Troy. After these came the Pelasgi, of whom Pliny in his 3d book and 5th chapter; and Strabo in his 5th; Thucydides in his 6th speaks at large: and after them the Lydi under Tyrrhenus their captain, that gave name to the Tyrrheni; who casting thence the Umbri, took from them three hundred castles, and built therein twelve cities; to which (after they had possess'd and pass'd over the Apennine mountains) they added divers others, whereof Telsina (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not anciently such a nation, as these Umbri, in those parts, I do not affirm: having respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinks, that the name was derived from the Greek word Ombros; but that these Umbri of Italy were descended of the nation of Scythians (called Galli) it shall be shewed hereafter.

SECT. IV.

Of some other records testifying the universal flood: and of two ancient deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

ST. Augustine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greeks and Latins made not any mention of the universal flood, because they had nothing of antiquity foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus before remembred) were all things among the Greeks (which antiquity had worn out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in English commonly call worm-eaten, or of defaced date. But as all the parts of the earth were successively planted and peopled; and as all nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did every family which afterward became a great people, with whom the knowledge of divine letters was not received, find no parent of more antiquity, than such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their own; and as the Grecians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigenæ, and growing out of the earth, or invent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certain knowledge of Noah's flood, as Berofus witnesseth; and Nicolas Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) tho' he also affirm by hearsay, that some giants saved themselves upon the mountains Baris in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authority approved: using the word sermo est, that such a speech there was. And ^k Eusebius remembreth a place out of the ancient historian Abydenus: who writeth that Siffithrus, to preserve himself from a flood foretold him by Saturnus, fled to the hills of Armenia by ship, ad Armeniam navigio confugiebat: who the third day (after the waters were fallen) sent forth birds, that finding no land to rest on, returned again; which he also did a second time, but at the third return the birds feet were covered with mud and slime. To this effect are Eusebius's words out of Abydenus, which may seem a true description (tho' in other terms) of Noah's flood.

Cyrellus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this general flood. And Plato in Timæo produceth an Egyptian priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy books of Egypt, the story of the flood universal, which (saith he) happened long before the Grecian inundations. Prior Annius's Xenophon remembreth a flood, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient than that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the general flood for the first, which happened (saith he) under the old Ogyges, sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah; he calleth the second Niliaca: Hercules and Prometheus then living 44 years before that of Attica, in the 34th year of Belochus king of the Affyrians, tho' I do not believe him as touching the time. But this flood covered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all that region subject to Prometheus; and hereof came the fable of the Vulture on Prometheus's liver, afterward slain by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus delivereth in these words: Fluvium propter cursus velocitatem profunditatemque aquarum Aquilam tunc appellatum, Herculem cum consilii magnitudine, tum virtute, volunt e vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum convertisse: unde & Græci quidam poetæ rem gestam in fabulam vertentes, Herculem tradunt aquilam Promethei jecur depascens occidisse. This flood (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftness of his course, as also for the depth, was in those days called the Eagle: but Hercules by his great judgment and virtue did again compress and strengthen this river, so far extended and overspread, turning it into the old channels: whence certain Greek poets (converting this labour and work of Hercules into a fable) devised that Hercules slew the eagle, which fed on Prometheus's liver; meaning, that he delivered Prometheus of that sorrow and torment, which for the loss of his people and country (by the waters destroy'd and cover'd over) he suffered.

A fourth flood chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiveth out of his Xenophon, who in this brief sort writeth of all these inundations; Inundationes plures fuere: prima novimestris inundatio terrarum sub prisco Ogyge: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many inundations (saith the same Xenophon) the first which was universal of nine months, and this happened under the first Ogyges: the second was Niliaca, and of one month's continuance in the time of Hercules and Prometheus, Egyptians: a third of two months under Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three months in Theffalia under Deucalion; and a fifth of the like continuance (called Pharonica) under Proteus of Egypt, about the time of Helen's rape. Diodorus in his 5th book and 11th chapter, taking the Samothraces for his authors, remembreth a flood in Asia the less, and elsewhere, of no less destruction than any of the other particular inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion: the sea of Pontus and Hellefpont breaking in over the land.

But there have been many floods in divers times and ages, not inferiour to any of these two last remembred, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the year of our redemption 590, when, in October of the same year, Gregory then being bishop of Rome, there happened a marvellous overflowing in Italy, and especially in the Venetian territory, and in Liguria, accompanied with a most fearful storm of thunder and lightning: after which followed the great plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead serpents cast up and left upon the land, after the waters decreased and returned. And in the year 1446, there perished 10000 people by the breaking in of the sea at Dordrecht in Holland: of which kind I take that flood to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that, and the year 1283, Tritheimius speaketh of an earthquake which swallowed many thousands: and after that of a flood in Friesland, in which there perished 100000 persons. Strozius Sigog. in his Magia omnifaria, telleth of an inundation in Italy, in the time of pope Damasus, in which also many cities of Sicily were swallowed: another in the papacy of Alexander the sixth: also in the year 1515, Maximilian being emperor. He also remembreth a perilous overflowing in Polonia, about Cracovia, by which many people perished. Likewise Viginier, a French historian speaketh of a great flood in the south part of Languedoc, which fell in the year of our Lord 1557, with so dreadful a tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the world and judgment day; saying, that by the violent descent of the waters from the mountains, about Nismes, there were removed divers old heaps and mountures of ground, and many other places torn up and rent: by which accident there was found both coin of silver and gold, divers pieces of plate, and vessels of other metal, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Goths invaded that province, in the year 1156.

SECT. V.

That the flood of Noah was supernatural, tho' some say it might have been foreseen by the stars.

NOW howsoever all these floods and many others, which have covered at several times several regions, not only in these parts of the world, but in America also (as I have learned of some ancient soothsayers among them) may be ascribed to natural causes and accidents; yet that universal flood (in the time of Noah) was poured over the whole face of the earth by a power above nature, and by the special commandment of God himself, who at that time gave strength of influence to the stars, and abundance to the fountains of the deep: whereby the irruption of waters was made more forcible, than any ability of nature could effect, or any second causes by whatsoever union could perform, without receiving from the fountain of all power, strength, and faculties supernatural. Henricus Mecliniensis, a scholar of Albertus Magnus, in his commentaries upon the great conjunctions of Albi Masar, observeth, that before the flood of Noah, the like conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation since called the Ship of Argos; by which the flood of Noah might be foretold, because Cancer is both a watery sign, and the house of the moon, which is the lady of the sea, and of moisture, according to the rules of astronomy, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco upon Genesis confirmeth, affirming, that altho' Noah did well know this flood by divine revelation, yet (this conjunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not only signs, but also working causes, by strength received from the first cause, which is God himself; and further, that by Catarracte cæli (Englisht the windows of heaven) Moses meant this great and watery conjunction; the word [Catarractæ] signifying flowing down or coming down. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordain by the course of the heavens such a constellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake those wicked ways wherein they walked, and call unto God for mercy.

I risia quoque per maritimos fluctus tota parte submersa fuit, & perierunt plerumque 100000. ^f Also de Concordia Theolog. & Astrolog. Gen. 7. 11. ^g The word καταρρακτης properly signifieth any place of stoppage, against which the force of the water being naturally carried downwards, dasheth and breaketh; of καταρρακτις, or frango. Hence because windows do not only open but also shut, the word hath been transported & borrowed for bars and flood gates.

Of this judgment was Gul. Parisiensis, who understood that the words Catarraetæ cæli, or windows of heaven, were to be taken for the former conjunction, or for these watery signs, Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Hyades and Orion, and of the planets, Mars, Venus and the Moon: which are the forcible causes of the greatest inundations. His own words are these, Nondum intelligo prophetam Hebræorum catarraetæ cæli vocasse, nisi partes illas cæli, quæ generativæ sunt pluviarum & inundationum aquarum, quales sunt signa aquatica, ut Cancer, &c. as aforesaid. As yet (saith he) I perceive not what the prophet of the Hebrews meaneth by those words [Catarraetæ cæli, or windows of heaven] unless he thereby understands those celestial powers, by whose influences are engendered the rain, and inundations of waters, such as are the watery signs of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his unsearchable wisdom this conjunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) add vigour and faculty, and gave to every operation increase of virtues, violent eruptions to springs and fountains, commanding them to cast out the whole treasure and heap of their waters; taking retention from the clouds, and condensing air into water by the ministry of his angels, or howsoever else best pleased his all-powerfulness.

SECT. VI.

That there was no need of any new creation of matter to make the universal flood; and what are Catarraetæ cæli, Gen. vii. 11.

NOW if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new (for God resteth the seventh day, that is, he did not then after create any new species) which granted, it may seem that then all the earth and air had not waters sufficient to cover the habitable world fifteen cubits above the highest mountains. Of this proposition, whether God hath so restrained himself or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the world had want of water to overcover the highest mountains, I take that conceit to be unlearned and foolish: for it is written, that the fountains of the great deep were broken up, that is, the waters forsook the very bowels of the earth; and all whatsoever was dispersed therein, pierced and broke thro' the face thereof. Then let us consider that the earth had above twenty-one thousand miles: the diameter of the earth according to that circle seven thousand miles; and then from the superficies to the center some three thousand five hundred miles: take then the highest mountain of the world, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the mountains of Armenia or Scythia, or that (of all others the highest) in Tenneris, and I do not find, that he who looketh highest, stretcheth above thirty miles upright. It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason, that all those waters mixed within the earth three thousand five hundred miles deep should not well help to cover the space of thirty miles in height, this thirty miles upright being found in the depths of the earth one hundred and sixteen times: for the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the waters drawn out of the bowels of the earth. Secondly, If we consider what proportion the earth beareth to the extension of the air over and above it, we shall find the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this air as every where compasseth and embraceth the earth, which condensation is a conversion of air into water, a change familiar in those elements, it will not seem strange to men of judgment, yea but of ordinary understanding, that the earth (God so pleasing) was covered over with waters without any new creation.

Lastly, for the opinions of Gulielmus Parisiensis, and Aliacenſis, to which I may add Berosus and others, that such a conjunction there was, shewing that destruction by waters which followed; and that by the words Catarraetæ cæli, or windows of heaven, was meant this conjunction; there needs no other answer than that observation of Ludovicus Vives, who affirmeth that by the gravest astrologers it was observed, that in the Year 1524, there should happen the like conjunction, as at Noah's flood, than which (saith he) there was never a more fair, dry, and seasonable year: the like destruction was prophesied of the year 1588. But Picus earl of Mirandula proveth that there could not be any such conjunction at that time.

To conclude, I find no other mystery in the words Catarraetæ cæli, than that the clouds were meant thereby: Moses using the word windows of heaven (if that be the sense of the words) to express the violence of the rains, and pouring down of waters. For whosoever hath seen those fallings of water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the spouts (where clouds do not break into drops, but fall with a resistless violence in one body) may properly use that manner of speech which Moses did; that the windows or flood-gates of heaven opened: (which is) that waters fell contrary to custom and that order which we call natural. God then loosened the power retentive in the uppermost air; and the waters fell in abundance: Behold (saith ^a Job) he which holdeth the waters, and they dry up; or better in Latin, Et omnia siccantur; And all things are dried up; but when he sendeth them out, they destroy the earth: and in the 26th chapter, he bindeth the waters in the clouds; but these bonds God loosed at that time of the general flood, and called up the waters which slept in the great deep: and these joining together covered the earth, till they had performed the work of his will: which done, ^b he then commanded them to return into their dark and vast caves, and the rest (by a wind) rarified again into air, formerly condensed into drops.

SECT. VII.

Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the heathen.

NOAH commanded by God, before the fall of those waters, entred the ark which he had built, with his own wife, and his sons, and his sons wives, taking with them of every creature, which took life by generation, seven of the clean, and of the unclean two. Noah, according to Philo, signifieth quietness: after others, and according to the prophecy of his father Lamech, cessation; to whom after-times gave many names answering his antiquity, zeal, virtue and other qualities: as, the first Ogyges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogyges there was also a great flood of Achaia: Saturn they called him, because he was the father of nations: others gave him the name of Prometheus, who was said to steal away Jupiter's fire; fire in that place being taken and understood for the knowledge of God and heavenly things. Others think, that he was so called for his excellent wisdom and foresight. He had also the name of Jannus (id est) vinosus, because Jain signifieth wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian finds him written in libris ritua-

libus, in the books of ceremonies, preceding both Saturn, Uranus and Jove: which three enjoyed an elder time than all the other ancientest feigned gods. And this name Jain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latin; for it was in use before there was any Latin nation, or any kingdom by that name known. Of the antiquity of Janus, Fabius Pictor giveth this testimony. Jani ætate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus pectoribus nondum hæserat ulla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & far primus populos docuit Janus ad sacrificia: primus enim aras & pomæria & sacra docuit; In the time of Janus (saith he) there was no monarchy: for the desire of rule had not folded it self about the hearts of men. Janus first taught the people to sacrifice wine and meal: he first set up altars, instituted gardens and solitary groves, wherein they used to pray; with other holy rites and ceremonies. A greater testimony than this there cannot be found among the heathen, which in all agreeth so well with the scriptures. For first, whilst Noah flourished, there was not any king or monarch: Nimrod being the first that took on him, sovereign authority. Secondly, ^a Noah after the flood was the first that planted the vine, and became a husbandman; and therefore offered the first-fruits of both (to wit) wine and meal. Thirdly, He was the first that raised an altar, and offered ^b sacrifice to God, a thanksgiving for his merciful goodness towards him. Noah was also signified in the name of Bifrons (which was given to Janus) because he beheld the times both before and after the flood, ^c Quia præterita noverit, & futura prospexerit, saith Arnobius. Because he knew what was past, and provided for what was to come. He was also in the person of Janus shadowed by the name of Chaos, and semen orbis, The seed of the world; because as out of that confused heap was drawn all kinds of beasts and plants: so from Noah came all mankind: whereof Ovid in the person of Janus:

The ancients called me Chaos: my great years By those old times, of which I sing, appears.

He was also entituled Cælum & Sol, Heaven and the Sun, for his excellent knowledge in astronomy: Vertumnus, Bacchus and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus, and Alexander Aphrodisæus so call, because he was the restorer of the Greeks to their former liberty, but in respect of the flood. For the Greeks called Liber ῥῆς, and his nurses Hyades, of rain, because Noah entered the ark, when the sun join'd with the stars Hyades, a constellation in the brow or neck of Taurus, and ever after a monument of Noah's flood. He was also by others surnamed Triton, a marine god, the son of Neptune: because he lived in safety on the waters. So was he known by the name of ^e Dionysus, quasi Διόνυσος, mentem pungens, bite-brain or wit-flinger, tho' Diodorus conceives otherwise, and derives that name à patre & loco, of his father and the place of his birth (to wit) of Jove, and Nysa, a town of Arabia Felix, saith Suidas out of Orpheus. He had also the by-name of ^f Taurus, or Tauropagus; because he first yoked oxen and tilled the ground, according to that of Moses; ^g And Noah became an husbandman. Now howsoever the Greeks vaunt of their Theban Bacchus (otherwise Dionysus) it is certain that the name was borrowed, and the invention stolen from Noah. But this name of Bacchus, more anciently Boacchus, was taken (saith ^h Gul. Stuckius, and out of him Danæus) from Noachus [N] being chang'd into [B]; and it is the more probable, because it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the vine after the flood: and of Noah (the first and ancient Bacchus) were all those fables devised, of which Diodorus complaineth in his fourth book and fifth chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah was surnamed Nysius of the mountain Nysa in India, where the Grecian Bacchus never came, whatsoever themselves feign of his enterprizes; and these mountains of Nysa join with those of Paropanifus, and those other eastern mountains, on which the ark of Noah rested after the flood.

Furthermore, to the end that the memory of this second parent of mankind might the better be preserved, there were founded by his issues many great cities which bare his name; with many rivers and mountains: which oftentimes forgot that it was done in his regard, because the many names given him brought the same confusion to places as to himself. Notwithstanding all which, we find the city of Noah upon the banks of the Red-sea and elsewhere: the river of ⁱ Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolemy, Danus; dividing Illyria from Pannonia. Thus much for the name.

SECT. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the ark: as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion and name.

NOW in what part of the world Noah built the ark, it doth not appear in the scriptures, neither do I find any approved author that hath written thereof; only Goropius Becanus in his Indo-Scythia conceiveth, that Noah built his ark near the mountains of Caucasus, because on those hills are found the goodliest cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the war among a people called Nysæi, inhabiting the other side of Caucasus, he found all their burials and sepulchres wrought over with cedar. To this place (saith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to separate himself from the reprobate giants, who rebelled against God and nature, as also because he would not be interrupted in the building of the ark; to which also he addeth the convenience of rivers, to transport the timber which he used, without troubling any other carriages.

Only this we are sure of, that the ark was built in some part of the eastern world; and, to my understanding, not far from the place where it rested after the flood. For Noah did not use any mast or sail (as in other ships) and therefore did the ark no otherwise move than the hulk or body of a ship doth in a calm sea. Also because it is not probable, that during these continual and downright rains there were any winds at all, therefore was the ark little moved from the place where it was fashioned and set together. For it is written; ^k God made a wind to pass upon the earth, and the waters ceased; and therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the waters, there was not any storm or forcible wind at all, which could drive the ark any great distance from the place where it was first by the waters lifted up. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the ark had fundum planum; A flat bottom, and not rais'd in form of a ship with a sharpness forward, to cut the waves for the better speed.

This kind of vessel the Hebrews call Thebet, and the Greeks Larnax, for so they termed Deucalion's ship: and some say, that the hill Parnassus, to which in eight days he arrived, was first called Larnassus, and by the change of [L.] into [P] Parnassus; but ^a*Pausanias* thinks that it took name of a son of the nymph Cleodora, called Parnassus, the inventor of auguration.

^b*Peuceros* finds the word [Parnassus] to have no affinity with the Greek, but thinks it derived from the Hebrew word Nabas, which signifieth auguration and divination: or from Har or Parai, as in his chapter of oracles in the leaf before cited.

^c*Josephus* calls the ark Machina, by the general name of a huge frame: and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew Aron; but herein lieth the difference between Aron and Thevet, that Aron signifieth properly the ark of the sanctuary, but Thevet such a vessel as swimmeth, and beareth it self upon the waters.

Lastly, this ark of Noah differed from the fashion of a ship in this, that it had a cover and roof, with a crest in the midst thereof, and the sides declining like the roof of an house; to the end, both to cast off the waters, and that thereunder ^d*Noah* himself and his children might shelter and separate themselves from the noisomeness of the many beasts, which filled the other rooms and parts of the ark.

Of what wood the ark was built it is uncertain. The Hebrew word Gopher, once, and in this place only, used, is diversly understood; and tho' the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, that the Geneva translation calls it pine-tree; the Rabbins, cedar; the Seventy, square timber; the Latin, smooth timber. Others will have it cypress-trees, as dedicated to the dead, because cypress is worn at funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher signify any special kind of timber, Noah obeyed the voice of God therein; if not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, having the promise of God, and his grace and mercy for his defence. For with Noah God promised ^e*to establish his covenant*. ^f*Pliny* affirmeth, that in Egypt it was the use to build ships of cedar, which the worms eat not; and he avoweth, that he saw in Utica, in the temple of Apollo, cedar beams, laid in the time of the foundation of the city, and that they were still found in his time, which was above 1188 years after: proving thereby, that this kind of wood was not subject to putrifying or moulding in a very long time. But in that it is easy to cut, light to carry, and of a sweet savour, lasting also better than any other wood, and because near the place where the ark rested, there are found great store of these cedar-trees, as also in all the mountains of the east, besides those of Libanus, it is probable enough that the ark might be of that wood: which hath besides the other commodities the greatest length of timber, and therefore fittest to build ships withal. Pererius conceiveth that the ark had divers sorts of timber, and that the bottom had of one sort, the deck and partition of another; all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for timber in general. True it is, that cedar will serve for all parts of a ship, as well for the body, as for masts and yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction received from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the ark; and to pitch it, and to divide it into cabins, thereby to sever the clean beasts from the unclean, and to preserve their several sorts of food; and that it might be capable of all kind of living creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when

Noah had gathered together, he cast his confidence wholly on God, who by his angels steered this ship without a rudder, and directed it without the help of a compass or the north-star. The pitch which Noah used, is by some supposed to have been a kind of bitumen, whereof there is great quantity about the valley of ^g*Sodom* and Gomorrab, now the dead sea or Asphaltes: and in the region of Babylon, and in the West-Indies: and herein it exceedeth other pitch, that it melts not with the sun, but by the fire only, after the manner of hard wax.

SECT. IX.

That the ark was of sufficient capacity.

THE ark, according to God's commandment, had of length three hundred cubits, fifty of breadth, and thirty deep or high: by which proportion it had six parts of length to one of breadth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which St. Augustine, ^h*Proculdudio figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo civitatis Dei (hoc est) Ecclesie, quæ fit salva per lignum, in quo pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Christus Jesus: nam & mensura ipsa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinisque ejus significat corpus humanum, in cujus veritate ad homines prænnunciatus est venturus, & venit, &c.* Without doubt (saith he) it is a figure of the city of God, travelling in this world as a stranger (that is) of the Church, saved by the tree whereupon the Mediator between God and man, the man Jesus Christ did hang: for even the very measure of the length, height, and breadth, answereth the shape of man's body, in the truth whereof the coming of Christ was foretold and performed.

By what kind of cubit the ark was measured, it hath been a disputed question among the fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: the first kind of cubit (called the common) containeth one foot and a half, measured from the sharp of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the palm cubit) which taketh one handful more than the common. The third is called Regius cubitus, or the Persian cubit, which exceedeth the common cubit three inches. The fourth is the sacred cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly, there is a fifth cubit, called geometrical, which containeth six common cubits. But of all these sorts, which were commonly measured by the vulgar cubit, the alteration and diminution of mensurations hath made the difference. For as there is now a less proportion of bodies: so is the common cubit, from the sharp of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of less length than it was in elder times.

St. Augustine considering the many sorts of beasts and birds which the ark held, with their food and water, was sometimes of opinion, that the ark had proportion after the geometrical cubit, which containeth almost six of the common. For measuring the ark by the vulgar cubit, it did not exceed the capacity of that vessel built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the ship of Ptolemy Philopater. But St. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his judgment as touching the geometrical cubit; and found upon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a body to preserve all sorts of creatures by God appointed to be reserved. For it was not needful to take any kinds of fishes into the ark, because they were kept living (saith St. Augustine) in their own element. ⁱ*Non fuit necesse conservare* in arca quæ possent in aquis vivere ; non solum mersa sicut pisces, verum supernatantia sicut multæ alites ; It was not needful to conserve those creatures in the ark, which could live in the waters ; and not only fishes, which can live under water, but also those fowls which sit and swim on them. And again, Terra, non aqua, maledicta ; quia Adam non hujus, sed illius fructum vetitum comedit ; It was the earth, and not the waters, which God cursed : for of the forbidden fruit of the earth, and not of the sea, did Adam eat ; so as St. Augustine gathereth hereupon (as aforesaid) that so huge a frame needed not.

And if we look with the eyes of judgment hereunto, we shall find nothing monstrous therein ; altho' the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) have more of mischief and of ignorance, than of any reverend reason, find many impossibilities in this work of God. But it is manifest, and undoubtedly true, that many of the species, which now seem differing and of several kinds, were not then in rerum natura. For those beasts which are of mix'd natures, either they were not in that age, or else it was not needful to preserve them : seeing they might be generated again by others, as the mules, the hyena's, and the like : the one begotten by asses and mares, the other by foxes and wolves. And whereas by discovering of strange lands, wherein there are found divers beasts and birds, differing in colour or stature from those of these nothern parts, it may be supposed by a superficial consideration, that all those which wear red and pyed skins, or feathers, are differing from those that are less painted and wear plain russet or black : they are much mistaken that so think. And for my own opinion, I find no difference, but only in magnitude, between the cat of Europe, and the ounce of India ; and even those dogs which are become wild in Hispaniola, with which the Spaniards used to devour the naked Indians, are now changed to wolves, and begin to destroy the breed of their cattle, and do also oftentimes tear asunder their own children. *The common crow and rook of India is full of red feathers in the down'd and low islands of Caribana ; and the black-bird and thrush hath his feathers mix'd with black and carnation, in the north parts of Virginia. The dog-fish of England is the shark of the south ocean : for its colour or magnitude made a difference of species, then were the negroes, which we call the black-mores, non animalia rationalia, not men, but some kind of strange beasts ; and so the giants of the south America should be of another kind, than the people of this part of the world. We also see it daily that the natures of fruits are changed by transplantation, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of climate. Crabs may be made good fruit by often grafting, and the best melons will change in a year or two to common cucumbers by being set in a barren soil. Therefore taking the kinds precisely of all creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the earth by his ordinance produced ; the ark, after the measure of the common cubit, was sufficiently capacious to contain of all, according to the number by God appointed : for if we add but half a foot of measure to the common cubit, which had a foot and a half of giantly stature (and less allowance we cannot give to the difference between them and us) then did the ark contain 600 foot in length, and 100 foot in breadth, and 60 foot in depth.

But first of all, to make it manifest that the geometrical cubit is not used in the scripture, the stature of the giants therein named may suffice. For if the bed of ^b Og king of Basban had been nine geometrical cubits long, it had taken 54 cubits of the common, which make 80 foot : and ^c Goliath, who had the length of 6 cubits and a handful (which makes nine foot and a handful, a proportion credible) if these cubits had been geometrical, then had been 54 foot in height and upwards, which were monstrous and most incredible : for (according to this proportion) the head of Goliath had been nine foot long, and far weightier and bigger than all David's body, who carried it away.

Again, If the geometrical cubit had been used for a measure in the scripture, as many commentators have observed, then would the altar (appointed to contain five cubits of length, five of breadth and three of height) have reached the length of 27 foot upright, and so must their priests have ascended by steps or ladders to have performed their sacrifices thereon, which was contrary to God's commandment given in these words : Thou shalt not go up with steps unto mine altar, that thy shame be not discovered thereon ; and therefore was the altar but three common cubits high, which make four foot, that their priests standing thereby might execute their office : wherefore I may conclude, that the cubit mentioned in the scriptures was not the geometrical, but the ordinary cubit of one foot and a half, according to the measure of giantly stature ; which measure (doubtless) might give much the more capacity to the ark, altho' it be also probable, that as the men were, so were the horses whereon they rode, and all other creatures, of a correspondent size. And yet, as I take it, tho' by this means there were not any whit the more room in the ark, it were not hard to conceive, how all the distinct species of animals, whose lives cannot be preserved in the waters, might according to their present quantities be contained in a vessel of those dimensions which the ark had ; allowing to the cubit one foot and a half of our now usual measure : whence it followeth of necessity, that those large bodies which were in the days of Noah might have room sufficient in the ark, which was measured by a cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of creatures, to be saved, that is, seven of the clean, two of the unclean (with necessary food) might have place in the ark, Butaeo hath very learnedly declared : the brief sum of whose discourse to that purpose is this : The length of the ark was three hundred cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fifty cubits, and the product by the height of thirty cubits, sheweth the whole capacity to have been 450000. Now whereas the posts, walls, and other partitions of lodgings may seem to have taken up a great part of the hollow : the height of the roof, which (the perpendicular being one cubit) contained 7500 cubical cubes, was a sufficient recompence : it therefore in a ship of such greatness we seek room for 89 distinct species of beasts, or (lest any should be omitted) for 100 several kinds, we shall easily find place both for them, and for the birds, which in bigness are no way answerable to them, and for meat to sustain them all. For there are three sorts of beasts, whose bodies are of a quantity best known ; the beef, the sheep, and the wolf : to which the rest may be reduc'd, by saying (according to Aristotle) that one elephant is answerable to four beeves, one lyon to two wolves, and so of the rest. Of beasts, some feed on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirty kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables : of which number, only three are clean, according to the law of Moses, whereof seven of a kind entered into the ark, namely, three couples for breed, and one odd for sacrifice: the other eight and twenty kinds were taken by two of each kind; so that in all there were in the ark one and twenty great beasts clean, and six and fifty unclean, estimable for largeness as 91 beeves; yet for a supplement (lest perhaps any species be omitted) let them be valued, as 120 beeves. Of the lesser sort, feeding on vegetables, were in the ark six and twenty kinds, estimable with good allowance for supply, as fourscore sheep. Of those which devour flesh, were two and thirty kinds, answerable to threescore and four wolves. All these 280 beasts might be kept in one story or room of the ark in their several cabins; their meat in a second: the birds and their provision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his family, and all their necessities.

* Acoft. hist. India. ^b Deut. 3. 11.

S E C T. X.

That the ark rested upon part of the hill Taurus (or Caucasus) between the East-Indies and Scythia.

+ I.

A preterition of some questions less material: with a note of the use of this question, to find out the Metropolis of nations.

WHAT time Noah took to build the ark, I leave to others to dispute; but he received the commandment from God 100 years before the waters fell: and had therefore choice of time and leisure sufficient. As for the number of decks and partitions, which Origen divides into four, St. Augustine into three, I will not trouble the reader with the controversy: or whether those creatures, which sometimes rest on the land, other times in the waters, as the crocodiles (now called Alegartos) the sea-cows or sea-horses, were kept in the ark, or no, I think it a needless curiosity; and yet to this faith Pererius, and others before him, that a fish-pool might be made as well within the ark, as in Hiero's ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disprove the foolery of the Hebrews, who suppose that the ark was lightened by a carbuncle, or had windows of crystal to receive in light, and keep out water, were but to revive the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seek most to satisfy my self and others in, is in what part of the world the ark rested after the flood: because the true understanding of some of these places (as the seat of the terrestrial paradise, and the resting of the ark) do only and truly teach the world's plantation, and the beginning of nations, before and after the flood; and all story, as well general as particular, thereby may be the better understood.

+ II.

A proposal of the common opinion, that the ark rested upon some of the hills of Armenia.

AND first, for the true place where the ark rested after the flood, and from what part of the world the children of Noah travelled to their first settlement and plantation, I am resolved (without any presumption) that therein the most writers were utterly mistaken. And I am not led so to think out of my humour or newness of opinion, or singularity; but do herein ground my self on the original and first truth, which is the word of God; and after that, upon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, ^a that the ark stayed upon one of the mountains of Ararat, which the Chaldean paraphrast hath converted Kardu, meaning the hills Gordæi or Gordiei in Armenia the greater (as the words Gordæi and Kardu seem to be one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our interpreters are; I find neither scripture nor reason which teacheth any such thing: to wit, that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. ^b Nicolaus Damascenus calls this mountain of Ararat, Baris, being the same which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which mountain the frier Annius (citing this place out of Josephus) makes him find another adjoining, called Ocila, and to say that the ark (of which Moses the law-giver of the Hebrews wrote) did first take ground on this Ocila. But I do not find any such mountain in being, as this Ocila; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Josephus. Strabo remembreth a promontory in Arabia Fœlix, of that name, and Pliny finds a mart-town so called in the same, which Ptolemy calls Ocilis, Pinetus Acyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damascenus, or rather of Annius, seemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian mountains. Berosus calleth those mountains of Armenia Gordiei, and Curtius Cordæi: Ptolemy Gordæi and Gordiei; of which the country next adjoining is by this Nicolaus Damascenus called Ninyada, perhaps (as ^c Becanus conjectures) for Myliada or rather Minni; which word is used for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seems to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we should say Minni of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, ^d Pliny witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Cardyes about these mountains, whom others call Gordien or Gordeni. The mountains are seated apart from all other to the north of that ledge of the mountains called Taurus, or Niphates, in the plains of Armenia the great, near the lake of Thospitis: whence the river of Tigris floweth in 75 degrees of longitude, and 41 and 42 degrees of latitude. One of the mountains Gordiei (that which surmounteth the rest) Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of ^e Josephus; which name (saith Junius) was of the event, because of Noah's coming down with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed event; seeing any hill, from whence on every side we must descend, may thus be called: as Junius corrects the place in Josephus Λεβαρις (Kubaris.) That the place is thus to be read, he conjectureth, because Joseph. l. 1. c. 4. says, the place is called Λεβαριον (as it were the descent or coming down) and Epiphan. l. 1. cont. Hieres. calls it Λόπαρ: which word in the Armenian and Egyptian tongue signifieth descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubra is a synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latin Delubrum may seem to be derived; and Æt. vi. 9. they that belonged to the synagogue of the Egyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath been embraced from age to age: receiving a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any farther examination; altho' the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be given, especially to that mountain, by reason that the passage was more fair, up and down unto it, than to any of the rest adjoining.

† III.

The first argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so near a place as Armenia.

BUT there are many arguments to persuade me, that the ark of Noah did not rest it self in any part of Armenia, and that the mountain Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordiean mountains.

For first, it is agreed by all who follow ^a Berosus, that it was in the 130th year, or in the year 131 after the flood, when Nimrod came into the valley of Shinaar, which valley was afterwards called Babylonia, Cush and Chaldea. If then the ark had first found land in Armenia, it is very improbable, that the children of Noah, which came into that valley, could have spent so many years in so short a passage: seeing the region of Mesopotamia was only interjacent, which might by easy journeys have been passed over in twenty days; and to hasten and help which passage the navigable river of Tigris offered it self, which is every where transpassable by boats of great burden: so as where the desert on the one side resisted their expedition, the river on the contrary side served to advance it; the river rising out of the same ledge of mountains, or at the foot of them, where the ark of Noah was first supposed to settle it self; then, if the nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surprize of a second flood (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrews) it soundeth ill to the ear of reason, that they would have spent many years in that low and overflown valley of Mesopotamia, so called of the many rivers which imbroider or compass it: for the effects witnessed their affections, and the works, which they undertook, their unbelief; being no sooner arrived in Shinaar, but they began to provide themselves of a defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his kingdom, the first known city of the world founded after the flood, about 131 years, or (as others suppose) ten years later: though (for my self) I rather think, that they undertook that work in two respects, first, to make themselves famous, ^b To get us a name (saith the text:) Secondly, thereby to usurp dominion over the rest.

† IV.

The second argument, that the eastern people were most ancient in populousity, and in all human glory.

FOR a second argument: the civility, magnificence and multitude of people (wherein the east parts of the world first abounded) hath more weight than any thing which hath been, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noah's taking land there. And that this is true, the use of printing and artillery (among many other things which the east had) may easily persuade us, that those sun-rising nations were the most ancient. The certainty of this report, that the East Indians (time out of mind) have had guns and ordnance of battery, confirmed by the Portugals and others, makes us now to understand, that the place of Philostratus in vita Apollonii Trianer, l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, tho' express'd in fabulous words: when he saith, that the wife men, which dwell between Hyphasis and Ganges, use not themselves to go forth into battel: but that they drive away their enemies with thunder and lightning sent from Jupiter. By which means there it is said, that Hercules Aegyptius and Bacchus, joining their forces, were defeated there; and that this

Hercules there cast away his golden shield. For the invention of letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because he brought them first into Greece: of which the people (then rude and savage) had reason to give him the honour, from whom they received the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no less ancient than Seth or Enoch were: for they are said to have written on pillars of stone (as before remembred) long before the flood. But from the eastern world it was that John Cuthenberg, a German, brought the device of printing: by whom Conradus being instructed, brought the practice thereof to Rome: and after that, Nicolaus Gerson, a Frenchman, bettered both the letters and invention. And, notwithstanding that this mystery was then supposed to be but newly born, the Chinaos had letters long before either the Egyptians or Phenicians; and also the art of printing, when as the Geeks had neither any civil knowledge, or any letters among them.

And that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards have witnessed, who about an hundred years since discovered those kingdoms, and do now enjoy their rich trades therein: for the Chinaos account all other nations but savages in respect of themselves.

And to add strength to this argument, the conquest and story of Alex. Macedon may justly be called to witness, who found more cities and sumptuosity in that little kingdom of Porus, which lay side by side to the East India, than in all his other travels and undertakings. For in Alexander's time, learning and greatness had not travelled so far to the west as Rome: Alexander esteeming of Italy but as a barbarous country, and of Rome as of a village. But it was Babylon that stood in his eye, and the fame of the east pierced his ears. And if we look as far as the sun-rising, and hear Paulus Venetus what he reporteth of the uttermost angle and island thereof, we shall find that those nations have sent out, and not received, lent knowledge, and not borrowed it from the west. For the farther east (to this day) the more civil, the farther west the more savage. And of the isle of Japan (now Zippingari) Venetus maketh this report. Incole religioni, literis, & sapientiae sunt addictissimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) sacris in delubris exercent: unum cognoscunt principem, unum Deum adorant. The islanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters and philosophy, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent than prayer, which they use in their churches after the manner of Christians. They acknowledge one king, and worship one God. The antiquity, magnificence, civility, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policy in government, is reported to be such by those who have been employ'd into those parts, as it seemeth to exceed (in those formerly named, and divers other particulars) all other kingdoms of the world.

† V.

The third argument, from the wonderful resistance which Semiramis found in the East Indies.

BUT for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the invasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and advised reader: who may consider in what age she lived, and how soon after the world's new birth she gathered her army (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctesias reporteth) of more than three millions to invade India, to which he joineth also 500000 horse, and 100000 waggons: whereof if we believe but a third part, it shall suffice to prove that India was the first planted and peopled country after the flood. Now as touching the time wherein she lived: all historians consent, that she was the wife of Ninus; and the most approved writers agree, that Ninus was the son of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the son of Cush, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came to Shinaar, he was then a great nation, as by the building of the city and tower of Babel may appear; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents cast between Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her army was composed. Let us then see with whom she encountered in that war with this her powerful army: even with a multitude, rather exceeding, than equaling her own, conducted by Staurobates king of India beyond Indus; of whose multitudes this is the witness of Diodor. Siculus. Staurobates, avitis majoribus, quam quæ erant Semiramidis, copiis; Staurobates gathering together greater troops than those of Semiramis. If then these numbers of Indians had been increased but by a colony sent out from Shinaar (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt took some time in the performance) this increase in the east, and this army of Staurobates must have been made of stone, or somewhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might easily grow up in that time from so great a troop as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall be demonstrated hereafter in the story of Israel) so could not any such time, by any multiplication natural, produce so many bodies of men, as were in the Indian Army victorious over Semiramis, if the colonies sent thither had been so late as Babel overturned, and the confusion of languages. For if we allow 65 years time after the flood, before Nimrod was born: of which 30 years to Cush, ere he begat Seba, after whom he had ^a Havilah, Sabtab, Raamah, and Sabtecha: and then 30 years to Raamah, ere he begat Sheba and Dedan, both which were born before Nimrod: and five years to his five elder brothers, which make 65, and then twice 30 years for two generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba and Dedan with others, to beget their sons, and that a third generation might grow up, which makes in all 125 years, there will then remain six years to have been spent in travelling from the east, ere they arrived in Shinaar in the year after the flood 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might be of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to have arrived at Shinaar in the year 101: and the confusion to have been at Peleg's birth, these men do all by miracle: they beget whole nations without the help of time, and build Nimrod's tower in the air; and not on those low and marshy grounds (which require sound foundations) in the plains of Shinaar. For except that huge tower were built in a day, there could be no confusion in that year 101, or at Peleg's birth. And therefore it is far more probable, that Nimrod usurped regal authority in the 131st year after the flood (according to Berosus) and that the work of Babel lasted forty years (according to Glycas) ^b hominibus in ea perficienda totis 40 annis incassum laborantibus; Men labouring in vain 40 years to finish it. By which account it falls out, that it was 170 years after the flood, ere a colony were sent into East India; which granted (the one being the main body, and the other but a troop taken thence) it can hardly be believed, that Staurobates could have exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then empress of all that part of the world, gathered the most of nations into one body.

† VI.

The fourth argument from divers considerations in the person of Noah.

Fourthly, It is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the world before the flood, and had lived therein the long time of 600 years, was all that space, 130 years after the flood, without any certain habitation: no, it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conductor of those people, by Noah destined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the western world (which travels Noah put over to young and able bodies) and that Noah himself, then covered with many years, planted himself in the same place which God had assigned him: which was where he first came down out of the ark from the waters: for it is written, that after Noah came down out of the ark he planted a vineyard, and became a husbandman: whose business was to dress and manure the earth, and not to range over so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia Felix, where he should (if the tradition be found) have left certain colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton; then into Spain, where they say he settled other companies; and built cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his sons wives: from thence into Italy, where they say he found his son Cham the Saturn of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and subjects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the story) had patience for three years; but then finding no amendment, they say, he banished him out of Italy. These be but the fancies of Berosus Annianus, a plain imitation of the Grecian fables. For let every reasonable man conceive, what it was to travel far in such a forest as the world was, when after so great a rotting of the earth by the flood, the same lay waste and overgrown for 130 or 140 years, and wherein there could hardly be found either path or passage through which men were able to creep, for woods, bushes and briars that in those years were grown up.

And there are so many reasons, proving that Noah never came into the valley of Shinaar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italy or Spain: for Noah, who was father of all those nations, a man revered both for his authority, knowledge, experience and piety, would never have permitted his children and issues to have undertaken that unbelieving presumptuous work of Babel. Rather by his presence and prevalent persuasions he would have bound their hands from so vain labours, and, by the authority which he received even from God himself, he would have held them in that awful subjection, as whatsoever they had vainly conceived or feared, yet they durst not have disobey'd the personal commandment of him, who in the beginning had a kind of regal authority over his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankind was by themselves purchased through cruelty and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise up building against his Almighty power, was, as much as in them lay, a provocation of God to lay on them the same, it not a more sharp affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that ever he came so far west as Babylonia; but rather, that he sent those numbers which came into Shinaar (being the greatest troop, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) under Nimrod, or those upon whom he usurped. Naclerus and Cælestinus take the testimony of Methodius bishop of Tyre for current, that there were three leaders of the people after their encrease (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene and Joktan: of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, Joktan of Sem, and Suphene of Japhet. This opinion I cannot judge of, altho' I will not doubt, but that so great a work as the world's plantation could not be affected without order and conduction.

Of the sons of Sem: Joktan, Havila and Ophir, are especially noted to have dwelt in the East-Indies. The rest of Sem's issues had also the regions of Persia and the other adjoining to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Ur, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were the sons of Joktan, or of all the rest a certain number (Cham and his issue only excepted) that Noah kept with himself, it cannot be known. Of which plantation I shall speak at large in the chapter following.

Now another reason which moves me to believe that Noah stayed in the east, far away from all those that came into Shinaar, is that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the story of the Hebrews, or among any of those nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the father of all mankind, and the chosen servant of God, was too principal a person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the world) withdrawn himself, and rested apart with his best beloved, giving himself to the service and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their destin'd portions. For he landed in a warm and fertile soil, where he planted his vineyard, and dress'd the earth; after which, and his thanksgiving to God by sacrifice, he is not remembered in the scriptures, because he was so far away from those nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrews chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

† VII.

Of the senseless opinion of Anniius the commentator upon Berolus; who finds divers places where the ark rested; as the Caspian and Gordiæan hills, which are three hundred miles asunder; and also some place of Scythia.

IT remaineth now that we examine the arguments and authorities of frier Annius, who in his commentaries upon Berosus and others, laboureth marvellously to prove, that the ark of Noah rested upon the Armenian mountains called Caspia; which mountains separate Armenia from the upper Media, and do equally belong to both. And because all his authors speak of the mountains Gordiaei, he hath no other shift to unite these opinions, but by uniting those far distant mountains together. To effect which he hath found no other invention, than to charge those men with error which have carefully overseen, printed, and published ^a Ptolemy's geography, in which they were altogether discovered: for that last edition of Mercator's sets these hills five degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainly, if we look into those more ancient copies of Villanovanus and others, we shall find nothing in them to help Annius withal: for in those the mountains Caspia stand seven degrees to the east of the Gordiaei, which make 420 miles. And for those authors, by whose authority Annius strengtheneth himself, Diodorus, whom he so much followeth, giveth this judgment upon them in the like dispute. ^b Aberrarunt vero omnes, non negligentia, sed regnorum situs ignorantia; They have all erred (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of kingdoms. But for an induction, to prove that the ark of Noah stood on the mountains of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians: and to prove the same, he citeth ^c Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth, that 250 years before Ninus the earth was overflown with waters; Et in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; And that in Scythia Saga the stock of mortal men was renewed. The same author also teacheth that the Umbri before remembered (who were so called, because saved from Deucalion's flood) were the sons of the Galli, a nation of the Scythians. Ex his venisse Janum cum Dyrin & Gallis progenitoribus Umbrorum; From these Scythians, he saith, that Janus came with Dyrin and with the Galli the progenitors of the Umbri; and again, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythiis tribuitur; Certainly the prime antiquity of off-spring is always given to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that those regions called Scythia and now Tartaria, and by some writers Sarmatia Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia under tribute till Ninus's time. Also ^d Pliny calleth the Umbri, which long since inhabited Italy, Gens antiquissima; A most ancient nation, who descended of these Scythians. Now that which Annius laboureth, is to prove that these ancient Scythians (meaning the nephews of Noah) did first inhabit that region of the mountains, on which the ark rested; and confessing that this great ship was grounded in Armenia, he feigned a nation of Scythians called Araxca, taking name of the mountain Ararat, near the river of Araxes. And because his author Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, that in Scythia mankind was restored after the great flood, 250 years before Ninus) and in part utterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga, as in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; In Scythia Saga mankind was restored: he therefore in the Proem of his commentary upon ^e Berosus, leaveth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato's words, and writes, ^f Homines in Scythia salvatos. For Scythia Saga or Sacæ is undoubtedly under the mountains of Parapanisus, on which, or near which, it is most probable that the ark first took ground; and from those east parts (according to ^g Moses) came all those companies which erected the tower of Babel in Shinaar or Babylonia.

But now the best authority which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where he hath read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name a Scythæ rege eorum, from Scythæ their king. But (in a word) we may see his vanity, or rather indeed his falshood, in citing this place. For Diodorus, a most approved and diligent author, beginneth in that place with these words, Fabulantur Scythæ; The Scythians fable: and his interpreter in the table of that work, giveth this title to that very chapter. Scytharum origo & successus, fabula; The original and success of the Scythians, a fable. And indeed there needs no great disproof hereof, since Ptolemy doth directly delineate Scythia Saga, or Sacæ, and sets them in 130 degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodotus) call all the Scythians Sacæ, which Pliny confirmeth: for in respect that these Sacæ (saith ^h Pliny) are the next

^a Ptol. Asia Tab. 3. ^b Diol. l. c. 3. ^c Cato de orig. pars prima. ^d Plin. l. 3 c. 14. ^e Berol. l. 1. ^f Ptol. Asia Tab. 7. ^g Gen. 11. 2. ^h Lib. 6 c. 17.

Scythians. to the Persians, therefore they give all the rest that name. Now that any nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man believeth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lieth in 78 degrees of longitude (that is) 42 degrees distant from the Sacæ; and the country about Araxes, Ptolemy calleth Colthene and Soducene and Sacapene, without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians, either within Imaus or without, to the number of 100 several nations, are by Ptolemy precisely set down.

But to come to those later authors, whereof some have written, others have seen a great part of those north-east regions, and searched their antiquities with great diligence: first, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these mountains is also beyond our purpose.) Scythia intra Imaum montem ea est, quæ proprio vocabulo Gassaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab occasu Sarmatia Asiatica: ab oriente Imao monte: a septentrione Terra incognita: à meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, usque ad ostia Oxæ amnis in Hyrcanum mare exeuntis; et parte ipsius maris hinc usque ad Rba fluminis ostia terminatur: Scythia within the mountain Imaus is that part of the world, which in their own speech is at this time called Gassaria; and the same is bounded on the west-side by Sarmatia Asiatica (or of Asia) on the east by the Imaan mountains: on the north by unknown lands: on the south by Saccæ (which are the Sacæ) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan sea, and by a part of the same sea, as far as the mouth of Rba.^b

Now if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the west of Scythia, then Sarmatia (^c quæ magna sanè regio est, & quæ innumeras nationes complectitur; Which is a great region, comprehending innumerable nations (saith Niger) much of it being between Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant us, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plain, he dissevereth Sarmatia it self from any part of Armenia, by the regions of ^d Colchis, Iberia, Albania which he leaveth on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the west bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian, or Scythian nations; neither doth his fellow frier John Plancarpio (cited by Vincentius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neither doth Haytonus, an Armenian born, of the blood of those kings (tho' afterwards a monk) ever acknowledge himself for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian races descended: tho' he writes that story at large, gathered by Nicolaus Salcuni, and (by the commandment of pope Clement V.) in the year 1307 published.

Neither doth Matthias à Michon (a canon of Cracovia in Polonia) a Sarmatian born, and that travelled a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, find Armenia any way within the compass of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose travels are extant) hath observed so much of those regions as he hath done: proving and disproving many things, heretofore subject to dispute. And among others he burieth that ancient and received opinion, that out of the mountains Riphei and Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the rivers of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; proving by unanswerable experience, that there are no such mountains in rerum natura; and indeed the heads and fountains of those famous rivers, are now by the trade of Muscovia known to every merchant, and that they arise out of lakes, low, woody, and marshy grounds. The river of Tanais or Don, riseth to the south of the city Tulla, some twenty English miles, out of a lake called Iwanowesero in the great wood Okenitzkilies or Jepiphanolies. Volga, which Ptolemy calls Rba, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a lake called Fronow, in the great wood Vodkonzki: from which lake the two other famous rivers flow of Borysthenes (now Nyepcr) and Dsuina or Dividna. And this learned Polonian doth in this sort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the regions of Russians, Lithuanians, Muscovians, and those adjoining, bounded on the west by the river of ^e Vissa, the name perchance misprinted Vissa for Vistula, a river which parts Germany and Sarmatia: and for the east border he nameth Tanais or Don. Sarmatia Asiatica he cutteth from Europe by the same river Tanais, and the Caspian sea, to withhold it from stretching farther east: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolemy calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem; Scythia within the mountain Imaus. And the same Matthias Michon farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which frier Annius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatica it self, above three hundred and a few odd years before his own time: these be his words. Constat enim esse gentem novam, & adventitiam a partibus orientis (mutatis sedibus) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Asiæ Sarmatiam ingressam: It is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian nation) that this is a late planted nation, come from the coasts of the east; from whence they entered into Asia, and gat new seats a little more than three hundred years since: For indeed before that time the Guths or Poulozi inhabited Sarmatia Asiatica. And this Matthias lived in the year 1511, and this his discourse of Sarmatia was printed at Augusta in the year 1506, as Bucholzerus in his chronology witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) came from the east; for in the east it was that the ark of Noah rested; and the Scythæ Sacæ were those people which lived at the north foot of those mountains of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mix themselves with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimony than the general description of the earth now extant, and the witness of Ptolemy, it is plain, that between all parts of Armenia and Scythia, there are not only those three regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian sea: on the east shore of which sea, but not on the west, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia; there are indeed a nation of Scythians (called Ariacæ) between Jaxartus and Jattus; but what are these Scythians to any Ariacæ, or Scythia Araxea, which Annius placeth in Armenia, more than the Scythians of Europe.

† VIII.

The fifth argument: The vine must grow naturally near the place where the ark rested.

TO this if we add the consideration of this part of the text, ^f That Noah planted a vineyard, we shall find that the fruit of the vine or raisin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the ark was supposed: for if the vine was a stranger in Italy and France, and brought from other countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia; being a far colder country. For Tyrrhenus first brought vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at such time as ^a*Brennus* and the Gauls invaded Italy there were few or no vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Camillus) the Gauls remained between the Pyrenæi and the Alps, near unto the Senones, where they continued a long time, until they drunk wine, which was first brought them out of Italy; and after they tasted thereof they hasted to inhabit that country, which brought forth such pleasant fruit: so as it appeared, that the plant of the vine was not natural in France, but from Italy brought thither; as by Saturn from elsewhere into Italy.

Now it is manifest that Noah travelled not far to seek out the vine. For the plantation thereof is remembered, before there was any counsel how to dispose of the world among his children: and the first thing he did was to till the ground, and to plant a vineyard, after his sacrifice and thanksgiving to God; and wheresoever the ark rested, there did the vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appear that he travelled far: for the scriptures teach us, that he was a husbandman, and not a wanderer.

Answer to an objection out of the words of the text:
The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth.

AND that all the children of Noah came together into Shinaar, it doth not appear, saving that it may be inferred out of these words [from thence] because it is written: So that the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this tower: for those were from thence dispersed into all the regions of the north and south, and to the westward. And by these words of Sibylla (as they are converted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinaar, for they have this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem edificarunt altissimam, quasi per eam cælum essent ascensuri; Certain of them built a most high tower, as if they meant thereby to have scaled the heavens.

† X.

An answer to the objection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the hills there.

BUT before I conclude this part, it is necessary to see and consider, what part of scripture, and what reason may be found out to make it true or probable, that the ark of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the mountains of Armenia. For the text hath only these words: ^b*The ark rested on (or upon) the mountains of Ararat or Armenia*, saith the marginal note of the Geneva, the Chaldean Paraphrast calls it Kardu; of which the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith ^c*Epiphanius*. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint do not convert at all, but keep the same word) is taken to be a mountain of Armenia, because Armenia it self had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the height (which they suppose exceeded all others) is the opinion taken, that the ark first sat thereon.

But these suppositions have no foundation; for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those mountains, of equal stature to many other mountains of the world; and yet it doth not follow, that the ark found the highest mountain of all others to rest on: for the plains were also uncovered, before Noah came out of the ark. Now if there were any agreement among writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, we might give more credit to the conceit. For in the books of the Sibyls it is written, that the mountains of Ararat are in Phrygia, upon which it was supposed that the ark stay'd after the flood. And the better to particularize the place and seat of these mountains, and to prove them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the city of Cælenes was afterwards built. Likewise in the same description she maketh mention of Marssas, a river which runneth through part of Phrygia, and afterwards joineth it self with the river Mæander: which is far from the Gordican mountains in Armenia. We may also find a great mistaking in Josephus (tho' out of Berosus, who is in effect the father of this opinion) that Josephus sets Ararat between Armenia and Parthia, towards Adiabene, and affirmeth withal, that in the province of Cæron, by others Kairos and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters have from thence no descent, nor issue out, the people vaunt that they had in those days reserved some pieces of Noah's ark. But Parthia toucheth no where upon Armenia, for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a province of Assyria: so that all Media and a part of Assyria is between Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discovery of the mountains Gordiei was first borrowed out of Berosus by Josephus; yet the text which Josephus citeth out of Berosus, differs far from the words of that Berosus, which wandereth up and down in these days, set out by Annius. For Berosus cited by Josephus hath these words: Fertur & navigii hujus pars in Armenia, apud montem Cordiaeorum superesse, & quosdam bitumen inde abrasum secum reportare, quo vice amuleti loci hujus homines uti solent (which is) It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenia upon the Cordiean mountains; and that divers do scrape from it the bitumen or pitch, and carrying it with them, they use it instead of an amulet. But Annius's edition of the fragment of Berosus useth these words: Nam elevata ab aquis in Gordiaei montis vertice quievit, cujus adhuc dicitur aliqua pars esse, & homines ex illa bitumen tollere quo maxime utuntur ad expiationem; For the whole ark being lifted up by the waters, rested on the top of the Cordiean mountains, of which it is reported that some parts remain, and that men do carry thence of the bitumen to purge by sacrifice therewith. So as in these two texts (besides the difference of words) the name is diversly written: the ancient Berosus writes Gordiaei with a [C] and the fragment Gordiaei with a [G:] the one that the bitumen is used for a preservative against poison or enchantment; the other in sacrifice; and if it be said that they agree in the general, yet it is reported by neither from any certain knowledge, nor from any approved author: for one of them useth the word [fertur] the other [dicitur] the one, that so it is reported; the other, that so it is said: and both but by hearsay, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an historian, as wise men neither report after it, nor give credit to any thing they receive from it.

Furthermore, these mountains which Ptolemy calls Gordiaei, are not those mountains which himself giveth to Armenia, but he calleth the mountains of Armenia Moschici. These be his own words: Montes Armenie nominantur ii, qui Moschici appellantur, qui protenduntur usque ad superjacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & mons qui Paryardes dicitur: The mountains of Armenia are they which are called Moschici, which stretch along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians; also the hill which is called Paryardes; which mountains Pliny calleth ^a Pariedri, and both which lye to the north of Gordiæi or Baris, in 43 and 44 and a half; and the Gordiæan mountains in 39 and a half: from the northermost of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordians and then Georgians, who, amidst all the strength of the greatest infidels of Persia and Turkey, do still remain Christians. Concerning the other suppositions, that the mountains of Gordiæi, otherwise Baris, Kardû or Lubar (which Ptolemy calleth Torgodiaion) are the highest of the world, the same is absolutely false.

† XI.

Of Caucasus, and divers far higher hills than the Armenian.

FOR the best Cosmographers with others, that have seen the mountains of Armenia, find them far inferiour, and under-set to divers other mountains even in that part of the world, and elsewhere: as the mountain Athos between Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolemy calls Olympus, now called Lacas (saith Castaldus) is far surmounting any mountain that ever hath been seen in Armenia: for it casteth shade three hundred furlongs, which is thirty-seven miles and upwards: of which Plutarch, ^b Athos adumbrat latera Lemniæ bovis; Athos shadoweth the cow of Lemnos. Also the mount of Olympus in Thessaly is said to be of that height, as neither the winds, clouds, or rain overtop it. Again, the mountain of Antandrus in Mysia, not far from Ida, whence the river Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is also of a far more admiration than any in Armenia, and may be seen from Constantinople. There are also in Mauritania near the sea, the famous mountains of Atlas, of which Herodotus. Extat in hoc mari mons, cui nomen Atlas, ita sublimis esse dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculi mortalium pervenire non possint; Upon this coast there is a mountain called Atlas, whose height is said to be such as the eye of no mortal man can discern the top thereof. And if we may believe Aristotle, then are all these inferiour to Caucasus, which he maketh the most notorious both for breadth and height. ^c Caucasus mons omnium maximus, qui æstivum ad ortum sunt, acumine atque latitudine, cuius juga a sole radiantur usque ad conticinium ab ortu: & iterum ab occasu. Caucasus (saith Aristotle) is the greatest mountain both for breadth and height of all those in the north-east, whose tops are lightened by the sun beams, usque ad conticinium (which is, saith Macrobius) between the first crowing after midnight and the break of day: others affirm, that the top of this mountain holds the sun beams when it is dark in the valley; but I cannot believe either: for the highest mountain of the world known, is that of Tenerif in the Canaries: which although it hath nothing to the westward of it for 1000 leagues together but the ocean sea, yet doth it not enjoy the sun's company at any such late hours. Besides, these mountains which Aristotle calleth Caucasi, are those which separate Colchis from Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth divide both Colchis, Iberia and Albania, from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the river of Phasis riseth in the same mountain, which himself calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those hills which sunder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterwards into Euxinus: which river (it is manifest) yieldeth it self to the sea two degrees to the north of Trapezus (now Trabesunda) howsoever Mercator brings it from Paryardes.

† XII.

Of divers incongruities, if in this story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth first appear, that there is no certainty what mountain Ararat was: for the books of the Sibyls set it in Phrygia; and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus's authority, those men have great want of proofs that borrow from thence.

Secondly, That Baris was the highest hill, and therefore most likely that the ark grounded thereon, the assertion and supposition have equal credit: for there are many hills which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the ark should sit on the highest.

Thirdly, It cannot be proved that there is any such hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris; for Baris (saith Jerome) signifieth high towers: and so may all high hills be called indifferently; and therefore we may better give the name of Baris to the hills of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) than to any hills of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the east, are undoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, The authors themselves do not agree in what region the mountains Gordiæi stand: for Ptolemy distinguisheth the mountains of Armenia from the Gordiæan, and calleth those of Armenia Moschici and Paryardes, as aforesaid. Now Paryardes is seated near the middle of Armenia, out of which on the west side riseth Euphrates, and out of the east side Araxis: and the mountains Moschici are those hills which disjoin Colchis, Iberia and Albania (now the country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

† XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia to the place noted in the text: and that it is no marvel that the same ledge of hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all along: and even in India be called Ararat.

LASTLY, we must blow up this mountain Ararat it self, or else we must dig it down, and carry it out of Armenia; or find it elsewhere, and in a warmer country, and (withal) set it east from Shinaar: or else we shall wound the truth it self with the weapons of our own vain imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to every eye, we must understand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one hill, so called, no more than any one hill among those mountains, which divide Italy from France, is called the Alps: or any one among those, which part France from Spain, is the Pyrenean; but as these being, continuations of many hills, keep one name in divers countries: so all that long ledge of mountains, which Pliny calleth by one name ^d Taurus, and Ptolemy both Taurus, Niphates, Coatras, Coronus, Sariphi, until they encounter and cross the mountains of the great Imaus, are of one general name, and are called the mountains of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabouts they seem to arise. So all these mountains of Hyrcania, Armenia, Coraxis, Caspii, Moschici, Amazonici, Eniochi, Scythici (thus diversly called by Pliny, and others) Ptolemy calls by one name Caucasus, lying between the seas Caspium and ^a Plin. l. 6. c. 9. ^b Plutar. Mundi. Cosm. ^c Aristot. Met. cor. l. 1. c. 13. ^d Pliny in his description of Lycia. l. 5. c. 27.

Euxinus: as all those mountains which cut asunder America, even from the new kingdom of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these mountains of Ararat run east and west: so do those marvellous mountains of Imaus stretch themselves north and south; and being of like extent, well near, are called by the name of Imaus, even as Pliny calleth these former hills Taurus, and Moses the hills of Ararat. The reason of several names given by Ptolemy was, thereby the better to distinguish the great regions and kingdoms, which these great mountains bound and dis sever; as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Affyria, Media, Susiana, Persia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana and Paropanifus: having all these kingdoms either on the north or south-side of them. For all the mountains of Asia (both the less and the greater) have three general names (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucasus: and they receive other titles, as they sever and divide particular places and regions. For these mountains which sunder Cilicia from the rest of Asia the less on the north-side, are called Taurus; and those mountains which part it from Comagena (a province of Syria) are called Amanus: the mountains called Taurus running east and west, as Imaus doth north and south. Though Taurus the river of Euphrates forceth her passage, leaving the name of Amanus to the mountains on her west-bank; and on her east-side the mountains are sometimes known by the name of Taurus (as in Ptolemy's three tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates (as in the fourth) retaining that uncertain appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia: and after the the river of Tigris cutteth them asunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, until they separate Affyria and Media; but then they call themselves Coatras, tho' between the upper and nether Media, they do not appear, but altogether discontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but run through the eastern Media by pieces: in the middle of which region they call themselves Orontes, and towards the east-part Coronus; out of the southern part whereof the river of Bagradus riseth, which divideth the ancient Persia from Caramania: and then continuing their course eastward by the name of Coronus, they give to the Parthians and Hyrceanians their proper countries. This done, they change themselves into the mountains of Sariphi, out of which riseth the river Margus, afterwards yielding herself to Oxus (now Abia) and drawing now near their ways end, they first make themselves the south border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the title of Paropanifus; and lastly of Caucasia, even where the famous river of Indus with his principal companions Hydaspis and Zarædrus spring forth, and take beginning. And here do these mountains build themselves exceeding high, to equal the strong hills called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35, 36, and 37 degrees of latitude, and in 140 of longitude: of the which the west parts are now called Lelanguer, and the rest Nagracot; and these mountains in this place only are properly called Caucasi (saith ^a Ptolemy) that is, between Paropanifus and Imaus: and improperly, between the two seas of Caspium and Pontus.

† XIV.

Of the best vine naturally growing on the south side of the mountains Caucas, and towards the East-Indies: and of other excellencies of the soil.

NOW in this part of the world it is, where the mountain and river Janus, and the mountain Nifeus (so called of Bacchus Nifeus or Noa) are found: and on these highest mountains of that part of the world did Goropius Becanus conceive that the ark of Noah grounded after the flood: of all his conjectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indoscythia he hath many good arguments, tho' mix'd with other fantastical opinions of this subject. And as the same Becanus also noteth; that as in this part of the world are found the best vines: so it is as true, that in the same line, and in 34, 35, and 36 degrees of septentrional latitude are the most delicate wines of the world, namely, in Judea, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this region of Margiana, and under these mountains, Strabo affirmeth that the most excellent vines of the world are found; the clusters of grapes containing two cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in climate with that part of Palestina, where the searchers of the land by Moses's direction found bunches of equal bigness at ^b Eshcol.

The fruitfulness of this place, to wit, on the south bottom of these hills, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana, near the mountains of Meros, did Alexander feast himself and his army ten days together, finding therein the most delicate wine of all other.

† XV.

The conclusion, with a brief repeating of divers chief points.

AND therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those mountains do also traverse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it self sometimes is known by the name of Ararat. But as ^c Pliny giveth to this ledge of high hills, even from Cilicia to Paropanifus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the hills of France and Germany are called the Alps: and all between France and Spain the Pyrenees: and in America the continuation of hills for 3000 miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the general name which Moses gave them; the diversity of appellations no otherwise growing, than by their dividing and bordering divers regions and divers countries. For in the like case do we call the sea, which entreth by Gibraltar, the Mediterranean and inland sea; and yet where it washeth the coasts of Carthage, and over-against it, it is called Tyrrhenum: between Italy and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo, Adriaticum: between Athens and Asia, Ægeum: between Seslus and Abydus, Hellepont: and afterwards Pontus, Propontis and Bosphorus. And as in these, so is the ocean to the north-east part of Scotland called Deucalidonicum: and on this side, the British sea: to the east, the German and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this question we must appeal to that judge which cannot err, even to the word of truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plain sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction than the words bear literally, because they are used to the very same plain purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely where the sense is plain (and being so understood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconvenience or contrariety) we ought to be wary, how we fancy to our selves any new or strange exposition; and (withal) to resolve our selves, that every word (as aforesaid) hath his weight in God's book. And therefore we must respect and reverence the testimonies of the scriptures throughout, in such sort as St. Augustine hath taught us touching the gospel of

^a Ptol. Tab. Afie. ^b Numb 13. 24. ^c Lib. 5. c. 27.

Christ Jesus, which is, Nequis aliter accipiat, quod (narrantibus discipulis Christi) in evangelio legerit, quam si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, conspexerit. That no man otherwise take or understand that which he readeth in the gospel (the disciples of Christ having written it) than if he had seen the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his own body, setting it down.

The words then of Moses which end this dispute are these: ^a And as they went from the east they found a plain in the land of Shinaar, and there they abode; which proveth without controversy, that Nimrod, and all with him came from the east into Shinaar; and therefore the ark of Noah rested and took land to the eastward thereof. For we must remember, that in all places wherefoever Moses maketh a difference of countries, he always precisely nameth towards what quarters of the world the same were seated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Jofan, he nameth Sephar, a mount in the east: where he remembreth Cain's departure from the presence of God, he addeth: ^b And Cain dwelt in the land of Nod towards the east-side of Eden: and when he describeth the tents and habitations of Abraham after he departed from Sechem, he useth these words: ^c Afterwards removing thence unto a mountain eastward from Bethel, he pitched his tents: having Bethel on the west side, and Hai on the east: and afterwards in the 9th verse of the same chapter it is written; And Abraham went forth journeying towards the south: also when ^d Ezekiel prophesied of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these nations of Togorma were of the north quarters: and of the queen of Saba it is written, That ^e she came from the south to visit Solomon: And the ^f magi (or wise men) came out of the east to offer presents unto Christ. And that all regions, and these travels were precisely set down upon the points of the compass and quarters of the world, it is most manifest: for Eden was due east from Judea, Saba south from Jerusalem: the way from Bethel to Egypt directly south; and the Cœlesyrians, the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the regions directly north from Palestina: and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that valley of Babylonia, is not a journeying from the east, nor so near unto the east as the north: for Armenia is to the west of the north it self; and we must not say of Moses (whose hands the Holy Ghost directed) that he erred toto cœlo, and that he knew not east from west. For the body of Armenia standeth in 43 degrees septentrional, and the north part thereof in 45; and those Gordiean mountains, whereon it was supposed that the ark rested, stand in 41. But Babylonia, and the valley of Shinaar are situated in 35, and for the longitude (which maketh the difference between east and west) the Gordiean mountains stand in 75 degrees, and the valley of Shinaar in 79 and 80. And therefore Armenia lieth from Shinaar north-west, 95 degrees from the east; and if Armenia had been but north, yet it had differed from the east one whole quarter of the compass. But Gregory and Jerome warn us, In scripturis ne minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabæ, apices & puncta in divina scriptura plena sunt sensibus. In the scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for every speech, syllable, note or accent, and point, in divine scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth us that the children of Noah came from the east, we may not believe writers (of little authority) who also speak by hearsay, and by report, Ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein, without any examination of the text, at all adventure. But this is infallibly true, that Shinaar lieth west from the place where the ark of Noah rested after the flood; and therefore it first found ground in the east, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The east parts were first civil, which had Noah himself for an instructor: and directly east from Shinaar, in the same degree of 35, are the greatest grapes and the best wine. The great armies also, which overtopped in number those millions of Semiramis, prove that those parts were first planted: and whereas the other opinion hath neither scripture nor reason sufficient: for my self, I build on his words who in plain terms hath told us, that the sons of Noah came out of the east into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the ark rest on those eastern mountains, called by one general name Taurus, and by Moses the mountains of Ararat, and not on those mountains of the north-west, as Berosus first feigned, whom most part of the writers have followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentiful warm east where Noah rested, where he planted the vine, where he tilled the ground, and lived thereon. Placuit vero Noacho agriculturæ studium, in qua tractanda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eamque rem sua ipsius lingua Ish-Adamath (hoc est) telluris vir appellatur celebratusque est; The study of husbandry pleased Noah (saith the excellent learned man Arias Montanus) in the knowledge and order of which it is said, that Noah excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his own language a man exercised in the earth. Which also sheweth that he was no wanderer: and that he troubled not himself with the contentions beginning again in the world, and among men, but stay'd in his destin'd places, and in that part of the world, where he was first delivered out of the prison of the ark, whereinto God had committed him to preserve him and mankind.

C H A P. VIII.

Of the first planting of nations after the flood; and of the sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, by whom the earth was re-peopled.

SECT. I.

Whether Shem and Ham were elder than Japhet.

OF these sons of Noah, which was the eldest there is a question made. ^g St. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Japhet for the youngest: and herein the opinions of writers are divers. But this we find every where in the scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was never any respect given to the eldest in years, but in virtue, as by the examples of Enoch, Abraham, Jacob and David, is made manifest. In a few words, this is the ground of the controversy: the Latin translation, and so the Geneva, hath converted this scripture of Genesis x. 21. in these words; Unto Shem also the father of all the sons of Heber, and elder brother of Japhet, were children born. But Junius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same words in this manner: To Shem also the father of all the sons of Heber, and brother of Japhet, the eldest son were children born: so the transposition of the word [elder] made this difference. For if the word [elder] had followed after Japhet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it been as plain for Japhet, as it is by these translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing God's blessings are not tied to first and last in blood, but to the eldest in piety, yet the arguments are stronger for Japhet than for Shem. And where the scriptures are plainly understood without any danger or inconvenience, it seemeth strange why any man of judgment should make valuation of conjectural arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah, in the five hundredth year of his life, begat the first of his three sons Shem, Ham, and Japhet: and in the six hundredth year, to wit, the hundredth year following, came the general flood; two years after which ^a Shem begat Arphaxad, which was in the year 602 of Noah's life, and in the year of Shem's life one hundred: so, as Shem was but one hundred years old, two years after the flood: and Noah begat his first-born, being 500 years old; and therefore, were Shem the elder, he had then been 100 years old at the flood, and in the six hundredth year of Noah's life, and not two years after. Which seeing the scriptures before remembered hath denied him, and that it is also written: ^b Then Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger son had done unto him, to wit, Ham; of necessity the first place doth belong to Japhet. This younger son so converted by the vulgar and Geneva, Junius turns it Filius minimus, his youngest son; but St. Chrysostom takes it otherwise, and finds Ham to be the middle or second brother, and Japhet the youngest son of all: which Ham, for his disobedience and the contempt of his father, (whose nakedness he derided) was disinherited, and lost the pre-eminency of his birth, as ^c Esau and Reuben did. Pererius conceiveth that Ham was called the younger in respect of Shem the eldest, but avoweth withal, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparative degree. It is true that Shem himself was always named in the first place, yet whereas in the first verse of the tenth chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Japhet; in the second verse Moses leaveth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Japhet first. So the first place was given to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weighty respect, that the Hebrew nation, Abraham, the prophets, David and Christ our Saviour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the vulgar, Pagninus, and the Geneva, who agree in this conversion, Shem frater Japhet major; or with the Septuagint, Junius, and Tremelius, Shem fratri Japhet majoris; or with Pererius, Shem frater Japhet ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Japhet, let the reader judge.

But for ought that I have seen to the contrary, it appeareth to me that Japhet was the eldest. For where Pererius qualifyeth the strength of the former argument, that Shem's age at the time of the flood did not agree with the eldership (with a supposition that the scriptures took no account of smaller numbers) I do not find in the scriptures any such neglect at all: For it is written, that ^d Shem was an hundred years old, and begat Arphaxad two years after the flood: and again in the 12th verse, So Shem lived after he begat Eber four hundred and three years, &c. So as the number of two years, of three years, of five years, and afterwards of two years were always precisely accounted.

SECT. II.

Of divers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the world, as that all histories must yield to Moses: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that the known great lords of the first ages were of the issue of Ham.

BUT let us go unto the world's plantation after the flood, which being rightly understood, we shall find that many nations have supposed or feigned themselves those ancestors and fathers, which never saw or approached the bounds of their countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plain in the scriptures how the sons and issues of Noah were distributed, and what regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any profane author may receive allowance herein, the same must be with this caution, that they take their beginning where the scriptures end. For so far as the story of nations is therein handled, we must know that both the truth and antiquity of the books of God find no companions equal, either in age or authority. All record, memory, and testimony of antiquity whatsoever, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath been borrowed thence, and therefore later than it, as all careful observers of time have noted: among which thus writeth Eusebius in the proem of his chronology. Moses is found more ancient than all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as Homer, Hesiod, and the Trojan war; and far before Hercules, Musæus, Linus, Chiron, Orpheus, Castor, Pollux, Æsculapius, Bacchus, Mercurius, and Apollo, and the rest of the Gods of the nations, their ceremonies, or holy rites, or prophets: and before all the deeds of Jupiter, whom the Greeks have seated in the top and highest turret of their divinity.

For of the three Jupiters remembered by ^e Cicero, the ancientest was the son of Æther, whose three sons begotten on Proserpina, were born at Athens, of which Cecrops was the first king: and in the end of Cecrops's time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Egypt. Eduxit Moses populum Dei ex Ægypto novissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensis regis; Moses brought the children of Israel out of Egypt, in the last days of Cecrops king of the Athenians, saith ^f St. Augustine: and yet was not Cecrops the founder of the city it self, but Theseus long after him. But because the truth hereof is diversly proved, and by many learned authors, I will not cut asunder the purpose in hand by alledging many authorities, in a needless question, but leave it to the proper place.

The sons of Japhet were	{ Gomer . Magog . Madai . Javan . Tubal . Mesbach . and Tiras .	The sons of Gomer were	{ Askenaz . Riphat . Togorma .

First, We are to consider that the world after the flood was not planted by imagination, neither had the children of Noah wings, to fly from Shinaar to the uttermost border of Europe, Africa, and Asia in haste, but that these children were directed by a wise father, who knew those parts of the world before the flood, to which he disposed his children after it, and sent them not as discoverers, or at all adventure, but assigned and allotted to every son, and their issues, their proper parts. And not to hearken to fabulous authors, who have no other end than to flatter princes (as Virgil did Augustus in the fiction of Aeneas) or else to glorify their own nations: let us build upon the scriptures themselves, and after them upon reason and nature. First therefore, we must call to mind and consider, what manner of face the earth every where had in the 130th year after the great inundation, and, by comparing those fruitfullest valleys with our own barren and cold ground, inform our selves thereby, what wonderful desarts, what impassable fastness of woods, reeds, briers and rotten grass, what lakes, and standing pools, and what marshes, fens, and bogs, all the face of the earth (excepting the mountains) was pestered withal. For if in this our climate (where the dead and destroying winter depresseth all vegetative and growing nature, for one half of the year in effect) yet in twenty or thirty years, these our grounds would not all overgrow and be covered (according to the nature thereof) either with woods or with other offensive thickets and bushments: much more did all sorts of plants, reeds, and trees, prosper in the most fruitful valleys, and in the climate of a long and warm summer, and having withal the start of 130 years to raise themselves without controulment.

This being considered, it will appear, that all these people which came into Shinaar, and over whom Nimrod either by order or strength took the dominion, did after the confusion of languages, and at such time as they grew to be a mighty people, disperse themselves into the regions adjoining to the said valley of Shinaar, which contained the best part of Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldea, and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated: some of them towards the south, others towards the west and north. And altho' there were allotted to Shem many regions both east and west from Shinaar, with the dominion of Palestina, which the Canaanites first possess'd; yet could he not enjoy the lot of his inheritance on the sudden, but by time and degrees. For we find, that Abraham the true successor of Shem, dwelt in Chaldea at Ur; and from thence (called by God) he rested at Charran in Mesopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare, he travelled to Sichem in Palestina; and yet there had passed between Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themselves) seven descents, before Abraham moved out of Chaldea: where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many years, and whence Nimrod went out into Affyria, and founded Nineveh. Indeed the great masters of nations (as far as we can know) were, in that age of the issues of Ham; the blessing of God given by Noah to Shem and Japhet taking less effect, until divers years were consumed; and until the time arrived, which by the wisdom of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan came the people, and princes, which held the great kingdoms of Babylonia, Syria, and Egypt, for many descents together.

S E C T. III.

(Of the isles of the Gentiles in Japhet's portion: of Berosus's too speedy seating Gomer the son of Japhet in Italy; and another of Japhet's sons Tubal in Spain: and of the antiquity of Longinque Navigation.

TO begin therefore where Moses beginneth with the sons of Japhet, among whom the isles of the Gentiles were divided: which division, as well to Japhet's sons, as to the rest which came into Shinaar, was (if the division were made at Phaleg's birth) in the year of the world 1757 or 1758, and (by that account) in the year after the flood one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere.

The habitations proper to the sons of Japhet were the isles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe, with all the islands adjoining and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an island, both in respect that the sea Hellepont and Ægeum, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut it off from the great continent of Asia, as also because Europe it self is, in effect, surrounded with water, saving that it is fastned to Asia by the north; for it hath those seas before named to the east, the Mediterranean to the south and south-west, the ocean to the west, and British, German and Baltick sea, with that of Glaciale to the north-north-east, and north-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or isles lying between Greece and the lesser Asia, and the isles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Crete or Candia, Sicilia, Corfica, Sardinia, Malta, the isles of Brittany and Zealand, with their young ones adjacent.

This partition and portion of Japhet, with the part which he held in Asia and the north, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah. ^a Dilatet Deus Japhet; Let God spread abroad (or encrease the posterity of) Japhet, and let him dwell in the tents of Shem. For tho' Junius here useth the word [alliciat] and not [dilatet] and the Geneva persuadeat; yet the Septuagint have dilatet or amplificet; and such was the blessing given to our fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his seed for ever. And the dwelling in the tents or tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the posterity of Japhet: noting not only an enlargment of territories; but that thereby they should be made participant of God's church. But to come to Japhet's sons, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may believe Berosus and Annius, whose authority the greatest number of all our late writers have followed) did in the tenth year of Nimrod's reign depart from Babylonia, and planted Italy: which also ^b Functius confirmeth in these words, Anno decimo Nimrodi, &c. In the tenth year of Nimrod's reign, Gomerus Gallus planted a colony in that land afterwards called Italy: and in the twelfth year of the same Nimrod's reign, Tubal seated himself in Asturia in Spain (now called Biscay) which was in the 140th and in the 142d years after the flood, according to Berosus. But this opinion is very ridiculous: For before the confusion of tongues the children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let us therefore consider with reason, what time the building such a city and tower required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any ready means to perform such a work as Nimrod had erected (and as Functius himself out of his author Berosus witnesseth) Ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium; To the height and magnitude of the mountains. Sure that both this city and tower were almost built, the scriptures witness. ^c But the Lord came down to see the city and tower, which the sons of men built. Let us then but allot a time sufficient for the making of brick to such a work, of the greatest height (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that ever was. For where the universal flood covered the highest mountains fifteen cubits; Let us build us a city and a tower (saith Nimrod) whose top may reach unto the heaven: meaning, that they would raise their work above fifteen cubits higher than the highest mountain, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the fear of a second inundation : a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the work. They also began this building upon a ground, the most oppressed with waters of all the world : as by the great ruin which these waters forcibly overbearing and overflowing, made in the time of the succeeding emperors, is made manifest, approved also by the prophet Jeremy, speaking of Babylon in these words ; Thou that dwellest upon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantial foundation for so high a rais'd building on a marshy ground : and to which Glycas upon Genesis giveth forty years. For it seemeth, that the tower was near finished when God overthrew it : it being afterwards written, So the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the earth, and they left to build the city. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the tower is not then named) that they very near had performed the work of their suppos'd defence, which was the tower : and that afterwards they went on with the city adjoining, wherein they inhabited. It is also to be noted, that till such time as this confusion seized them (whereupon the tower was thrown down) these nations did not disperse themselves : for ^a from thence the Lord scattered them upon all the earth, that was ; when they perceived not one another's speech. Now to think that this work in the newness of the world (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten years ; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same year could creep thro' 3000 miles of desert, with women, children, and cattle ; let those light believers, that neither tie themselves to the scripture, nor to reason, approve it, for I do not. And if the ark of Noah was 100 years in building, or but near such a time, and then, when the world had stood 1556 years, it were more than foolishness and madness it self, to think that such a work as this could be performed in ten ; when the world (from the flood to the arrival at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131 years, and whereof they had spent some part in travelling from the east. Again, if all Asia set to their helping hands in the building of the temple of ^b Diana, and yet they consumed in that work 400 years (or be it but half that time) and in such an age as when the world flourished in all sorts of artificers, and with abundant plenty of materials and carriages, this work of the tower of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those few years remembred. And for conclusion, let all men of judgment weigh with themselves how impossible it was for a nation or family of men, with their wives and children, and cattle, to travel 3000 miles through woods, bogs, and desarts, without any guide or conductor ; and we shall find it rather a work of 100 years than of 100 days. For in the West-Indies, of which the Spaniards have the experience, in those places where they found neither path nor guide, they have not entered the country ten miles in ten years. And if Nimrod's people spent many years by the account before remembred in passing from the East-Indies, or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115 degrees of longitude, until they came into Shinaar which lieth in 79 degrees (the distance between those places containing 36 degrees, which make 720 leagues, which is 2160 miles) and did all the way keep the mountains and hard ground ; then the difference between Babylon and Biscay is much more : for the body of Biscay lieth in ten degrees, and Babylon or Shinaar (as aforesaid) in 79 : so the length of way from Shinaar to Asturia or Biscay, is 69 degrees, which make 1380 leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod took divers years to find Shinaar, which was but 2160 miles : or (supposing that the ark rested in Armenia) little above 400 miles, there is no cause to the contrary, but to allow as many years to Gomer and Tubal to travel 3000 miles to countries less known unto them by far, than the land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradise was known to Noah before the flood, and so was the region of Eden by Moses afterwards remembred ; but what he understood of most part of the world else, it is unknown. And therefore did Annius ill advise himself to plant Gomer in Italy, and Tubal in Spain, in the 10th and 12th of Nimrod's reign : ^c Shall the earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a nation be born at once? But it may be objected, that the sons of Japhet might come by sea, and so save this great travel through desarts by land. But we never read of any navigation in those days, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbark so great a people, as we may justly suppose those conductors carried with them, will not easily believe, that there were any vessels in those days to transport armies, and withal their cattle, by whose milk they lived and fed their children : for milk and fruit were the banqueting dishes of our forefathers. And in the eldest times, even the kings and fathers of nations valued themselves by the herds and numbers of their cattle : who had flocks of sheep, and great droves and herds of their own, and their own shepherds and herdsmen. Now if Tubal had pass'd by sea from any part of Palestina, Syria or Cilicia, he might have made good choice within the Streights, and not have overgone Granado, Valencia, and other provinces in that tract ; pass'd the Streights of Gibraltar, disdain'd all Andalusia and Portugal, with all those goodly ports and countries, and have sought out the iron, woody, and barren country of the world, called Biscay, by a long and dangerous navigation. But before the journey of the Argonautæ, there were scarce any vessels that durst cross the seas in that part of the world : and yet that which Jason had, if the tale be true, was but a galley, and a poor one (God knows) and perchance such as they use this day in Ireland ; which altho' it carried but four and fifty passengers, yet was it far greater than any of the former times : ^d Erat enim antea parvarum navicularum usus ; For in former times they used very small vessels. I deny not but that the Tyrians gave themselves of old to far-off navigations, whence Tibullus ascribed the invention of ships unto them.

Tyrus knew first how ships might use the wind.

And for those boats ^f Longæ naves, or gallies, Pliny saith, that Ægeſias ascribeth the device to Paralus : and Philostephanus to Jason : Ctesias to Samyras ; and Saphanus to Semiramis : Archimachus to Ægeon ; to which invention the Erythræi are said to have added certain numbers of oars, and then ^g Aminocles the Corinthian to have encreased them : the Carthaginians afterwards to have brought them to four banks : the Quinque Remi first to have been used by Nesichton the Salaminian, with which vessels in those parts of the world, the Romans served themselves in the Punick war. But these be, perhaps, but the partialities of writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cast the devising of these gallies on Sesoſtris, tho' Se- miramis used them in the passage of her army over Indus in Abraham's time. So it is said, that ^a Danaus was the first that brought a ship into Greece: and yet the Samothracians challenge the invention; and yet Tertullian, on the contrary, gives it to Minerva: others to Neptune; Thucydides to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those ages, as the Egyptians used to coast the shores of the Red sea upon rafts devised by king Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Britains had a kind of boat (with which they cross'd the seas) made of small twigs, and covered over with leather: of which kind I have seen at the Dingle in Ireland, and elsewhere. Naves ex corio circumfute in oceano Britannico (saith Textor :) of which Lucan the poet :

*Primum cana salix, madefacto vimine, parvam

And altho' it cannot be denied, when Noah by God's inspiration was instructed in so many particulars concerning the ark, that then many things concerning navigation were first revealed; yet it appears that there was much difference between the ark of Noah, and such ships as were for any long navigation. Yea, ancient stories shew, that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume upon any long voyages to sea: at least, with multitudes of women, and children, and cattle: as also common reason can tell us, that even now when this art is come to her perfection, such voyages are very troublesome and dangerous. So as it doth appear, that there was not in that age of Nimrod, any ship, or use of ships, fit for any long navigation. For if Gomer and Tubal had passed themselves and their people by sea; the exercise of navigation would not have been dead for so many hundred years after. Leaving therefore the fabulous to their fables, and all men else to their fancies, who have cast nations into countries far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the relation of Moses and the prophets; to which truth there is joined both nature, reason, policy, and necessity: and to the rest, neither probability, nor possibility.

SECT. IV.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal and Mesech, seated first about Asia the less, out of Ezekiel xxxviii. 39.

NOW altho' many learned and reverend men have formed (I know not whereby led) a plantation of the world, which also hath been and is received: yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great learned man of this latter age, Arias Montanus, was also in some things much mistaken: and for Josephus, as he hath many good things, and is a guide to many errors withal, so was he in this plantation of the world very gross and fabulous, whereby both Eusebius, Hierosolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that have taken his testimonies for current, have been by him far misled.

But the better to conceive what regions of the world Gomer the first son of Japhet possess'd, as also Tubal, it is needful to begin with Magog; because the scriptures take most knowledge of Gog and Magog, which two names have troubled many commentators, saith Matth. Beroaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that ever I read) I find most judicious in the examination of this plantation. He takes authority from the prophet Ezekiel chiefly, who in the 38th and 39th chapter directeth us what nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was prince or chief conductor in their attempts against Israel: for besides the portions of Europe, and the north-east parts of the greater Asia, which Japhet's issues possess'd, all Asia the less was peopled by them. And that those of the issue of Japhet (whom Ezekiel speaks of) were seated hereabout, it may best appear, if we consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependency upon the former prophecy in the 37th chapter: for in that 37th chapter, ^b Ezekiel prophesieth of the uniting of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judab, after their delivery from captivity.

By which prophecy of Ezekiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to give life to dead bones, and to rule them by one prince. For to that purpose it is written; And David my servant shall be king over them, and they shall have one shepherd, that is, they shall be united as they were in David's times. Hereupon in the 38th chapter Ezekiel prophesieth against those nations, which should seek to impeach this union, and disturb the people of Israel, whom God purposed to receive to grace, and promised to restore. And so in the same chapter are those nations coupled together, which infested the Israelites after their return, and sought to subject them: all which were the subjects or allies of Gog, prince of the Magogians, or Cælesyrians, next bordering Palestina or the holy land, followed also by the rest of the nations of Asia the less, which lay north from Judea. The words of Ezekiel are these; Son of man, set thy face against Gog, and against the land of Magog the chief princes of Mesech (or Mosoch) and Tubal: and afterward, Behold, I come against the chief prince of Mesech and Tubal: and in the sixth verse, Gomer and all his bands, and the house of Togorma of the north quarters. Herein Ezekiel having first delivered the purpose of his prophecy, teacheth what nations they were, that should in vain assail Israel. He joineth them together under their prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the north quarters of Judab, and how seated and joined together. Gog signifieth in the Hebrew (saith St. Jerome) tectum or covering of a house: and Pintus upon Ezekiel affirmeth, that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for, saith he, Antichristus erit diaboli tegumentum sub specie humana; That Antichrist shall be the covering of the devil under human form. He addeth that Magog is as much to say as Gog: the letter [M] being an Hebrew preposition, and importeth as much as of or from: so he taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So far Pintus, at least in this, is not amiss, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person, but for a nation, with which agreeth this observation of Beroaldus. Magog, saith he, in Hebrew is written Ham Magog, which sheweth Magog to be a region or nation: for the letter [He] which is used but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrews call Hebraïdia) is never added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was prince of that nation (called either Magog, or according to others the people of Gog) also prince of Mesech (or Mosoch) and of Tubal: as by the first verse of the 39th chapter is made manifest, Behold, I come against thee Gog the chief prince of Mesech and Tubal. This must needs be meant by the successors of Seleucus Nicanor, who did not (as other conquering nations) seek to make the Jews their tributaries only, but endeavoured by all means, and by all kind of violence, to extinguish the religion it self (which the Hebrews profess'd) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serve the mortal and rotten Gods of the heathen; of which nothing remained but the very name, and dead images. ^a St. Ambrose and Isidore take Gog for the nation of the Goths: belike, because they invaded Europe, and sack'd Rome and many other places and cities thereabouts. Hermolaus Barbarus out of Pomp. Mela derives the Turks from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a man: others of a region: others for a nation inhabiting a region, as Junius, who says that Gog is the name of a nation, denominated from him whom the Greek stories call Gyges: who in former time having slain Candaules the Lydian, gave his own name to that nation, thence after called Gygades: and therefore also the Gygean lake, which lake ^b Strabo also findeth in Lydia (of which Gyges was king) 40 furlongs from Sardis. Pliny calleth it Gygeum stagnum. Herodotus and Nicanor set it about the rivers of Hyllus, and Mæander; but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Gyges king of Lydia: who after he had subdued the country about the river Rhodus which runneth into the Hellepont, called the promontory Trapeze after his own name Gyges. These opinions do also seem to strengthen that of ^c Junius. For Magog, saith he, is that part of Asia the less, which Halyattes obtained; and after him his son Cræsus; who (as ^d Junius further notes) having mastered all those regions as far south as Libanus, in that border built the city Gigarta or Gogkarta (which in the Syrian signifieth the city of Gog) seated in Cælesyria, whose people were the ancient enemies of the Jews.

Now that Magog is found in Cælesyria, Pliny affirmeth, saying; Cælesyria habet Bambycen, quæ alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur, Syris vero Magog; Cælesyria hath it in Bambyce, which by another name is called Hierapolis, but of the Syrians, Magog. He further telleth us that the monstrous idol Atergatis, called by the Greeks Deiceto, was here worshipped; Lucian makes mention hereof, saying that the city had anciently another name, which yet he expresseth not; forbearing perhaps the word Magog, as sounding nothing elegantly in the Greek. But if we may believe ^e Strabo, then was Edeffa in Mesopotamia the same Bambyce or Hierapolis, where the same idol was worshipped. Ortelius is doubtful whether one of these authors did not mistake the place of this Bambyce or Hierapolis. It may well enough be that the same name and religion was common to them both. Certain it is, that both of them lay due north from Palestina, and were both subject unto the kings of the race of Seleucus. Now I do not condemn the opinion of Hermolaus Barbarus following Josephus, but grant that perhaps Magog might also be the father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made the prince of Magog, the nations of Cælesyria, and the north parts adjoining, be meant by Magog: for by a latter plantation from these parts, they might be propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to be denied, that the Scythians in old times coming out of the north-east, wasted the better part of Asia the less, and possess'd Cælesyria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezekiel had reference, it is very plain: for this city Hierapolis, or Magog, standeth due north from Judea, according to the words of Ezekiel, that from the north quarters those nations should come. For as the kings of the south which infested the Israelites were the Ptolemies kings of Egypt: so those of the north were the kings of Asia and Syria, the successors of Seleucus, the successor of Alexander Macedon. Gulielmus Tyrius thinks that this Hierapolis is that Rages, mentioned in the story of Tobias. ^f Pliny takes it not only to have been called Bambyce, as we have said, but also Edeffa: not that by Euphrates, but another of the same name; now the known name is Alepo: for so Bellonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This city had the title of sacred, as the sacred city (for so the word Hierapolis signifieth) yet was it a place of most detestable idolatry; and wherein was worshipped the idol of the mermaid Atergatis, or Atingis, according to Pliny, which the Greeks call Deiceto.

If then we confer the words of Ezekiel in the 3d verse of the 38th chapter, wherein he joineth together Gog, Mesech, and Tubal: and withal remember that Hierapolis was the city of Magog, which also is seated directly north from Judea: with whom also Ezekiel coupleth Gomer, and all his bands of the north quarters; we may, as I conceive, safely conclude, that these followers and vassals of Gog (which were northern nations in respect of Judea) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spain, but a people of lesser Asia, and Cælesyria: and therefore that the opinions of Berosus, Josephus, and whosoever else hath followed them therein are to be rejected. But if Josephus refer himself to later times, and think that some colony of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Asia pass into Spain (to wit, from that piece of land between Colchis or Mengrelia) and Albania (most part possessed by the Georgians) then is his judgment of better allowance. For without any repugnancy of opinions, it may be granted, that in process of time these people might from their first habitation pass into the countries near the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after-ages into Spain.

Josephus makes mention of the Iberi, saying, that they were anciently called Thobelos, as of Tubal; from whence, saith Justin, they passed into Spain to search out the mines of that region: having belike understood that it was a southerly country, and mountainous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines, called Chalybes, lived altogether by the exchange of iron, and other metals, as Apollonius witnesseth in these following verses, telling how the Argonauts did visit them.

*Hæc gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas scindit sub montibus altis:
Mercibus hæc mutat, quæ vitæ alimenta ministrant.*

The Chalybes plough not their barren soil,
But undermine high hills for iron veins:
Changing the purchase of their endless toil
For merchandise, which their poor lives sustains.

But it is more probable, that Spain was first peopled by the Africans, who had ever since an affection to return thither, and to re-people it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were

were easily drawn to pass over the streights into that country ; and after by the Moors who held Granado, and the south parts 800 years, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are more probable, than that in the 12th year of Nimrod's reign, Tubal pass'd into Spain, and therein built St. Uval: a poor town, and a poor device, God knows. Certain it is, that we must find Mosoch or Mesech, and Tubal neighbours, and Gomer and Togorma not far off, or else we shall wrong Ezekiel: for he called Gog the leader or prince of Mesech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togorma their assistants. And that Mesech inhabited Asia, Functius (tho' he followed Berosus) confesseth, for these be his words; Mesacus, qui a Mose Mesech, priscos Mesios ab Adula monte usque ad Ponticam regionem posuit: hæc regio postea Cappadocia dicta est, in qua urbs Mazica, &c. hæc est terra Magog principalis: Mesacus, whom Moses calleth Alesech, placed the ancient Mesians from the mount Adulas, unto the coast of Pontus. This region was afterwards called Cappadocia, in which is the town Mazica, &c. this is the principal country of Magog. And this doth Annius also avow, and yet forgets that Gog was prince both of Mesech and Tubal: and therefore, that the one was a nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spain lying directly west, and not north from Judea. Also Ezekiel in the 27th chapter, where he prophesieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Mesech and Tubal jointly. And for a final proof, that these nations were of a northern neighbour land (how far soever stretched) Ezekiel in the 38th chapter makes them all horsemen. Thou, and much people with thee, all shall ride upon horses, even a great multitude and a mighty. Then if any man believe that these troops came out of Spain over the Pyrenees, and first pass'd over a part of France, Italy, Hungary and Sarmatia, and imbarck'd again about the Hellepont, or else compassed all Pontus Euxinus, to come into the lesser Asia, which is half the length or compass of the then known world, he may be called a strong believer, but he shall never be justified thereby. But on the contrary it is known, that Seleucis was a province neighbouring Palestina or Judea, and that Hierapolis, or Magog, joined unto it: whose princes commanded all Syria, and Asia the less, namely, the Seleucidae; and held it, till Scipio Asiaticus overthrew Antiochus the great: after which they yet possess'd Syria till the time of Tigranes: and whether Mesech be in Cappadocia, or under Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the same dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be said. First he seated himself with Togorma, not far from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterwards he proceeded further into Asia the less; and in long tract of time his valiant issue filled all Germany, rested long in France and Britain, and possessed the utmost borders of the earth, accomplishing (as Melancthon well notes) the signification of their parents name, which is utmost bordering. But when these borderers wanted further place, whereinto they might exonerate their swelling multitudes, that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they return upon the nations, occupying the countries, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy restorer of our antiquities, Mr. William Camden, hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old language doth signify robbers; necessity inforcing them to spoil their neighbours, to whom in their original they were as near joined, as afterwards in the seats which they possessed. For that the warlike nations of Germany were in elder ages accustomed to be beaten by the Gauls, the authority of Cesar affirming it, is proof sufficient. But in times following they pursued richer conquests, and more easy, tho' further distant, by which (to omit their other enterprises not here to be spoken of) they were drawn at length into Asia the less, and occupied those parts, which had formerly been held by their progenitors. I say, not that they claimed those lands as theirs by descent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their own pedigree. Neither can any man therefore deny, that they were of old seated in Asia, because in late ages they returned thither; unless he will think, that all those nations which from far parts have invaded and conquered the land of Shinaar, may by that argument be proved not to have issued from thence at the first.

Now concerning Samoths (for his excellent wisdom surnamed Dis) whom Annius makes the brother of Gomer and Tubal (which brother Moses never heard of, who spake his knowledge of Japhet's sons) they must find him in some old poet: for Functius a great Berosian confesseth: Quis hic Samoths fuerit incertum est; Who this Samoths was it is uncertain; neither is there any proof that he was that same Dis, whom ^b Cesar saith the Gauls suppose to be their ancestor; yea, and Vignier confesseth with Functius: Mais on ne sçayt qui il estoit; No man knows who he was.

SECT. V.

Against the fabulous Berosus's fiction. That the Italian Janus was Noah.

BUT before I go on with Noah's sons, I think it necessary to disprove the fiction which Annius hath of Noah himself: an invention, indeed, very ridiculous, tho' warranted, as he hath wrested, by those authors of whom himself hath commented: as the fragment of Berosus, Fabius Pictor, Cato, Lavinus and others. For ^a Annius seeks to persuade us, that Noah (surnamed Janus) was the same which founded Genoa, with other cities in Italy, wherein he lived 92 years. This to disprove, by Moses's silence, is a sufficient argument to me, if there were nothing else to disprove it. For if he vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Achad, Chalne and Nineveh by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great mark to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92 years. But it were a needless labour for me to disprove the authority of that Berosus, on whom Annius groundeth, seeing so many learned men have so demonstratively proved that fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that, Tatianus the Assyrian, in his oration against the Greeks, avoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote only three books, dedicated to Antiochus the successor of Seleucus Nicanor: But ^c Annius hath devised five books, wherewith he honoureth Berosus. And whereas Berosus handled only the estate of the Chaldeans and Assyrians, Annius hath filled this fragment with the business of all the world. And if we may believe Eusebius better than Annius, then all the kings of the Latins (before Eneas) consumed but 150 years: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Eneas's arrival into Italy, there pass'd 1126 (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Janus (who was the first of their kings) lived at once with Ruth, who married Booz, in the world's year (as some reckon) 2717, after the flood 1064, and Noah died 350 years after the flood: and so there pass'd between Janus of Italy, and Noah surnamed Janus, 704 years. For Saturnus succeeded Janus, Picus after Saturnus, Faunus after Picus, and Latinus followed Faunus: which Latinus lived at once with Tautanes the 27th king of Affyria: with Pelias of Peloponnesus: with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampson judge of Israel. Now all these five kings of the Latins having consumed but 150 years; and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning upwards for 150 years, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Janus lived.

True it is, that the Greeks had their Janus; but this was not Noah: so had they Ion the son of Xuthus, the son of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Iones, who were indeed the children of Javan, the fourth son of Japhet. For the Vulgar translation (where the Hebrew word is Javan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint Hellas; which is the same. So had they Medus the son of Medea, whom they make the parent of the Medes, tho' they were descended of a far more ancient father, to wit, Madaï the 3d son of Japhet.

Lastly, we see by a true experience, that the British language hath remained among us above 2000 years, and the English speech ever since the invasion of the Angles: and the same continuance have all nations observed among themselves, tho' with some corruption and alteration. Therefore it is strange if either Noah (by them called Janus) had left in Italy his grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spain, that no plain resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian (which no time could have quite extinguished) should have been found in the languages of those countries. For which reasons we doubt not but these personal plantations of Janus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italy, Spain, or France, are merely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the Grecian Janus, which commanded them and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150 years, saith Eusebius, which was in the time of Latinus the 5th king: which also St. Augustine and Justin confirm: and this agreeth with reason, time and possibility. And if this be not sufficient to disprove this vanity, I may out of themselves add thus much: that whereas some of them make Vesta (others Camase-na) the wife of this Janus, who instituted the holy fire of the vestal virgins in Rome (the Latins and Romans taking from Janus all their idolatrous and heathenish ceremonies) there is no man so impious, as to believe that Noah himself (who is said by Moses to have walked with God, to be a just man, and whom God of all mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or so wicked and ungrateful, to set up or devise any heathen, savage, or idolatrous adoration, or have instituted any ceremony, contrary to that which he knew best-pleasing to God himself.

SECT. VI.

That Gomer also and his son Togorma of the posterity of Japhet were first seated about Asia the less: and that from thence they spread westward into Europe: and northward into Sarmatia.

TO turn now to the sons of Noah, and the world's plantation after the flood: therein I observe, that as both reason and necessity taught them; so, when they multiply'd in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next countries bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth colonies elsewhere, it was in such a manner as that they might repair to each other, and keep intelligence by river: because the land was yet desert and overpress'd with woods, reeds, bogs, and rotten marshes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chus took the south-part of Chaldea, down the river of Gebon, by which he might pass to and fro from Babylon to his own plantation: those also, which were of the race of Shem, inhabiting at Ur or Orchoa near the lakes of Chaldea, might by the same river get up to Babylon, and receive succour from thence. All which tract of land upon Gebon southward, Moses in the description of Paradise calleth the land of Cush: because the dominion and empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Cushite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that valley, and stay'd not in the east) were for a while oppress'd, till God afterward by the seed of Abraham made them his own nation and victorious. Havilah, the brother of Nimrod, and son of Cush, took both banks of Tigris, especially on the east-side of the river: by which river his people might also pass to and fro to Babel.

The imperial seat of which region of Havilah or Susian, was anciently called Chusian, or Chusan, afterwards Susa. Cush himself took the banks of Gebon, and planted those countries westward, and south-west-ward towards Arabia the stony, and the desert, where Ptolemy placeth the city of Chusidia, first Chusia.

Seba, and Sheba, with the rest that planted Arabia Felix, had Tigris to convey them into the Persian gulf, which washeth the banks of Arabia Felix on the east-side: so as those sons of Cush might take land down the river as they pleased. Also the city of Nineveh was by Nimrod founded on the said river of Tigris: and from thence a colony pass'd to Charran, standing also upon a navigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Japhet's sons settle themselves together, and took their seats in Asia the less, from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves northward, and westward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Magog and Tubal, sat down first of all in that part of Syria, to the north of Palestina and Phenicia: and from thence Gomer or his children pass'd on into Asia the less, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines spread themselves into Iberia: and the Magogians more northerly into Sarmatia. The first Gomerians, and first planters in Asia the less, held the country of the Cymmerians (witness Herodot. lib. 4.) the same region which was afterwards by the Gall Greeks called Galatia, to whom St. Paul wrote his epistle, so intitled. This nation of the Cymmerians (whom the invincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first plantations) gave names to divers places; as to the mountains above Albania (called Cymmerini) and to the city of Cymmeris in Phrygia: also Bosphorus Cymmerius took appellation from this nation, in the outlet whereof was also a city of that name called Cymmerian: which Pliny saith (mistaking the place) had some time the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a town in Campania, so called of the unhealthful waters, favouring of brimstone: which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the lake Lucrinus.

^a Ezek. 27. 13, 19. and so the place of Itai. 66. 19. [for Javan] Hellada: and [for the plural Javanim] Hellenæ. ^b Prot. Aliaz Tab. 4.

to whom the Moschici were neighbours, which others write Meshech. The prophet Ezekiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the prince of Meshech and Tubal. For these Meschi (which Ptolemy calleth Moschi) inhabit Syracena a province of Armenia, directly south from the mountains Moschici, in the valley between the mountains Moschici and the mountains Paryardes: out of whose north part springeth the river Phasis; from the east part Araxis; and from the west Euphrates: and of this Meshech are descended also the Moscovians (saith Melancthon) and it may be, that in process of time some of them inhabited those regions also: For Meshech (saith Melancthon) signifieth extendens, enlarging or stretching forth. Togorma also at first did inhabit amongst his parents and kindred. The Togormians were also called Giblei, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchy of Phenicia, the same which Pliny calleth Gaben: from whence ^a Solomon had his most excellent masons, which hewed stones for the temple of Jerusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the less Armenia, whose kings were hence called ^b Tigranes, and their cities Tigranokartæ: of which cities Tigranes, subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hierosolymitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbary: forgetting the prophecy of Ezekiel against the Tyrians; ^c They of the house of Togorma, brought to thy fairs horses, and horsemen, and mules, which could not well be driven over the whole length of the Mediterranean sea, but from the neighbour countries by land. But Josephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I do not deny, but they might be in the ensuing ages: and so might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred years after the 12th of Nimrod's reign. The Jews conceive that the Turks came of those Togormians, because their emperor is called Togar. The Chaldeans make them the fathers of the Germans. But Laonicus affirms, that the Turks descended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Muscovy. But for these sub-derivations it were infinite to examine them. Only of the first and second plantation, and of the first nations after the flood is the matter which I labour to discover; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous writers. And this we must note, that those grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet spirit, or (perchance) of less understanding, and had not therefore the leading of colonies sent out, their proper habitations could be hardly known: only reason hath taught us, that they dwelt among the rest, and were cover'd with the fame of others, who took on them the conduction and dominion over the rest.

From Madai the 3d son of Japhet, were the Medes. The Grecians bring them (as before) from Medus the son of Medea.

Of Javan the fourth son of Japhet: and of Meshech of Aram, and Meshech of Japhet.

OF Javan the 4th son of Japhet came from the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greeks: and so the Latin and Greek interpreters for Javan write Greece, as in Isaiab. Et mittam ex iis qui salvati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italiam, & Græciam: And I will send those that escape of them to nations in the sea, in Italy and in Greece. The Geneva here useth the word [Tarshish] for Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, tho' Tarsis in many places be taken for the sea. The Tigurine and the Geneva use the names Tubal and Javan, and not Italy and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew words. Of the Iones were the Athenians, though themselves dream that they were Aborigines, or men without ancestors, and growing (as it were) out of the soil itself: who abounding in people, sent colonies into Asia the less, of whom came the Iones of those parts. Others ^d derive the Athenians from Ion the son of Xuthus, the son of Deucalion; but the antiquity of Javan marring the fashion of that supposition, who so many years preceded Xuthus, Ion, or Deucalion. Pausanias tells us that Xuthus stole out of Theffaly with all his father's treasure, and his brothers portions, and arriving at Athens, he was graciously received by Erietheus, who gave him his daughter in marriage; of whom he received two sons, Ion and Achæus, the supposed ancestors of the Athenians. For Attica was called Ionia (saith Plutarch in the life of Theseus) who, when he had joined Megara to Attica, erected a pillar in that Isthmus or Strait, which fasteneth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the east, these words: Hæc non sunt Peloponnesus, ast Ionia; These countries are not of Peloponnesus, but of Ionia: and on the other side which looketh towards the south, and into Peloponnesus, this: These parts are Peloponnesus, and not Ionia.

Strabo out of Hecatæus affirmeth, that the Iones came out of Asia into Greece, which is contrary to the former opinion: that the Iones of Greece transporting certain companies into Asia the less, the name of Iones was thereby therein retained. And tho' Strabo knew no more thereof than he learned of the Greeks themselves, yet I find this conjecture of Hecatæus reasonable enough. For tho' it were to him unknown, yet sure I am that Asia the less had people before Greece had any: and that Javan did not flie from Babylonia into Greece, but took Asia the less in his passage; and from thence pass'd over the nearest way, leaving his own name to some maritime province on that side, as he did to that part of Greece so called. But yet Strabo himself believed, that Ionia took the name from Ion the son of Xuthus: for so much he had learned from themselves; which was also the opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greeks in after-times cast themselves into that part of Asia the less, opposite unto them, which they held for divers years. And howsoever the Greeks vaunt themselves to be the fathers of nations, and the most ancient; yet all approved historians (not their own) deride and disprove their pride, and vanity therein. For this dispute of antiquity (among prophane writers) rested between the Scythians and the Egyptians, as Justin out of Trogus, in the war between Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia, witnesseth: which preceded far the reign of Ninus, and was long before the name of Greece was ever heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cecrops's time, the Greeks were all savages without law or religion, living like brute beasts in all respects: and Cecrops (saith ^e St. Augustine) lived together with Moses.

The 6th son of Japhet was Meshech, whom the Septuagint call Mosoch, a part of those nations commanded by Gog the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal. But this we must remember, that between Meshech the son of Aram, and Meshech (or Mosoch) the son of Japhet, there is little difference in name, and both by divers interpreters diversly written. Montanus with the Vulgar writeth Meshech, the son of Aram Mes; the Geneva Mash; Junius Meshech. But it may be gathered out of the 120th Psalms, that either Meshech the son of Japhet, was the parent of those people, or gave name to that province wherein David hid himself: or else (which may rather seem) that it took name from Mesech the son of Aram. For David bewailing his exile (while he lived among a barbarous and irreligious people) useth these words. ^a Woe is me that I remain in Mesech, and dwell in the tents of Kedar: which Junius converteth thus. Hei mihi quia peregrinor tam diu: habito tanquam Scenitæ Kedareni: The Septuagint gives it this sense, Woe is me because my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the inhabitants of Kedar; with which this of the Latin agreeth; Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est, habitavi cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldean otherwise, and in these words, O me miserum, quia peregrinatus sum Asianis, habitavi cum tabernaculis Arabum: O wretch that I am, for I have travelled among those of Asia, I have dwelt in the tabernacles of the Arabians. But howsoever or whichsoever conversion be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Kedar; which is a province of Arabia Petræa; and the Chaldean putteth Asia instead of Mesech; but the Hebrew it self hath Mesech. And if it be to be taken for a nation (as it is most likely, because it answers to Kedar, the name of a nation) seeing Mesech the son of Aram, 1 Chron. 17. is called Mesech, it is indifferent whether this nation took name from Mesech or Mesech, both bordering Judea, and like enough to be commanded by one prince; for so Ezekiel makes Mesech and Tubal. But as for those that take Mesech out of the word Mosoch (given by the Septuagint) to be the Muscovian; sure they presume much upon the affinity of names, as aforesaid. And sure I am, that David never travelled so far north; (for to him Muscovia was utterly unknown) but about the border of Kedar, it may be, he was often in all the time of his persecution: the same being a city on the mountains of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Mosoch the father of the Muscovians; and herein also Melancthon runs with the tide of common opinion, and sets Mesech in Muscovia, tho' with some better advice of judgment; as, first seated in Cappadocia, and from thence travelling north-ward: expounding the places of the 120th psalm [Hei mihi quod exulo in Mesech] to signify, Gentis ejus feritatem insignem esse; That the ferity of that nation exceeded: which fierceness or brutality of the Muscovians, David never proved, or, perchance, never heard of. But the same ferity or cruelty, which those nothern Muscovians had, may as well be ascribed to the Arabians and Kedarens. For this country took name of ^b Kedar the second son of Ishmael, of whom a people of equal fierceness to any of the world were begotten, both in those times and long after, even to this day (if the Arabians, Ishmaelites and Saracens may be accounted one people:) the same being foreshewed by the speech of the angel to Hagar, Gen. xvi. 12. And he shall be a wild man: his hand shall be against every man, and every mans hand against him. Now Arabia the desert, saith Pliny, confronteth the Arabians Cochlei on the east, and the Cedraei south-ward, both which join together upon the Nabathæi. So it appeareth, as before, that Mesech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Israel, and that Kedar also did join to Mesech: all which were regions of Syria, or of Asia the less, commanded by the successors of Seleucus, enemies of the re-establishment of Israel and Judah. But as I have already said, it might well be, that long after the first plantation the issue of Mesech, or Mosoch, might pass into Cappadocia, and thence into Ily-

cania, and give names, both to Mazaga in the one, and to the mountains Moschici in the other, and from thence might send people northerly in Muscovia; and so all opinions saved. But all savage nations, overgrown and uncultivated, do (for the most part) shew a late plantation; even as civility, letters, and magnificent building witness antiquity.

Tiras the seventh son of Japhet, which ^c Montanus reckons among the sons of Gomer, was the father of the Thracians, as all authors (worthy of examination) affirm. Josephus was the first that determined hereof: and because the scriptures are altogether silent, what part of the world Tiras peopled, the conjectures are indifferent, and give no ground at all of dispute. It followeth now to speak of the sons of Gomer, which were three:

Ascanes, Riphat and Togorma.

SECT. VIII.

Of Ascanes and Riphat, the two eldest sons of Gomer.

ASCANES was the father of those which the Greeks call Rhegini, saith Josephus, but he gives no reason why.

Eusebius makes Ascanes the father of the Goths; the Jews in their Targum make him the root of the German nation, but their expositions are commonly very idle. Pliny findeth Ascania in Phrygia, near the rivers of Hylas and Cios: ^d Melancthon being of the same opinion, that the Tuiscanes were descended of the Ascanes (for Tuiscanes, saith he, is as much to say, as of the Ascanes, Præposito articulo die Ascanes) and that the word signifieth a religious keeper of fire: it being an ancient superstition to pray at the fire of sacrifices, as afterwards at the tombs of martyrs. Not far from Phrygia was the lake Ascania, known by that name in the Romans time. And among the kings which came to the succour of Troy, was Ascanius, Deo similis, saith ^e Homer, Like unto God; because he was beautiful and strong: for in the same manner doth Virgil grace Eneas, Os humerosque Deo similis; In face and body like one of the gods. Virgil also remembreth such a river together with the hills Gargara; as ^f Illas ducit amor trans Gargara, transque sonantem Ascanium: Appetite leads them both over the mountains Gargara and the roaring Ascanius. But this Pliny maketh more plain in the description of Phrygia. For he placeth the city of Brillion upon the river Ascanius, which is adjoining to Mysia, and is near the border of the Trojan empire: and the lake Ascanes he directs us to find by the description of Prusia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lieth far within the countries of Bithynia: and then from Prusia to Nicea are accounted five and twenty miles, in which way this lake lieth, even between Prusia and Nicea; and so Junius, as I conceive him, takes them of Ascanes to be the inhabitants of Pontus and Bithynia, and those north parts of Asia. Stephanus de Urbibus makes it a city of Troas, built by Ascanius the son of Eneas, saying, that there was another of that name in Mysia. Of Ascanii, a lake of Bithynia, Ptolemy witnesseth: and Strabo giveth Ascania both a lake, a river, and a town in Mysia, near unto Cio; which also agreeth with Pliny: for Pliny findeth Prusia, before spoken of, near Cio, and calleth the islands before Troy, Ascanes.

Now whether these places took name of Ascanes the son of Gomer, or of Ascanius the son of Eneas, it might be questioned: sure it is, that Ascanius which brought succour to the Trojans, could not take his name from Eneas's son, who was then either exceeding young, or rather unborn: and it seemeth that the countries whence those succours came, were not out of any part of Phrygia, or Mysia, but farther off, and from the north parts of all Asia the less, which by Jeremy is called Ascanez, by the figure Synecdoche, as Junius thinketh. Out of those testimonies therefore which deceive not, we may confidently determine. For of the prophet Jeremy we shall learn of what nation the Ascanez were, whose words are these: Set up a standard in the land, blow the trumpet among the nations against her, call up the kings of Ararat, Minni, and Ascanez against her, &c. meaning, against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most interpreters consent, so called of the mountains of Ararat which run thro' it: Minni the lesser Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni; for Minni was the ancient name, saith Junius and others before him, and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that tract from Euphrates to the sea-coasts of Phenicia and Palestina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a province of Syria, the scriptures difference it in the story of Jacob and Esau, and call it Aram-padan. Then if these two nations were of the Armenians, and Ascanez joined with them (who altogether united under Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoil of the Babylonian empire) we shall err much to call Askenaz Germany or Almain, for we hear of no Stuart Ruttiers at that siege. But the Askenaz were of those nations which were either subject or allied to the Medes: of which, if any of them came afterwards into Phrygia, I know not: for the dispersion of nations was in after-times without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Josephus, who calls them Rhegini; or of the Jews, who will have them to be Almains, when they confirm it either by scriptures or reason, I will think as they do.

Of Ripbath, the second son of Gomer, there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Beroaldus and Pererius think that he wandered far off from the rest of his brothers, and therefore no memory of his plantation. But I see nothing to the contrary, but that he might seat himself with the rest of his family; for there wanted no room or soil in those days for all the sons and grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well understood, that the Riphei were of Ripbath, which the Greeks afterwards, according to Josephus, called the Paplagones: and Riphei, saith Melancthon, signifieth giants. These people were very famous in the north parts, and in Sarmatia: the most of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti; The greatest number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti, who spoke the ancient Polac: which being first called Riphei (for the love of some of their leaders or kings) changed their names and became Heneti (a custom exceeding common in those times) and dwelt first in Paplagonia, as Homer witnesseth, and so doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: now, when these Riphei, afterwards Heneti, sought new regions, they came along the shores of Euxinus, and filled the north part of Europe, containing Russia, Lithuania, and Polonia. From thence they cross'd thwart the land, and peopled Illyria, desirous, saith Melancthon, of a warmer soil of fruit and wine. These Heneti or Veneti, whom Melancthon taketh to be one people, filled all that land between the Baltick and Adriatick sea; and to this day the name of the gulf Venedicus is found in Russia. This nation, after they were possess'd of Lithuania and Polonia, disturbed the plantation of the Boii and Hermondurii. Therefore it seemeth to me, that of Ripbath came the Riphei, afterwards Heneti; and so thinketh Atlas Montanus, first seated in Paplagonia, but in course of time lords of Sarmatia, and those other parts before remembred, chiefly between the rivers of Vistula and Albis. The name, saith Melancthon, signifieth wandering or wanderers, or Nomades, a people which lived by white meats and fruits, as indeed all nations did in the first ages.

Of the third son of Gomer, Togorma, I have spoken already; now therefore of Javan's children, which were four:

Elisa, Tharsis, Cethim, and Dodanim.

SECT. IX.

Of the four sons of Javan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper name or for the sea.

OF Elisa or Elipha, came the Æoles: and of this Elisa all the Greeks were called Hellenes, saith Montanus. Melancthon makes Elisa the father of the Æoles in Asia side; others of Elis in Peloponnesus, or of both. And seeing the Greeks were descended in general of Javan, it is probable that the Æoles and the Elei, took name of Elisa, his eldest son. Ezekiel speaking of Tyre, nameth the isles of Elisa. Hyacinthus & purpura de insulis. Elisæ facta sunt operimentum tuum: Blue silk and purple brought from the isles of Elisa, was thy covering: The Chaldeans for Elisa write Italia; but the Vulgar, the Tigurine, the Geneva, and Junius keep the word Elisa; and so I think they might do with reason: for there was not found any such purple dye in Italy in those days, nor since that I can read of. But those isles of Elisa were by a better conjecture the isles of Greece; and the best purple was found afterwards at Tyre itself, and before that, and among the Cyclades, and on the coast of Getulia.

Tharsis, the second son of Javan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharsis is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharsis in Cilicia, understands Carthage in Africa; but (reserving the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that conjecture. The Chaldean paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharsis, but it hath no authority, nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the ships of Solomon went every three years to Tharsis, and brought thence gold, silver, elephants teeth, &c. The Chaldean paraphrast translates Tharsis [Africa.] But Solomon's ships were prepared in the Red sea at Ezion-gaber, in the bay of Elana, near unto Madian, where Jethro, Moses's father-in-law, inhabited; a province of Arabia Petraea, Idumea, or of the Chusites; and they sailed to the higher part of the East-Indies. For it had been a strange navigation to have spent three years in the passage between Judea and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might have been sailed in six or ten days. And if so great riches might have been found within the bounds of the Mediterranean sea, all the other neighbouring princes would soon have entertained that trade also. But this enterprize of Solomon is in this sort written of in the first of Kings: Also king Solomon made a navy of ships in Ezion-gaber, which is beside Elath and the brink of the Red sea in the land of Edom: and Hiram sent with the navy his servants, that were mariners, and had knowledge of the sea, with the servants of Solomon: and they came to Ophir, and fetch'd from thence 420 talents of gold, &c. But as the nations about Pontus thought no sea in the world like unto their own, and doubted whether there were any other sea but that only (whereof it came that Pontus was a word used for the sea in general;) so because the Israelites and the Phenicians knew no other sea than that of the Mediterranean in the beginning; and that the people of Tharsis had the greatest ships, and were the first navigators in those parts with such vessels, they were therefore called men of the sea: and the word Tharsis used often for the sea. And whereas it's said that the ships of Solomon went every three years to Tharsis, that phrase is not strange at all: for we use it ordinarily wheresoever we navigate, namely, that the king's ships are gone to the sea, or that they are set out every year, or every three years to the sea; and therefore Tharsis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but used for the sea it self. But in this place Tharsis is truly taken for Tharsis, the chief city in Cilicia, founded by Tharsis the 2d son of Javan, or by his successors, in memory of their first parent. To this city arrived Alex. Macedon, before he gave the first overthrow to Darius, and casting himself into the river to bathe and wash his body, he fell into an extreme fever, and great danger of death: and in this city of Tharsis was St. Paul born. Now this agreeth with the reason and nature of a plantation. For (Gomer and his other sons inhabiting Asia the less, and that part of Syria adjoining) Javan, who was to pass over the sea into Greece, took the edge of the same coast, and first planted the Iones on that shore: gave the islands between Asia the less and Greece, to Elisa, and left Tharsis upon the sea-side in Cilicia; of whom that city took name.

The 3d son of Javan was Cethim, of whom were the Romans and Italians, saith Beroaldus, but I allow better of Melancthon's opinion, who makes Cethim the father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plural, saith he, and signifieth percussores, tho' in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that place of Isaiah 23. (according to Melancthon) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians. Hæc calamitas ab Esai prædicta est, qui capite vicesimo tertio inquit, venturos esse eversores Tyri ex terra Cethim; This calamity, saith Melancthon, was foretold by Isaiah the prophet, who in the 23d chapter pronounced, that the destroyers of Tyre were to come out of Cethim. And altho' the children of Israel esteemed all men islanders, which came to them by sea, and separate from that continent (and so also Cethim might be taken for Italy, saith Beroaldus) yet we must take the first performance of the former prophecy, which took effect by the destruction of the Tyrrians by Alexander: who after seven months siege entered that proud city, and cut in pieces 7000 principal citizens; strangled 2000, and changed the freedom of 13000 others into bondage and slavery. Now, that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it appeareth plainly in the first of the Maccabees, in these words: After that Alexander the Macedonian, the son of Philip, went forth of the land of Cethim, and slew Darius king of the Persians and Medes. Josephus sets Cethim in the isle of Cyprus, in which, saith he, there remaineth the city Citium, the country of Zeno the philosopher (witness Laertius) which city Pintus upon Ezekiel affirmeth, that it stood in St. Jerome's time. So it may be, that all the islands in ancient times by the Hebrews were called the islands of Cethim: and in that sense might Cyprus be so called also; and yet because Tharsis was the very next port to Cyprus, and directly over-against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharsis: and finding that island too strait for his people after they were increased, and that the rest of the coasts, both on Asia side and Greece, were inhabited by his father and brothers, he sent colonies over the Egean sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodanim the 4th son of Javan, and the youngest brother (by the most opinions) sat down at Rhodes as near Cethim, Tharsis and Elisa, as he could. For Dodanim and Rhodanim are used indifferently by many translators: the Hebrew [D] and the Hebrew [R] are so like, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirm. There is also found in Epirus the city of Dodona, in the province of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted soil in Cyprus: so Dodanim (seated in a far less island) did of necessity send his people farther off; and keeping along the coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elisa, he passed a little farther on the west-ward, and planted in Epirus. And tho' the city of Dodona was not then built, or (perchance) not so ancient as Dodanim himself, yet his posterity might give it that name in memory of their first parent, as it happened all the world over. For names were given to cities, mountains, rivers, and provinces, after the names of Noah's children, and grand-children; not in all places by themselves, but by their successors many years after: every of their families being desirous to retain among them by those memories, out of what branch themselves were taken, and grafted elsewhere. And because great kingdoms were often by new conquerors newly named, and the greatest cities often fired and demolished: therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gave their own names, or the names of their ancestors, to mountains and rivers, as to things (after their judgments) freest from any alteration.

Thus then did Javan settle himself and his children, in the edge and frontier of Asia the less, towards the sea-shore: and afterwards in Greece, and the islands and neighbour provinces thereof, as Japhet their father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Javan's brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Mesech, and the rest round about him. And in like sort did Chush (the son of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldea, and the borders thereof towards the west and south-west: and the sons of Chush (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it self) travelled south-ward in Arabia Felix, and south-west-ward into Arabia Petraea: the rest of his children holding the regions adjoining to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chush in like manner took the way of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the region of Palestina adjoining. The sons of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those nations came, which were afterwards the enemies both to the Hebrews, and to those of the sons of Shem, which spread themselves towards the west, and the borders of the Mediterranean sea: of which I shall speak hereafter. But first of the sons of Cham or Ham, which were four:

Chush, Mizraim, Phut and Canaan.

SECT. X.

That the seat of Chush the eldest son of Ham was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of strange fables, and ill translations of scripture, grounded upon the mistaking of this point.

† I.

Of Josephus's tale of an Ethiopels wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chush.

THAT Ham was the father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many scriptures, as in the 150th Psalm, ver. 51. Then Israel came to Egypt, and Jacob was a stranger in the land of Ham: and in the 78th Psalm; He slew all the first-born in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the tabernacles of Ham There is also found a great city in Thebaida, called Cheramis (as it were, the city of Ham) of which name ^a*Herodotus* also discovers an island in the same region. But because Chus is the elder son of Ham, it agreeth with order to speak first of him. Now tho' I have already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and, I hope, proved that Chus could not be Ethiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turn to speak for himself, I will add some farther proof to the former. For the manifestation hereof sets many things strait, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senseless interpretations. Surely, howsoever the Septuagint and Josephus have herein failed, yet it is manifest that Chus could not be Ethiopia, but Arabia (to wit) both that Arabia called Petræa, and a part of Arabia the happy and the the desert: which regions Chus and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first sat down all together. And there is nothing which so well cleareth this controversy, as the true interpretation of the place, Numb. xii. 1. where Moses's wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speak of Nabuchodonosor's conquests. For whereas Josephus and the Septuagint in the place, Numb. xii. 1. as also elsewhere, understand Chus for Ethiopia, we must give credit to Moses himself therein; and then it will appear that Josephus was grossly mistaken, or vainly led by his own invention. For Josephus presuming that Chus was Ethiopia, and therefore that the wife of Moses (which in scripture, Numb. xii. 1. is called a woman of Cush) was a woman of the land of Ethiopia, feigneth that Tharbis the daughter of the king of Ethiopia, fell in love with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her father's city; and to the end to obtain Moses for her husband, she practised to betray both her parents, country, and friends, with the city it self, and to deliver it into Moses's hands. The tale (if it be worth the reciting) lyeth thus in Josephus. After he had described the strength of the Ethiopian city Meroe, which he saith at length Cambyfes called so from the name of his sister (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic cum Moses desiderare exercitum otiosum egre serret, hoste non audente manus conferere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Æthiopum regi filia, nomine Tharbis, &c. which tale hath this sense in English; When Moses was grieved that his army lay idle, because the enemy besieged, durst not sally and come to handy strokes, there happened this accident in the mean while. The Ethiopian king had a daughter called Tharbis, who at some assaults given beheld the person of Moses, and withal admired his valour. And knowing that Moses had not only upheld and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Ethiopians to the very brink of subversion. Things working in her thoughts, together with her overweening ambition, which daily encreased, she made request unto him by one of her trustiest servants, that he might himself come to him, and become his wife; which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliver the city into his possession: whereunto she condescending, and Moses having taken oath to perform this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

† II.

A dispute against the tale of Josephus.

THIS tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Josephus fashioned, and therein also utterly mistaken himself, in naming a city of Arabia, for a city of Ethiopia: as he names Ethiopia it self to have been the country of Moses's wife, when (indeed) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Ethiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other geographers, ancient and modern, teach us, saying that the Sabeans are Arabians, and not Ethiopians; except Josephus can persuade us, that the queen of Saba which came from the south to hear the wisdom of Solomon, were a Negro, or black-moor. And tho' Damianus a Gocs speaks of certain letters to the king of Portugal from Prester John of the Abissines. wherein that Ethiopian king would persuade the Portugals that he was descended of the queen of Saba, and of Solomon; yet it doth no-where appear in the scriptures, that Solomon had any son by that great princess: which had it been true, it is likely that when Sishac king of Egypt invaded Roboam, and sack'd Jerusalem, his brother (the son of Saba and Solomon) who joined upon Egypt, would both have impeached that enterprize, and given aid and succour to Roboam against Jeroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelve tribes to his own obedience. Neither is it any thing against our opinion of Moses's wife, to have been an Arabian, that the scriptures teach us, that Moses married the daughter of Jethro priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the north coast of the Red sea, over-against the body of Egypt, and near Ezion Gaber, where Solomon provided his fleet for India, in the region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edumæa joineth to the tribe of Juda by the north, to Arabia Petræa by the east, to the Mediterranean by the west, and to the Red sea by the south-east. And if we mark the way which Moses took when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appear that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it self, he had formerly lived 40 years; where it seemeth, that besides his careful bringing up in Egypt, he was instructed by Jethro in the Egyptians learning. For Josephus confesseth, and St. Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. But on the other side this text makes much against Josephus, where it is written in Exodus ii. 15. Therefore Moses fled from Pharaoh, and dwelt in the land of Madian or Midian, and not in Ethiopia. And in the 3d chapter it is as plain as words can express, in what region Madian was, where it is written, When Moses kept the sheep of Jethro his father-in-law, priest of Madian, and drove the flock to the desert, and came to the mountain of God in Horeb. Now that mount Horeb is not in Ethiopia, every infant knoweth. And if we may believe Moses himself, then was not the wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Josephus reporteth (which was for betraying her country and friends) neither had she the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was she a negro, but a Madianitish. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest means: so it pleased him from a shepherd to call Moses, and after him David, and by them to deliver his people first and last. For Moses sitting by a well (as disconsolate and a stranger) defended the daughters of Reque from the other shepherds, and drew them water to water their sheep : upon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Jethro, whose daughter he married : and not for any betraying of towns or countries.

From hence also came Jethro to Moses at Rephidim, not far from Idumæa, and finding the insupportable government of such a multitude, he advised him to distribute this weighty charge, and to make governors and judges of every tribe and family. And if Jethro had been an Ethiopian, it had been a far progress for him to have passed thro' all Egypt with the wife and children of Moses, and to have found Moses in the border of Idumæa : the Egyptians hating Moses and all that favoured him. But the passing of Moses thro' Arabia Petræa (which joineth to Madian) proveth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts : in which the second time he wandered forty years, and did by these late travels of his seek to instruct the children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the land of plenty and rest. For he found them nourished up with the milk of idolatry, and obstinate in the religion of the heathen, and finding that those stiff plants could not be bowed or declined, either by persuasion or by miracle, he wore them out in the desarts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from those he might receive fruit, agreeable to his own desire, and God's commandments.

Lastly, This opinion of Josephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrisamenfis, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who avowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sephora : his own words have this beginning a Mentitur etiam Apollinaris duas uxores habuisse Mosén, &c. Apollinaris also lieth in affirming that Moses had two wives : and who doth not perceive these things feigned by them ? For it is manifest, that the wife of Moses was Zephora, daughter to the priest or president of Madian : and that Madian cannot be taken for Ethiopia beyond Egypt, being the same that joineth to Arabia : so far Chrisamenfis.

† III.

Chush ill expounded for Ethiopia, Ezek. xxix. 10.

NOW as Chush is by the Septuagint converted Ethiopia, and the wife of Moses therefore called Ethiopissa : so in the conquest of Nabuchodonosor is Ethiopia written for Arabia : for by the words of Ezekiel it is manifest that Nabuchodonosor was never in Ethiopia. b Behold, saith Ezekiel, (speaking of the person of this great Affyrian) I come upon thee, and upon thy rivers, and I will make the land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate, from the tower of Seveneb, even to the borders of the black-moors : which last words should have been thus converted : From the tower of Seveneb to the borders of the Chusites or Arabians : between which two is situated all Egypt. For to say, from the borders of Seveneb to the Ethiopians, hath no sense at all. Seveneb it self being the border of Egypt, confronting and joining to Ethiopia, or the land of the black-moors. So as if Nabuchodonosor's conquest had been but between Seveneb and the border of Ethiopia, it were as much to say, and did express no other victory than the conquest of all that land and country, lying between Middlesex and Buckingham, where both the countries join together ; or all the north parts of England between Berwick and Scotland : for this hath the same sense with the former, if any man sought to express by these two bounds, the conquest of England, Berwick being the north border of England, as Seveneb or Syene is the south bound of Egypt, seated in Thebaida which toucheth Ethiopia. But by the words of Ezekiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonosor never entered into any part of Ethiopia, altho' the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneva, and all other, in effect, have written Ethiopia for Chush.

† IV.

Another place of Ezekiel, chap. xxx. ver. 9. in like manner mistaken.

AND as the former, so is this place of Ezekiel mistaken, by being in this sort converted. In die illa egredientur nunci a facie mea in trieribus ad conterendam Æthiopie confidentiam : which place is thus turned into Englisch by the Genevians : In that day shall there messengers go forth from me in ships to make the careless Mores afraid. Now the Latin for [ships] hath the Greek word Trieres for Tiremes which are galleys of three banks, and not ships. But that in this place the translation should have been, as in the former, amended by using the word Chush, or Arabia for Ethiopia, or the Black-mores, every man may see which meanly understandeth the geography of the world, knowing, that to pass out of Egypt into Ethiopia, there need no gallies nor ships, no more than to pass out of Northampton into Leicestershire : Ethiopia being the conterminatè region with Egypt, and not divided so much as by a river. Therefore in this place of Ezekiel it was meant, that from Egypt Nabuchodonosor should send gallies along the coast of the Red sea, by which an army might be transported into Arabia the happy and the stony (sparing the long wearisome march over all Egypt and the desarts of Pharan) which army might thereby surprize them unawares in their security and confidence : for when Nabuchodonosor was at Seveneb, within a mile of Ethiopia, he needed neither galley nor ship to pass into it : being all one large and firm land with Egypt, and no otherwise parted from it, than one inland shire is parted from another ; and if he had a fancy to have rowed up the river but for pleasure, he could not have done it ; for the fall of Nilus (tumbling over high and steep mountains) called Catadupæ Nili were at hand.

Lastly, As I have already observed, the sons of every father seated themselves as near together as possibly they could, Gomer and his sons in Asia the less ; Javan and his sons in Greece and the islands adjoining ; Shem in Persia and eastward. So the sons and grand-children of Chush from the river of Gehon, their father's first seat, inhabited upon the same, or upon some other contiguous unto it, as Nimrod and Havilah on the one side, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha, with the rest, did on the other side. And, to conclude in a word, the Hebrews had never any acquaintance or fellowship, any war, treaty of peace, or other intelligence with the Ethiopian Black-mores, as is already remembered in the chapter of Paradise.

† V.

A place of Isaiah xviii. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chush for Ethiopia.

AND as in these places before-remembered, so in divers others is the word Ethiopia put for Arabia or Chush, which puts the story (where it is so understood) quite out of square ; one kingdom thereby being taken for another. For what sense hath this part of scripture, Isaiab 18. Væ terræ cymbalorum alarum quæ est trans flumina Ethiopia; or according to the Septuagint in these words, Væ terræ navium alarum quæ est trans fluvios Ethiopia? Woe to the land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, sending ambassadors by sea, even the vessels of reeds upon the waters. Væ terræ umbrosæ oræ; Wo to the land of the shady coast, saith Junius. The former translators understand it in this sense; that the waters are shadowed with the sails, which are significantly called the wings of the ships; the other, that the coast of the sea was shadowed by the height of the land.

^a Sixt Senens Bibl.

^b Ezek. 29. 10

But to the purpose: That this land here spoken of by the prophet Isaiab is Egypt, no interpreter hath doubted: for they were the Egyptians that sent this message to the Israelites which Isaiab repeateth, and by the former translation every man may see the transposition of kingdoms: for hereby Egypt is transported unto the other side of Ethiopia, and Ethiopia set next unto Judea, when it is the land of Chus and Arabia indeed that lieth between Judea and Egypt, and not Ethiopia, which is seated under the equinoctial line. And of this Beroaldus asketh a material question, to wit, What region that should be, of which the prophet speaketh, and placeth it beyond the rivers of Ethiopia: Nam de ignota agi regione dici nequit; For it cannot be said that he treateth of an unknown region. Now if Ethiopia it self be under the equinoctial line, with whom the Jews had never any acquaintance, why should any man dream that they had knowledge of nations far beyond that again, and beyond the rivers of Ethiopia? except we shall impiously think that the prophet spake he knew not what, or used an impertinent discourse of those nations, which were not discovered in 2000 years after, inhabiting as far south as the Cape of Good Hope, commonly known by the name of Bona Esperanza.

† VI.

That upon the like mistaking, both Terrhaca in the story of Senacherib, and Zera in the story of Asa are unadvisedly made Ethiopians.

AND by this translation is the story of Senacherib utterly mistaken in the cause of his retreat. For Senacherib was first repulsed at Pelusium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Judea: when having certain knowledge that Thirrbakeb (which all the interpreters call king of Ethiopia) was on the way to set on him, he began to withdraw himself: and fearing to leave his army in two parts, he sent threatening messengers to Hezekiah king of Judah, persuading him to submit himself: the tenor whereof is set down in the second of Kings in these words: Have any of the gods of the nations delivered his land out of the hands of the king of Assyria? Where is the god of Hamath? &c. by which proud ambassage, if he had obtained entrance into Jerusalem, he then meant to have united that great army before Jerusalem commanded by Rabsakeb with the other which lay before Pelusium, a great city upon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already mastered the most part of all those cities in Judea and Benjamin with a third army (which himself commanded) being then at the siege of Lebna. But upon the rumour of that Arabian army led by their king Thirrbakeb (whom Josephus calls Tharpsices) Rabsakeb hastened from the siege of Jerusalem, and found Senacherib departed from Lachish, and set down before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleutheropolis, as some have suppos'd. But while he had ill success at Pelusium and feared Thirrbakeb, God himself, whom he least feared, struck his army before Jerusalem by the angel of his power, so as 158000 were found dead in the place, as in the life of Hezekiah is hereafter more largely written. And that this army of Thirrbakeb was from Arabia, Josephus himself makes it plain. For he confesseth in the tenth book the first chapter of the Jerusalem antiquities, that it was come to Senacherib's knowledge, that the army which was a foot (both to relieve the Egyptians and the Jews) march'd towards him by the way of the desert: now the desert which lay indifferent between Jerusalem and Pelusium, was that of Pharan or Sur, which also toucheth on the three Arabia's, to wit, the stony, of which it is a part, the desert, and the happy; and by no other way indeed could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelusium or Jerusalem. But, that there is any desert between Pelusium and the south part of Egypt, hath never yet been heard of, or described, by any cosmographer or historian. So then this scripture of the second of Kings, verse the ninth, hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word [Chus] is also translated Ethiopia; and in this sense have all the interpreters, but Junius, expressed the beginning of the ninth verse. He heard also men say of Thirrbakeb king of Ethiopia, &c. whereas it should have been thus converted with Junius. Audiens autem de Thirrbakeb rege Chusbi: He heard also of Thirrbakeb king of the Chusites. For they were the Chusites and Arabians, whose houses and cities were next the fire, and upon whom the very smoke of Judah flaming was blown, being their nearest neighbours: and so were not the Ethiopian Black-mores under the equinoctial, whom neither war nor peace (which discovereth all regions) ever found out, saith Pliny. For this king was no more king of Ethiopia than Zerah was, who invaded Asa king of Judah, with an army of a million and three thousand chariots. Indeed, how such an army and those chariots should pass thro' all Egypt (the kings of Egypt being mighty kings) let all men that know how these regions are seated, and how far distant, judge. For princes do not easily permit armies of a million to run thro' them; neither was there ever any such strength of black-mores heard of in that part of the world, or elsewhere. Neither are these Ethiopians such travellers or conquerors; and yet is this king Zerah also called king of Ethiopia. But the word Chus being first so converted for Ethiopia, the rest of the interpreters (not looking into the seats of kingdoms, or the possibilities of attempts, or invasions) followed one another in the former mistakings.

Concerning these words in that 18th chapter of Isaiab, Navium alarum, Wing'd ships (so the Septuagint turn it) or Cymbalo alarum (according to the Latin) Sails whistling in the winds, or terre umbrosæ oræ (alter Junius) the land of a shadowed coast, or, the land shadowing with wings, as our English Geneva hath it. The two first interpretations of the Septuagint and St. Jerome have one sense in effect. For the sails are commonly called the wings of a ship; and we use to say ordinarily when our ships sail slowly, that she wanteth wings: (that is) when her sails are either worn or too narrow; and we also use the same phrase of the wind whistling in the sails. And it may be that the Egyptians employ'd so many of those small ships, as their sails were said to give a shadow over the Red sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (upon Isaiab) affirmeth, that the word [Sabal] doth signify both to shadow and to gingle, which is, to make a kind of cymbaline sound: so as the meaning of this place, saith Pintus, is this: Wo to thee, O Egypt, which dost promise to others safeguard, under the shadow of thy wings, which indeed seemeth to agree with the argument of the 18th chapter of Isaiab: and this phrase is often elsewhere used, as in the 16th Psalms, Sub umbra alarum tuarum protege me; Defend me under the shadow of thy wings. The boats of reed spoken of are of two kinds; either of basket-willow covered with hides (as anciently in Britain) or a tree made hollow in the bottom, and built upon both sides with canes. Of the one sort I have seen in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

SECT. XI.

Of the plantation and antiquities of Egypt.

† I.

That Mizraim the chief planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sons of Ham, were seated in order, one by another.

THE second son of Ham was Mizraim, who (according to the place of a second brother) was sent somewhat farther off to inhabit. For Chush first possess'd Chaldea on the west-side of Gebon chiefly: and from thence, as he increased in people, so he entred Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red sea, and to the south-east side of Judea. Mizraim's brother (with Phut) pass'd over into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt: and Phut (as a third brother) was thrust farther off into Mauritania. Canaan took the sea-coast, and held the side of Palestina: and these four brothers possess'd all that tract of land, from Gebon in Chaldea, as far to the west as the Mediterranean sea: comprehending all Arabia Deserta, and Petræa, all Canaan which embraceth Galilea, Samaria, and Judea; with the two *Egypt*s; whereof the nether is bound-ed by Memphis on the south, and by the Mediterranean sea on the north: and Thebaida (called the upper Egypt) stretcheth it self towards the south as far as Syene, the border of the Ethiopians or Black-mores. All the rest of the coast of Africa westward, Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other nation or family that dwelt between them. And in the same manner did all their sons again, and all the sons of the rest of Noah's children, sort themselves.

† II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be known: and of the Egyptians lunary years, which made their antiquities seem more fabulous.

THIS flourishing kingdom possess'd by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Egypt, at such time as Ægyptus (otherwise Ramesses, as some think) the son of Belus chaced thence his elder brother Danaus, shifting him into that part of Greece, now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made Danai abandoning their proper names: which happened 877 years after the flood, in the time of Joshua, as St. Augustine conjectureth out of Eusebius. But in Homer's Odyssey it appeareth, that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Trojan war. And before this, Egypt was known by divers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Osiriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Josephus citeth in his first book against Appion) numb'reth all the kings of Egypt after Moses's departure, who consumed 393 years. By which other men conjecture, that the Egyptians took on them that name 330 years after Joshua, and about 1000 years after the flood. But where Josephus in the same book taketh Israel to be those Hycsos, which he also calleth pastores or shepherds, which are said to have reigned in Egypt 511 years, whom also he calleth his ancestors (meaning the ancestors of the Jews;) in this I am sure he was grossly deceived, or that he vainly boasted; for the Israelites had no such dominion as Manethon feigneth: nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many years.

Of the Egyptian antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirm (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330 kings before Amasis, who was contemporary with Cyrus; and that they had memory and story of 13000 years; and that the stars had four times changed their course, and the sun twice set in the east. These riddles are also rise among the Athenians and Arcadians, who dare affirm that they are more ancient than Jupiter and the moon, whereof Ovid:

Arcades: & luna gens prior illa fuit.*

The Arcadians the earth inhabited
Ere yet the moon did shine, or Jove was bred.

But for those 13000 years it may well be true: seeing it is certain that the Egyptians reckon their years by months, which makes after that account not above 1000 or 1100 years, whether we take their months or lunary years to have been of the first kind of 27 days and 8 hours; or otherwise 29 days and 12 hours; or after any other of those 5 diversities of their lunary years.

† III.

Of certain vain assertions of the antiquity of the Egyptians.

Gerardus Mercator, in his chronology, reasoneth for the Egyptians antiquity in this manner; that the 16th Dynasty (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the general flood: and that therefore the first of the other fifteen reached the creation, or soon after it. To which conjecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer: that therein Mercator was first deceived, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the 16th Dynasty was at once with the general flood: which Eusebius maketh 292 years after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the shepherds Dynastia (being in number the 17th) in the time of their first king, Saltis, to have been in the year of the world 1846, which Eusebius findeth in the world's age 2140. For the 16th Dynastia was begun but in the 292d year after the flood, as they account, and continued 190 years. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh every Dynastia to endure 115 years, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at less than 100 years: for the 28th had but 6 years; the 29th but 20, and the 30th but 18 years.

Now Annius, in his supplement of Manethon, affirmeth, that all these 15 Dynasties lasted but 162 years: and that the first of the 15 began but in the 131st year after the flood: so as where Merca- tor makes all the 15 to precede the flood, and the 16th to have been then in being at the time of the flood, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrariety of falshood cannot be hidden, tho' disguised. For Annius had forgotten his former opinion and assertion, that it was in the 131st year that Nimrod with the sons of Noah came into the valley of Shinaar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of speech there was no dispersion, nor far-off plantation at all. And tho' he hastily convey'd Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spain, in the 10th year of Nimrod's reign (which was 10 years after his arrival into Babylonia) yet herein he is more unadvised. For he makes Egypt possess'd, and a government established in the very first year of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinaar, before all partition, or any expedition far off or near in question: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

† IV.

Against Pererius: that it is not unlikely, but that E- gypt was peopled within 200 years after the creation; at least, that both it, and the most part of the world, were peopled before the flood.

BUT whereas Pererius seeketh to overthrow this antiquity of the Egyptians, touching their Dynasties (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I do not find any great strength in this opinion of Pererius (to wit) that it was either unlikely or impossible that Egypt should be peopled within 100 or 200 years after Adam, in the first age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the general flood, I do verily believe the contrary: and that not only of E- gypt, but the better part of all the world was then peopled: Pererius's words are these: Quomodo e- nim primos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeo multiplicari potuit, ut ad Aegyptum usque habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c.
 For how could the children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred years of the world, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Egypt? for allowing this, saith Pe- rerius, we must also confess, that there were then both the Affyrians, and other nations.

Now seeing the scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our saving belief, it is lawful for every man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I do not gainsay any man's opinion out of any crossing or cavilling humour: for I think it the part of every Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibility of union, than out of froward subtilty, and prejudicate resolved-ness, to maintain factions needless, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore to this opinion, that Egypt was not planted so soon after Adam, no, not at all before the flood, I say there is no reason why we should give a less increase to the sons of Adam, than to the sons of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the flood double, and (after a few years) treble, is an infallible proof of their strength and ability, to beget many children: and at that time they observed no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinity. And that there was a speedy increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appear by this, that Cain, who (being fearful that the death of Abel would have been revenged on him) withdrew himself from the rest, which were afterwards begotten, and dwelt in the land of Nod, and there by the help of his own issues, built a city (called Enoch) after the name of his first-born. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the valley of Shinaar with so many multitudes, as sufficed to build the city and tower of Babel: and that to this increase there was given but 130 years by Berosus, and after the account of the scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly understood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phaleg) but 101 years: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the infancy of the first age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, even within 130 years (the same, if, not a greater) number might be increased: and so within 70 years after (that is, by such time as the world had flood 200 years) as well Affyria, Syria, and Egypt, might be possess'd before the flood, as they were within the same or less time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance, or true story of the Baby- lonian and Affyrian empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first 100 or 130 years after the flood, came into Shinaar and Babylonia.

 For that ever Noah himself came out of the east, as there is no scripture or authority to prove it, so all probable conjecture and reason it self denies it.
 Again, those multitudes and powerful numbers, which Semiramis (but the 3d from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her own army of three millions (and she left not all her kingdoms empty) do well prove, that if the world had such plenty of people in so few years after the flood, it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their own account Ninus governed Babylonia and Affyria but 292 years after the flood of Noah. And these troops of Semiramis were gathered out of all those eastern kingdoms, from Media to the Mediterranean sea; when there had now pass'd from the flood to the time of this her invasion, somewhat less or more than 360 years:
 for much more time the true chronology cannot allow; tho' I confess, that in respect of the strange greatness of Semiramis's army, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be given. And if but one half be true of that which is said, that her army consisted of 1300000 footmen, and 500000 horsemen, it must needs be, that long before Semiramis's reign, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge army was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it self (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis have been plentifully peopled;
 when Ninus having a determination to make himself master of all nations, entered notwithstanding in league with the king thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or sought his assistance. And if Ara- bia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Egypt might also be peopled. Now if we may believe Trogus Pompeius (epitomiz'd by Justin, lib. 1.) Egypt was a most flourishing and magnificent nation before Ninus was born. For these be his own words, speaking of Ninus: Inter quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexoris rex Aegypti, &c.
 But there were in times more ancient Vexoris king of Egypt, and Tanais king of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Pontus, the other Egypt.
 And how full of people all that part of the world was, the conquests of Ninus witness, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterwards the Bastrians; yea, all that whole body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numb'reth the armies, wherewith Ninus invaded Zo- roaster, at 1700000 footmen, and 200000 horsemen: and the stories generally shew, that though Zoroaster's army was far short of this, yet it was greater greater than any that those parts of the world ever since beheld. But to what end should I seek for foreign authority? for no man doubteth, but that Egypt was possess'd by Mizraim, the son of Ham; and that it was an established kingdom, filled with many cities in Abraham's time, the scriptures tell us. And sure to prepare and cultivate a desolate and overgrown ground, to beautify it with many cities, laws, and policies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few days: and therefore it must be inhabited in a less time than 200 years after the flood; and in the same time, if not in a shorter, before the flood. For if so many millions of men were found within 300 years after the general flood; so as not only Babylon, and Affyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Palestina, yea, the far-off Libya on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia, inferior to neither, were all filled: into what small corners could then all those nations be compress'd, which 1656 years brought forth before the flood? Even necessity, which cannot be resisted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the known world; especially, where death forbore the father, and made no place for the son, till he had beheld living nations of his own body,

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius:

FOR what a strange increase did the long lives of the first age make, when they continued 800 or 900 years. Surely, we have reason to doubt that the world could not contain them, rather than that they were not spread over the world. For let us now reckon the date of our lives in this age of the world: wherein if one exceed 50 years, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we find no want of people; nay, we know the multitude such, as if by wars or pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the earth with all the industry of man could not give them food. What strange heaps then of souls had the first ages, who enjoyed 800 or 900 years as afore-said! These numbers, I say, cannot be counted or conceived. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which have been born in Britain since three or four hundred years before the Norman conquest (saving such as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now alive; and if to these there were added as many as by polygamy might have been increased. For (to omit that the giants and mighty ones of the first age observed no law of matrimony) it is to be thought, that those lovers of the world and of pleasure, when they knew the long and liberal time which nature had given them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could fly from or eschew. For what human argument hath better persuasion to make men careless of life, and fearless of death, than the little time which keeps them asunder, and that short time also accompanied with so many pains and diseases, which this envious old age of the world mingleth together, and soweth with the seeds of mankind.

Now if that Berosus or Annus may be alledged for sufficient authors, whom Pererius himself in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Josephus confirmed, that the city of Enoch was seated near Libanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cain's time, I see no cause why Palestina (which is also a province of Syria) and Egypt, which neighboureth it, could be left desolate both all the life-time of Cain, and all those times between his death and the flood, which were by estimation 700 or 800 years. And sure, tho' this fragment of Berosus, with Annus's comment, be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to be rejected. Therefore St. Jerome for such authors gives a good rule: Bona eorum eligamus, vitamus contraria; Let us chuse what is good in them, and reject the rest. And certainly in the very beginning of the first book, Berosus agreeth, in effect, with Moses, touching the general flood: and in that first part Berosus affirmeth, that those mighty men and giants which inhabited Enoch, commanded over all nations, and subjected the universal world: and tho' that phrase [of all the world] be often used in the scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts: That there were dwelling at Jerusalem Jews, men that feared God of every nation under heaven: yet by words which follow in Berosus, it is plain that his words and sense were the same: for he addeth from the sun's rising to the sun's setting, which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Again, we may safely conjecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the world among his sons at adventure, or left them as discoverers, but directed them to those regions which he formerly knew had been inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the earth was more passable and easy to travel over before the flood, than after it. For Pererius himself confesseth, that Attica (by reason of mud and slime which the water left upon the earth) was uninhabited 200 years after Ogyges's flood, whereby we may gather that there was no great pleasure in passing into far countries after the general deluge, when the earth lay, as it were, inclosed for 100 or 130 years together. And therefore was the face thereof in all conjecture more beautiful, and less cumbersome to walk over in the first age, than after the general overflowing.

† VI.

Of the words of Moses, Gen. x. verse the last, whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

LASTLY, whereas Pererius draws this argument out of the last verse of the tenth of Genesis, And out of these were the nations divided after the flood: Quo significatur talem divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium; By which it appeareth, saith Pererius, that there was no such division before the flood: which he also seeketh to confirm out of the 11th of Genesis, because the division of tongues was cause of the dispersion of the people. This consequence, Quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weak; the text itself rather teacheth the contrary: For out of these, saith Moses, were the nations divided in the earth after the flood; inferring, that before the flood the nations were divided out of others, tho' after the flood out of these only. But whatsoever sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawn to the times before the flood, or to any plantation or division in that age: for if there were none else among whom the earth could be divided after the flood, but Noah's sons, wherein doth that necessary division controul the planting of the world before it? And whereas it is alledged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion, it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had never been built, nor any confusion of languages at all, yet increase of people and time would have enforce'd a farther-off and general plantation: as Berosus (lib. 3.) says well, Ad comparandas novas sedes necessitas compellebat; They were driven by necessity to seek new habitations. For we find, as it is before said, that within 300 years after the flood, there were gathered together gether into two armies, such multitudes as the valley about Babylon could not have sustained those numbers with their increase for any long time: all Asia the greater and the lesser; all Scythia, Arabia, Palestina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the islands thereof; Mauritania and Libya being also at that time fully peopled. And if we believe Berosus, then not only those parts of the world, but (within 140 years after the flood) Spain, Italy and France were also planted: much more then may we think, that within 1656 years before the flood, in the time of the chief strength of mankind, they were replenish'd with people. And certainly seeing all the world was overflown, there were people in all the world which offended.

† VII.

A conclusion resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian antiquities: with somewhat of Phut (another son of Ham) which peopled Libya.

Therefore for the antiquity of the Egyptians, as I do not agree with Mercator, nor judge with the Vulgar, which give too much credit to the Egyptian antiquities: so I do not think the report of their antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceive it. But I rather incline to this, that Egypt being peopled before the flood, and two or three hundred years more or less after Adam, there might remain unto the sons of Mizraim some monuments (in pillars or altars of stone or metal) of their former kings or governors: which the Egyptians having added to the list and roll of their kings after the flood, in succeeding time (out of the vanity of glory, or by some corruption in their priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memory of antiquity was in such sort preserved, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write, that the use of letters and the art of astronomy was known to the Babylonians 3634 years before Alexander's conquest: and this report Annius findeth to agree and reach to the time of Enoch, who was born 1034 years before the flood, and wrote of the world's destruction, both by water and fire; as also of Christ's coming in judgment; as St. Jude hath witnessed. But leaving these antiquities to other mens judgments, and every man to his own reason, I will conclude this plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it took the name of Egypt from Aegyptus the son of Belus, as aforesaid. Being divided into two regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterranean sea, was called the inferiour Egypt; surnamed also Delta; because the several branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the river, gave it the form of the Greek letter Delta, which is the form of a triangle. That branch, which ran toward the north-east and embraced the sea, next unto the desarts of Sur and Pbaran, had on it the city of Pelusium, where Senacherib was repulsed: the other branch, which yielded it self to the salt-water towards the north-east, is beautified by that famous city of Alexandria: the upper part of Egypt is bounded between Memphis and Syene near Ethiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient city of Thebes, which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100 gates: and therefore called Civitas centum portarum, and by the Greeks Diospolis; in the scriptures No-bamon, which signifieth multitudes of inhabitants, exceeding belief. ^a Josephus calls Egypt Merjin of Mizraim: and ^b He- rodotus affirms, that it had once the name of Thebais.

Phut the third son of Ham took the next portion of land to his brother Mizraim, and inhabited Libya, whose people were anciently called Phutæi, saith ^c Josephus, and Pliny mentioneth the river Fut in Mauritania: which river from the mountain Atlas, known to the inhabitants by the name of Dyris, he maketh to be distant the space of 200 miles. It also appeareth in the 30th chapter of Ezekiel, that Phut, Chush and Lud were contermini and associates with the Egyptians.

S E C T. XII.

Of the eleven sons of Canaan, the fourth son of Ham.

† I.

Of the bounds of the land of Canaan; with the names of his eleven sons.

CANAN, the fourth son of Ham, possess'd all that region called by the Romans Palestina; in the scriptures Galilea, Samaria and Judea; in the latter times known by the name of the Holy Land and Jury; the limits whereof are precisely set down by Moses, Genesis 10. Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar until Azzah, and as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrha, and Admah, and Zeboim, even unto Lasha. Now howsoever these words of the Hebrew text [as thou goest] be converted, Moses's meaning was, that Gerar was the south bound of Canaan, and Zidon the north; Sodom and Gomorrha the east, and the other cities named, stood on the frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right line from Gaza, in the way of Egypt, the uttermost territory of Canaan southward: and this was properly the land of Canaan.

Now the sons of Canaan which possess'd this country, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleven:

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Jebusi or Jebuseus.
4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Girgeshi or Girgeseus.
6. Hevi or Chiveus.
7. Arki or Harkeus.
8. Sini or Sineus.
9. Arvadi or Arvadaeus.
10. Zamari or Samareus, or Tzemarius.
11. Hamathi or Hamathæus, or Chamathæus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergesites, Amorites, Hevites, Jebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zamari or Samareus, or from some of his.

† II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

ZIDON the first-born of Canaan, built the famous city of Zidon in Phenicia, which afterward fell in partition to the tribe of Asher: for Asher, Zabulon and Naphtali had a great part of the ancient Phenicia distributed among them; but the Asherites could never obtain Zidon itself.

The second son of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those seven principal nations (commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out: namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites and Hevites, and the Jebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron, near the torrent Besor, and about ^a*Gerar*, which Moses maketh the uttermost limit of Canaan, having the desert of Pharan to the south: for about Bersabe (otherwise Puteus juramenti) four miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his posterity, as far to the north-east as Hebron, and Mamre; and of Ephraim the Hittite did ^b*Abraham* buy the field of Sarah's burial. Of which nation Rebecca bewailed herself to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her life for the daughters of Heth. The giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce nation, whose entertainments by the kings of Israel against them, the Syrians greatly fear'd: as in the second of the Kings; ^d*Israel hath hired against us the kings of the Hittites*.

† III.

Of the Jebusites and Amorites.

JE B U S E U S the third son of Canaan, of whom came the Jebusites, and whose principal seat was Jebus, afterwards Jerusalem, were also a valiant and stubborn nation, and held their city and the country near it, till such time as David by God's assistance recovered both: yet were not the Jebusites extinguished, but were tributaries to Solomon.

Amoreus was the fourth son of Canaan, of whom the Amorites took name, who inhabited that land to the east of Jordan below the sea of Galilee, having Arnon and the mountains of Galaad on the east, and Jordan on the west; of whom Og, king of Basan, and Sihon, overthrown by Moses, were princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan: as behind Libanus in the edge of Cœlesyria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the mountains of ^e*Juda*, and in Idumæa near the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came, that all the Canaanites were sometimes called Amorites: as in Genesis xv. For the wickedness of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerful nation, we find in the prophet Amos; ⁱ*Yet destroyed I the Amorite before them, whose height was like the height of a cedar, and he was strong as the oaks*.

† IV.

Of the Gergesites, Hevites and Harkites.

TH E fifth son of Canaan was Gergeseus or Gergeson, otherwise Girgasi, who inhabited on the east-side of the lake of Tiberias, or the sea of Galilee, where Ptolemy sets the city Gerasa, which Josephus calls Gesera in the territory of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ dispossest the possess'd with devils; and the Gergesites desired him to depart their coasts; because their swine filled with the evil spirits drowned themselves in the sea of Galilee. Gergeseus also built Berytus, sometime Geris, afterwards Fœlix Julia, three miles from the river Adonis in Phœnicia, in which the Romans held a garrison, and to which Augustus gave many large privileges.

Heveus the sixth son, and father of the Hevites, inhabited under Libanus near Emath. These Hevites, howsoever the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomy the second is remembered) yet many of them remained all the war of Joshua, and afterwards to the time of Solomon. For God was not pleased utterly to root out these nations, but they were sometimes made tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times served, in their falling away from the true worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is written Judges iii. They remained to prove Israel by them, whether they would obey the commandments of God.

The seventh son was Araceus or Harki, who between the foot of Libanus and the Mediterranean sea, over-against Tripolis, built the city of Archas, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachis.

† V.

Of Sini and Arvadi.

SI N E U S the eighth son, Hierosolymitanus sets at Caparorsa, which Ptolemy finds in Judea, not far from Jebus; to the south thereof, saith Junius. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which St. Jerome calls Sim; Ptolemy, Simyra; Mela and Pliny, Simirus; Brochard, Sycon (called Synochis) near Arca. Pererius thinks that Sineus inhabited the deserts of Sinai, or thereabouts; but hereof there is no other certainty than the report of Brochard, who took view of all these places, affirming that Sineus built Synochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another nation of Sini, written with the letter C, otherwise Kenai, who descended of Hobab the son of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israelites, in their conduction thro' the wilderness of Pharan. But these Cinai were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of land with the ^b*Naphtalims*, besides their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinai Balaam prophesied, that they should be destroyed by the Assyrians.

The ninth son was Aradeus or Arvadeus, who in the isle of ^c*Aradus* built the city Arados: opposite against which island, on the main of Phœnicia, they founded another city of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this city came St. Peter, saith Clement, and in this isle preached the gospel; and founded a church in honour of our lady: but we find no such work of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous, and places of skilful seamen, whom Ezekiel remembreth in his prophecies against the Tyrians. ⁱ*The inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad were thy mariners*.

Of Zemari.

OF Samareus or Zemari, the tenth son, there are divers opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Cœlesyria at Edeffa, and founded Samaraim, which in Joshua is placed in the tribe of Benjamin. There is also Samaraim (of the same orthography) upon the mountains of Ephraim, saith ^b*Beroaldus*, mentioned in the second of Chronicles xiii. 4. which the Latin converteth amiss, saith he, by Semerom. The Hierosolymitan paraphrast makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emiffani, which Pliny calls the Hemissen, in Cœlesyria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembered. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew orthography, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omri) disproveth. ⁱ*And he bought the mountain Samaria, or Shemerom, of one Shemer, for two talents of silver, and built in the mountain: and called the name of the city which he built, after the* name of Shemir, lord of the mountain Samaria. But of all these places I shall speak more at large in the conquest of the Holy Land by the children of Israel. Of whomsoever the Samaritans were descended, sure I am, that they were ever a perfidious nation, and base: for as long as the state of the Jews stood up, they always called themselves Jews; when it suffered or sunk, they then utterly denied to be of that nation or family; for at such time as they were returned from their first captivity, they became a mix'd nation; partly of the colonies of the Affyrians, and partly of the naturals.

† VII.

Of Hamathi.

THE last of Canaan's sons was Hamatheus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi of Hamath, saith Beroaldus, of which (the aspiration taken away) the same is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamatheus was present. Josephus and St. Jerome confound Emath with Antioch, not that Antioch which standeth on the river Orontes on the frontier of Comagena, between the mountain Cassius and the province of Pieria, and Seleucis, of which St. Peter was bishop, and in which St. Luke and Ignatius were born: but Antioch surnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus supposeth, which standeth between Apamea and Emesa in Cassiotis. Yet indeed Emath cannot be taken for either; for both that Antioch upon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emesa, are farther off seated from Canaan, than ever any of those nations stragled. And whereas St. Jerome setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the tribe of Naphtali; it is manifest that Epiphania, which standeth to the north of Emesa, hath all the province of Laodicea between it and any part of the land divided. And if Libanon it self were not shared among the tribes, then could not Epiphania belong unto them: for both the provinces Laodicea and Libanica are between Epiphania and any part of the Holy Land, and therefore Emath so taken could not be a part of Naphtali, as in the 13th of Joshua is directly proved. For Joshua counting the lands that remained unpossess'd, reckoneth all mount Libanon towards the sun-rising, from Baal-gad under mount Hermion, until we come to Hamath. And this reason, among others, is used, that Emath was not in Nephtalim, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: because David accepted the presents of Tobu a king of Emath, and therewithal conditions of peace; which he would not have done, if that territory had ever belonged to the children of Israel, but would have recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this argument, as I take it, hath no great weight: for if the promise which God made be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomy, then might Emath be comprehended, tho' seated altogether without the bounds of the land promised, according to the description of Moses and Joshua; for Emath is indeed situate on the other side of the mountain of Hermion, which joineth to Libanus, and is otherwise called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Joshua xix. 35. and written in the Latin version Emath; therein, saith Beroaldus, was St. Jerome mistaken. Emath or Iturea is that over the mountains, and the city in Nephtalim should be written Hamath; and so the Septuagint, understanding the difference, write it Ammath and not Emath, the same which indeed belonged to the Nephtalims, seated on the south-side of Libanus to the east of Affedim: which St. Jerome writes Emath, Josephus Hamath, others Emathin, or Amatheos, and the people Amathein; of which, as I take it, Rabshakeh vaunteth in the second of Kings; Where is the God of Hamath?

SECT. XIII.

Of the sons of Chush, excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter.

The sons of Chush were	$\left\{ \begin{array}{l} \textit{Seba,} \\ \textit{Havila,} \\ \textit{Sabta,} \\ \textit{Raama,} \\ \textit{Sabteca,} \\ \textit{Nimrod.} \end{array} \right\}$	And the sons of Raama were	$\left\{ \begin{array}{l} \textit{Sheba} \\ \text{and} \\ \textit{Dedan.} \end{array} \right\}$
-------------------------------	---	-----------------------------------	---

That most of the sons of Chush were seated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabeans that robbed Job: and of the queen that came to Solomon.

SEBA or Saba was the eldest son of Chush, the eldest son of Ham, to make a difference between him and his nephew Sheba, the son of his brother Raama, or Regma (or Ragma, after Montanus) his name is written with a single [S] Samech, and Sheba the son of Regma with an [S] aspirate, which is the Hebrew Schin. Seba the eldest son of Chush, Regma his brother, and Sheba the son of Regma, possess'd both the shores of Arabia Felix. Saba took that part toward the Red sea, as nearest his father Chush, and the land of the Chusites: Regma and Sheba, the east coast of the same Arabia, which looketh into the gulf of Persia; of which Pliny: Sabæi Arabum populi propter thura clarissimi ad utraque maria porrectis gentibus habitant; The Sabeans, people of Arabia, famous for their frankincense, extending their nations, dwell along both the seas, to wit, the Persian and the Arabian or Red sea. This country was afterwards called Arabia a populi mixtione, saith Possellus. To this agreeth Ptolemy, who setteth the city of Saba towards the Arabian or Red sea, and the city Rhegama towards the Persian, with whom also we may leave Sabta: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolemy, because he remembreth a nation (called Stabæi) near the Persian sea; and Massabatæ which descended of them. But Montanus hath sent Regma, or (as he calls him Rhama) into Carmania, for which I see no reason. Josephus, who only attended his own fancies, hath banished Saba or Seba to the border of Ethiopia. But Beroaldus thinks it strange, that the Sabæi, which stole away Job's cattle, should run thro' all Egypt, and all Arabia Petraea, and find out Job in Traconitis between Palestina and Cœlesyria 1200 miles off. Now as this conjecture was more than ridiculous, so do I think, that neither the Sabæi on the Red sea, nor those toward the Persian sea, could by any means execute the stealth upon Job, whichsoever Beroaldus shall take for nearest. But these were the Sabæi of Arabia the desert, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his own experience, that the city Saba is seated: the same which Ptolemy calls Save, now Semiscasac: and from this Saba in Arabia the desert, came those magi or wisemen which worshipped Christ, saith Melchior, whose words are these: The magi came neither out of Mesopotamia (as Chrysostome, Jerome, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the happy, as many wise men do believe, but out of Saba in Arabia the desert: which city when myself was there, was (as I judged it) called Sēmīscāfāc. And to approve this opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that the Sabæi were neighbours to Job, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other nations (as well those on the Persian sea, as those on the Red sea) are so disjoined with large desarts, as there is no possibility for strangers to pass them, especially with any numbers of cattle, both in respect of the mountains, of the sands, and of the extream want of water in those parts: Ubi nec homines nec bestię videntur, nec aves, imo nec arbores, nec germen aliquod, sed non nisi montes saxosi, altissimi, asperrimi; Where there are found neither men nor beast, no not so much as birds, or trees, nor any pasture, or grafs, but only sharp, and high, stony, and craggy mountains. Be-roaldus and Pererius conceive that the queen of Saba which came to visit Solomon, was of the Sabæi on the east side of Arabia Fœlix; but the contrary seemeth more probable, that she was queen of Saba towards the Red sea: for Solomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petrea, betwixt Idumæa and the Red sea, as far down as Midian or Madian, and Ezion Gaber: and this queen of Saba, which inhabited the west part of Arabia Fœlix, being his neighbour, might without any far travel enter his territories, free from all danger of surprize by any other prince or nation.

But to avoid tediousness, it is manifest that Seba or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Rhegma, with his sons Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the possessors of Arabia the happy and the desert: only Havila and Nimrod dwelt together on the east side of Chush, who held Arabia Petrea. Now for Sabta, there is found of his name the city of Sabbatha or Sabota in the same Arabia: of which both ^a*Pliny* and Ptolemy; who withal nameth Sabotale, within the walls whereof there were sometimes found sixty temples. Ezekiel joineth the father and the son together, ^b*The merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy merchants*. And that they were the eastern Arabians their merchandize witnesseth, formerly repeated in the chapter of Paradise. For Josephus's fancies, that Saba was the parent of the Ethiopians about Meroe, and Sabta of the Ethiopian Astablari, they be not worthy any farther answer than hath already been given: especially seeing these cities, preserving the memory of the names of Saba and of Sabta in Arabia, were yet remaining in Ptolemy's time, tho' in some letters changed. As also in the coasts adjoining, the names of other of the brethren of the family of Chush, with little alterations are preserved. In Arabia the desert is found the city Sabæ or Save (now Sēmīscāfāc) with the city of Rhegana for Rhegma; and the nation by Ptolemy himself called Raabenī of Raamah. In Arabia the happy is found the city of Rhegama, and Rabana, which also keepeth the sound of Rhegma, the city of Saptba or Saptab, not far from the east coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and chief city, in the body of the south part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha; and to the west of Sabatha towards the Red sea the great city of Saba; and the nation adjoining, Sabæi: and to the south thereof again towards the straight entrance of the Red sea, the region of Sabæ. To all these his brothers and nephews which were seated on the east side of Arabia, Havilah by the passage of Tigris was a neighbour, to whom he might pass by boat even unto Rhegma the city of Raama or Rhegma, set near the river of Lar towards the mouth of the Persian sea, which stood in Ptolemy's time.

† II.

Josephus's opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chush, to have been seated in west Ethiopia, disproved out of Ezekiel and Jeremy.

AND whereas Josephus (whom in this St. Jerome followeth, as not curious herein) sent Dedan the son of Raamah into west Ethiopia, it is strange that Ezekiel should couple Sheba, Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15th verse, and Sheba and Raamah in the 22d verse, to be the merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in west Ethiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) above 4000 miles. Besides which the merchandize that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Black-mores. For they of Dedan (saith Ezekiel) were thy merchants in precious cloths for thy chariots; and these western Ethiopians never saw cloth, till the Portugals seeking those coasts traded with them: the merchandize of the country being hides, elephants teeth, some gold and amber, civit cats, and rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all these they exchanged for linen, or iron chiefly.

But in those days the west part of Africa within the body of the land was known only by imagination: and, being under the burnt zone was held uninhabitable. And therefore that the negroes of west Ethiopia, which inhabit about Serra, Liona, or Niger, could either pass by sea or land to Tyre in the bottom of the Mediterranean sea, were a strange, or rather a foolish fancy. Now to put it out of dispute that Dedan also dwelt by the rest of the children of Chush, which seats they held by that name in the time of Jeremy the prophet, let us hear Jeremy's own words: Fly ye inhabitants of Dedan, for I have brought the destruction of Esau upon him. Hereby it appeareth that Dedan was a neighbour to the Idumeans: and Idumæa is a province of Arabia Petrea: and Dedan which dwelt on the north part of Arabia Fœlix, joined in that part to Petrea, the seat of his grand-father Chush; which neighbourhood and fellowship of Dedan and the Idumeans is also confirmed by Ezekiel; ^c*I will stretch out mine hand upon Edom, and destroy man and beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword*.

SECT. XIV.

Of the issue of Mizraim: of the place of Jeremy, chap. ix. ver. 7.

AFTER Chush it followeth to speak of Mizraim's sons, whose names (saith ^a*St. Augustine*) were plural, to signify the nations which came from them. Ludim the eldest son of Mizraim was the father of the Libyans in Africa: and the rest of his brothers dispersed themselves into all regions adjoining. Among the sons of Shem there is also Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the son of Mizraim by the singular number: the son of Shem being written Lud, the son of Mizraim Ludim: and yet these names and nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of names and nations. For that Ludim the son of Mizraim was the parent of the Libyans in Africa, and that he was seated not far from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the prophet Jeremy, who joineth them in this sort together, ^b*Come up ye horses, and rage ye chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-mores and the Libyans which bear the shield: for those nations assisted the Egyptians being of one parent descended*.

^a Plin. l. 12. c. 14. Ptol. Tab. 6. Afric. ^b Ezek. 27. 22. ^c Ezek. 15. 15. ^d The termination im in the Hebrew, is commonly a sign of the plural number, as aim of the dual. ^e Jer. 46. 9.

And in Ezekiel, Phut and Lud are joined together. Ethiopia (or Chush) saith Ezekiel c. xxx. ver. 5. *And Phut and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the land that are in league shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the sons of Chush (which were the Chusites) the sons of Mizraim (which were the Egyptians) and the Libyans (descended of his son Lud) with other the inhabitants of Egypt and Africa shall fall together. Hierosolymitanus finds also in Africa a nation of the Lydians. And I believe it: because Jeremy joineth the Libyans and Lydians together in the place before remembred. But Libya in Africa is by the Hebrews called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) tho' 2 Chron. xii. 3. they seem to be called Lubim or Lubai, a name somewhat nearer the word Lybies, and by which it may seem that the truer writing is, not Libyes, but Lybies. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (upon the 30th of Ezekiel) understandeth that which is spoken of in the 5th verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Libyans at all: for he will have this threatening to be meant against the people of Lyda, a city, saith he, between Egypt and Palestina, which opinion I could not mislike, if the city of Lyda were so seated. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda with a double D, and is the same city which was afterwards Diospolis, in which St. Peter cured Eneas of the palsy) standeth near the torrent Gaas, not far from Joppe, the port of Jerusalem. Yet it is not impossible but that this city might have Lud for the founder. For there are many cities of one name founded in all the regions of the world, and far asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, many cities called Alexandria, Seleucia, and Antiochia, so of divers others. St. Jerome maketh Lehabim to be the father of Libya who was the 3d son of Mizraim: and so doth Posseilus; and either opinion may be true.*

The rest of Mizraim's sons have no proper countries given them in the scriptures, saving Caslubim and Caphtorim, of whom came the Philistines, whom the scriptures call Peleset.

These Caslubim inhabited Cassiotis, a region lying in the entrance of Egypt from Palestina, in which the lake Sirbonis and the mountain Cassius are found: not far from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphtorim seated near Caslubim in that tract of Egypt called Sethrotis, not far from Pelusium. Strabo calls it Sethrotis; Stephanus and Pliny, Sethroitis, of the city Sethron: which Ortelius takes to be the same which Ptolemy calls Hercules parva. Of the Caslubim and Caphtorim came the Philistines, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyli, which is, Alienigenæ, strangers, or of a strange kindred. These Philistines inhabited the south part of the holy land towards Egypt, of whom Palestina took name. For the Hebrews (saith Isidore) do not use the letter [P] but instead of it [Ph.] Their principal cities were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gazæi, Ascalonitæ, Azotii, Gethæi, and Accaronitæ. Isidore affirms, that Ascalon was first called Philistim: and of that city the country adjoining. But where Isidore had it I know not.

The first known king of the Philistines was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abraham's wife; with whom Abraham made a covenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written that he was also king of the Philistines, in these words: "Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech king of the Philistines unto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some ancients Abimelech governed the commonwealth greatly to his glory, the rest of his successors called themselves by the same name. The Philistines commanded that tract of land upon the Mediterranean sea to the northward, from the castle of Pilgrims (otherwise Casarea Palestina or Straton's tower) which was the south border of Phenicia, to Gaza, or to the river of Egypt. The Anakims, or strong giants, were of these Philistines, and Goliath was of Geth, one of the five cities above-named. They had sometimes five kings, saith Liranus. They mastered the Israelites at several times above 150 years, and kept them tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampson and Samuel; but in the end this yoke was taken off by David, and laid on themselves.

It is objected, that because these cities and the countries adjoining were held by the sons of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispossess the sons of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this saith Pererius, that altho' the Palestines or Philistines held it in the time of Joshua, yet at the time of the promise it was possess'd by the Canaanites; as in the 2d of Deuteronomy. The Hevites dwelt in the villages unto Gaza. And what marvel if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? for that the Philistines were of Caphtor, and so of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the prophet Jeremy witnesseth: "The Lord will destroy the Philistines, the remnant of the issue of Caphtor: and in like manner in Amos, the Philistines are said to be the reliques of Caphtorim: "Have not I brought up Israel out of the land of Egypt, and the Philistines from Caphtor, and Aram from Kir? so I read this place with divers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, & Palestinos de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conversion Beroaldus condemneth; where Caphtor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a city directly west from Egypt, between Ptolemais or Barce and Apollonia; but Kir in Asia under the Assyrians: Junius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene; and so hath the Geneva. But Pererius calls Caphtorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he mean Cappadocia in Palestina, and not that "Cappadocia by the sea Pontus in the north of Asia the less. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Palestina, it is not certainly known. And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the 2d of Kings, that Teglatphalasser king of the Assyrians carried away the inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Josephus seems to understand this Kir, for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene Media superior: for it was the manner and policy of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captived.

SECT. XV.

Of the issue of Sem.

† I.

Of Elim, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

IT remaineth lastly to speak of the sons of Sem, who were these:

* Basil upon the 33d Psalm. Jerome upon the 20th of Ezekiel. Book, Chap. vii. Sed. iii. † 5. * 2 Kings 16. 9.

b Jer. 47. 4. c Amos 9. 7. d Of which see in the second

1. Alam, or Elam.
2. Ashur.
3. Arphaxad.
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

The posterity of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them he proceedeth in order with the genealogy and story of the Hebrews. For of Sem was Abraham descended.

Of these five sons the scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the children of him and Aram, the rest are barely spoken of by rehearsal of their names, saving that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Nineveh) was also said to be the father of the Assyrians, whose issues of Cham instantly contended for the empire of the east: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the virtue of their princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth us, that all the east parts of the world were peopled by Assur, Elam and Lud (saving India) which I believe Noah himself first inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Havilah the sons of Joſtan afterwards repaired. Hi filii Sem ab Euphrate fluvio partem Asiæ usque ad oceanum Indicum tenuerunt; These sons of Sem (saith St. Jerome) held all those regions from Euphrates to the Indian ocean.

Of ^a Elam came the Elamites, remembred, Aët ii. 9. and the princes of Persia; which name then began to be out of use and lost, when the Persians became masters of Babylonia: the east Monarchy being established in them. Some prophane writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the king's seat of Persia (witness Daniel viii. 2.) And I saw (saith he) in a vision, and when I saw it, I was in the palace of Susan, which is in the province of Elam. This city is embraced by the river Euleus (according to ^b Ptolemy) in Daniel, Ulai: and seated in the border of Susana.

Ashur (as most historians believe) the 2d son of Sem, was father of the Assyrians, who disdaining the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Nineveh, of equal beauty and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disprove that opinion. Every man's hand hath been in this story, and therefore I shall not need herein to speak much: for the Assyrians so often invaded and spoiled the Israelites, destroy'd their cities, and led them captives, as both in divine and human letters there is large and often mention of this nation.

But howsoever Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this empire, and honour this nation with ample dominion; yet was not the state of the Assyrians any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus lost the empire. For Senacherib, who was one of the powerfullest princes among them, had yet the mountain Taurus for the utmost of his dominion towards the north east, and Syria bounded him towards the west, notwithstanding those vaunts of Senacherib in Isaiah xxxvii. 11. Have the gods of the nations delivered them whom my fathers have destroyed? as Gozan, and Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden which were at Telassar. Where is the king of Hamath, and the king of Arphad, and the king of the city Sepharvaim, Hena and Ivah? all these indeed were but petty kings of cities, and small countries; as Haran, in Mesopotamia: Reseph, in Palmyrena: Hamath, or Emath, in Iturea under Libanus: the isle of Eden: Sepher, and others of this sort. Yea Nabuchodonosor, who was most powerful, before the conquest of Egypt had but Chaldea, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palestina and Phenicia parts thereof. But in this question of Assur, I will speak my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose plantation I have omitted among the rest of the Chusites, because he established the first empire: from whom the most memorable story of the world taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldeans, saith S. Jerome, and Josephus, but it must be those Chaldeans about Ur: for the sons of Cham possess'd the rest. It is true that he was the father of the Hebrews: for Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela Heber, of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the 4th son of Shem, gave name to the Lydians in Asia the less, is the common opinion, taken from Josephus and St. Jerome; but I see not by what reason he was moved to straggle thither from his friends.

† II.

Of Aram and his sons.

A Ram, the 5th and last son of Shem, was the parent of the Syrians: of which ^c Damascus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (saith ^d Eusebius out of Josephus) which Syrus lived before Moses was born; the same which others call the son of Apollo. Mesopotamia also being but a province of Syria, had the name of Aram Nabaraiim, which is as much to say, as Syria duorum fluviorum, Syria compassed with two rivers (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates. The scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram, and the Greeks Mesopotamia simply.

^e Arise and get thee to Padan Aram (saith Isaac to Jacob) to the house of Bethuel thy mother's father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo also remembreth it by the ancient name of Aram or Aramea, as these his own words converted witness. ^f Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipsi Syri Aramenios & Arameos vocant; those which we call Syrians (saith he) themselves call Aramenians and Arameans.

Against this opinion that Aram the son of Sem, was the father and denominator of the Syrians in general (and not only of those in Syria Inter-amnis, which is Mesopotamia) some read Gen. xxii. 21. Kemuel, the father of the Syrians: where others out of the original read Kemuel, the son of Aram. Neither is it any inconvenience for us to understand the word [Aram] here, not for the nation, but for the name of some one of note; the rather, because in the history of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before Kemuel's posterity could be famous) we find Mesopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: sometimes with Nabaraiim, and sometimes of Padan, to distinguish it from another Aram, which (as it seems) then also was called Aram. For whereas Junius thinks in his note upon Gen. xxv. 20. that Padan Aram ought to be restrained to some part of Mesopotamia (to wit) to that part which Ptolemy calls Ancobaritis (so called from the river Chaboras, which dividing it, runneth into Euphrates) the promiscuous use of Padan Aram, and Aram Nabaraiim (which latter appellation questionless comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seem to refute this opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole region. For it signifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agrees with this region: because the two rivers (as it were) yoked together go along it. The reliques of the name Padan appear in the name of two cities in Ptolemy, called Aphadana (as Junius hath well noted) the one upon Chaborus, the other upon Euphrates.

The sons

Uz or Hus inhabited about Damascus, and built that city, say Josephus and ^a St. Jerome. But Tostatus mistaking this opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who also followeth Josephus, affirmeth that Abraham's steward Eliezer was the founder thereof; tho' it were likely that Hus, the eldest son of Aram dwelt near unto his father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a region of the same, adjoining to Arabia the desert, and to Batanea or Traconitis: whereof the prophet Jeremy: ^b Rejoyce and be glad O daughter of Edom that dwellest in the land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the east region of Traconitis, adjoining to Basan, having Batanea Gaulonitis, and the mountain Seir to the east, Edrai to the south, Damascus north, and Jordan west: having in it many cities and people, as may also be gathered out of Jeremy. ^c And all sorts of people: and all the kings of the land of Hus. In this region dwelt Job, descended of Hus, the son of Nabor, the brother of Abraham (saith St. Jerome) and married Dinah the daughter of Jacob, saith Philo.

Hul the 2d son of Aram, St. Jerome makes the father of the Armenians: and Gether the 3d son, parent to the Armenians or Carians: which opinion (because I find not where to set him) I do not disprove, tho' I see no reason why Gether should leave the fellowship of his own brethren, and dwell among strangers in Asia the less. Junius gives Hul (whom he writes Chul) the desert of Palmyrena, as far as Euphrates, where Ptolemy setteth the city of Cholle.

Gether (saith Josephus) founded the Bactrians: but Josephus gave all Noah's children feathers, to carry them far away in all haste. For mine own opinion, I always keep the rule of neighbourhood, and think with Junius (to wit) that Gether seated himself near his brothers, in the body of Syria, and in the province of Cassiotis, and Seleucis, where Ptolemy placeth Gindarus, and the nation by Pliny called Gindareni.

Junius also giveth to Mes or Mesch the north part of Syria, between Cilicia and Mesopotamia, near the mountain Mafius. The certainty of those plantations can no otherwise be known than by this probability, that Aram the father (of whom that great region took name) planted his sons in the same land about him: for he wanted no scope of territory for himself and them; neither then when the world was newly planted, nor in many hundred years after: and therefore there is no reason to cast them into the desert parts of the world, so far asunder. And as necessity and policy held them together for a while: so ambition (which began together with angels and men) inhabiting the hearts of their children set them asunder. For altho' these sons of Aram, and the sons of the rest of Noah's children, kept themselves within the bounds of some one large kingdom; yet therein every one also sought a province apart, and to themselves; giving to the cities therein built, their own names, thereby to leave their memory to their posterity: the use of letters being then rare, and known to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many provinces: every one emulating and disdaining the greatness of others, as they are thereby to this day subject to invasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Novæ Hispania, and Peru excepted, because those countries are unaccessible to strangers) an easy force will cast them out of all the rest.

Mes, the 4th son, is made the parent of the Meonians: ^d of whom something hath been spoken already. Arphaxad, the 3d son of Shem, begat Shelah and Heber. Heber had two sons, Phaleg and Joflan: and in Phaleg's time was the earth divided.

† III.

Of the division of the earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sons of Heber, of the issue of Sem.

THE many people which at the division (at Phaleg's birth) were then living, and the thorough plantation of all the east part of the world (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the earth were divided at either. The Hebrews (saith Pererius out of Sedar Holam, one of their chronicles) affirm that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was born in the year after the flood 101, and lived in all 239 years, which numbers added, make 340. And therefore was it so many years after the flood, ere the children of Noah severed themselves. But to this opinion of the Hebrews, and the doubt they make how in so few years as 101 (the time of Phaleg's birth) so many people could be increased; Pererius gives this answer, That if 70 persons of the family of Jacob increased to 600000 fighting men in 215 years (besides women, children, and impotent persons) how much more is it likely, that so soon after the flood the children of Noah might in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, having received the blessing of God, Increase and multiply, and fill the earth? What strength this answer hath, let others judge: for the children of Israel were 70, and had 215 years time: and the sons of Noah were but three, and had but 101 years time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceive that Phaleg took that name after the division, in memory thereof: as ^e Josephus and St. Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the division were at Phaleg's death (which happened in the year, which is commonly held to be the 48th of Abraham, but was by more likely computation 12 years before his birth) then was the division 38 years after Ninus, who governed 52 years: in the 43d year of whose reign Abraham was born. But when Ninus began to rule the Assyrians 80 years before this division (as this division is placed by the Hebrews, Jerome and Chrysostom) then was the earth so peopled in all the east and northern parts, as greater numbers have not been found at any time since. For Ninus associated to himself Ariæus king of Arabia, a people who at that time (saith Diodorus Siculus) plurimum opibus atque armis præstabant, exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many cities in Armenia; received Barzanis into grace; then invaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the king thereof, with his wife and seven children; vanquished all those regions between Nilus and Tanais, the Egyptians, Phenicians, the kingdoms of Syria, and all the nations of Persia, to the Hyrcanian sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (already remembered out of Ctesias) against Zoroaster, and others: and Zoroaster on the other side, who made resistance with 400000, prove it sufficiently, that if the division had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no division at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their partitions, as they fought to be masters of all; and greater armies were there never gathered than by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

But for that conceit, that if the division had been made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers born to fill the earth: it was never meant that the earth could be filled every where at the very instant, but by time and degrees: and surely whatsoever men's opinions have been herein, yet it is certain, that the division of tongues and of men must go near together with the ceasing of the work at Babel: and that the enterprise of Babel was left off instantly upon the confusion of languages, where followed the execution of the division; and so neither at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was born in the year 101 after the flood, which was the year that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or 10 years after he arrived, saith Berosus.

Now if it be objected that Phaleg (the etymology of whose name signifieth division) must have lived without a name, except the name had been given him at the time of this confusion and partition. To this objection it may be answered, that the change of names upon divers accidents is not rare in the scriptures: for Jacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the angel; Abraham was first Abram, and Edom Esau; and that Phaleg being a principal man in this division had his first name upon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, whereas the Hebrews, St. Jerome and Chrysostom account Heber for a great prophet, if that by giving his son the name of Phalog, he foretold the division which followed. To this I say, I do not find that Heber deserved any such honour, if he had thereupon so called his son: for division and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessity; and this prophecy (if any such had been) might also have reference to the division, which afterwards fell among the Hebrews themselves.

But if we give a reasonable time to the building of the tower and city of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstrative proof) might be increas'd: and that upon the fall thereof the confusion and division followed (whereupon Phaleg took name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

† IV.

Of the sons of Joctan, the other son of Heber.

- The sons of Joctan were
1. Elmodad.

2. Saleph, or Salep, or Sheleph.

3. Asamath, or Chatzar.

4. Jare, or Jaraab, or Jerath.

5. Madoram.

6. Uzal, or Uxal.

7. Dicklach, or Dicla.

8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.

9. Abimaol.

10. Sheba, or Seba.

11. Ophir, or Opir.

12. Havilah, or Chavila, and

13. Jobab.

ALL those sons of Joctan, according to St. Jerome, dwelled in the east parts of the world, or India, even from the river Copbe or Choas, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certain places of those thirteen sons cannot be gathered out of the scriptures, the words of Moses being general. ^a And their dwelling was from Mesha as thou goest unto Sephar a mount in the east. Of all these thirteen sons, there were only three memorable, to wit, Sheba, Ophir and Havilah. Concerning whose names, to avoid confusion, it is to be observed, that among the sons of Chush, two of them had also the names of Soba and Havilah. Abraham had also a third Saba or Sheba, his grandchild by his wife Ketura. But Seba the son of Chush, and Sheba the son of Rhegma his nephew, we have left in Arabia Fœlix: and Havilah the son of Chush upon Tigris. Saba the grand-child of Abraham was (as some have thought, the father of the Sabeans in Persia: of which nations Dionysius de orbis situ maketh mention. Primum Sabæi; post hos sunt Passagardæ, prope vero hos sunt Tasci: The first are Sabeans; after these be Passagardæ; and near these the Tasci. And whereas it is written: ^b But unto the sons of the concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his son (while he yet lived) eastward to the east country: hereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the son of Abraham wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthest east country in respect of Judea; which also Ovid setteth under the sun-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abraham's sons seated themselves on the borders of Judea, I rather chuse to leave Saba the son of Abraham in Arabia the desert, where Ptolemy setteth a city of that name.

But Saba the son of Joctan, the son of Heber, as I conceive, inhabited India it self. For ^d Dionysius Afer in his Periægesis, or description of the world, which he wrote in Greek verse, among the regions of India findeth a nation called the Sabæi. Taxilus hos inter medios habitatque Sabæus; In the midst of these dwell the Sabæi, and the Taxili, saith this Dionysius.

† V.

Of Ophir one of Joctan's sons, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Solomon.

OPHIR also was an inhabitant of the East-Indies, and, as St. Jerome understands it, in one of the islands plentiful with gold, which are now known by the name of Molucca. Josephus understands Ophir to be one of those great head-lands in India, which by a general name are called Chersonesi, or Peninsule; of which there are two very notorious, Calicut and Malacoe. Pererius takes it rightly for an island, as St. Jerome doth, but he sets it at the head-land of Malacca: but Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther east.

Arias Montanus out of 2 Chronicles iii. 6. gathers, that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the west ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the south sea; by others, Mare pacificum. The words in 2 Chronicles are these: And he overlaid the house with precious stones for beauty; and the gold was gold of Parvaim. Junius takes this gold to be the gold of Havilah, remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the gold of that land is good: finding a town in Characene a province of Susiana called Barbatia, so called, as he thinks, by corruption for Parvaim: from whence those kings subjected by David, brought this gold, with which they presented him; and which David preserved for the enriching of the temple.

But this fancy of Peru hath deceived many men before Montanus and Plessis, who also took Ophir for Peru. And that this question may be a subject of no farther dispute, it is very true, that there is no region in the world of that name: sure I am, at least, that America hath none, no not any city, village or mountain so called. But when Francis Pizarro first discovered those lands to the south of Panama, arriving in that region which Atabaliba commanded, a prince of magnificence, riches and dominion inferior to none, some of the Spaniards utterly ignorant of that language, demanding by signs, as they could, the name of the country, and pointing with their hand athwart a river, or torrent, or brook that ran by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that brook, or of water in general. The Spaniards thereupon conceiving that the people had rightly understood them, set it down in the diurnal of their enterprize, and so in the first description made, and sent over to Charles the emperour, all that west part of America to the south of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued ever since, as divers Spaniards in the Indies assured me; which also Acosta the Jesuite, in his natural and moral history of the Indies, confirmeth. And whereas Montanus also findeth, that a part of the Indies, called Jucatan, took that name of Jotzan, who, as he supposeth, navigated from the utmost east of India to America: it is most true, that Jucatan, is nothing else in the language of that country, but [What is that?] or [What say you?] For when the Spaniards asked the name of that place (no man conceiving their meaning, one of the savages answered Jucatan, which is, What ask you? or, What say you. The like happened touching Paria, a mountainous country on the south side of Trinidad and Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring, as all men do, the names of those new regions which they discovered, pointed to the hills afar off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to say, as high hills or mountains. For as Paria begins that marvellous ledge of mountains, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan; from eight degrees of north latitude to fifty two of south; and so hath that country ever since retained the name of Paria.

The same happened among the English, which I sent under Sir Richard Greenville to inhabit Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of that country, one of the savages answered, Wingandacon, which is as much to say, as, You wear good cloaths, or gay cloaths. The same happened to the Spaniard in asking the name of the island Trinidad: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that self place which the sea incompassed, they answered Caeri, which signifieth an island. And in this manner have many places newly discovered been intitled, of which Peru is one. And therefore we must leave Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabouts such an island is credibly affirmed to be.

Now altho' there may be found gold in Arabia it self (towards Persia) in Havilah, now Susiana, and all along that East-Indian shore; yet the greatest plenty is taken up at the Philippines, certain islands planted by the Spaniards from the East-Indies. And by the length of the passage which Solomon's ships made from the Red sea (which were three years in going and coming) it seems they went to the uttermost east, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeed these that now go from Portugal, or from hence, finish that navigation in two years, and sometimes less: and Solomon's ships went not above a tenth part of this our course from hence. But we must consider, that they evermore kept the coast, and crept by the shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the use of the compass was known, it was impossible to navigate athwart the ocean; and therefore Solomon's ships could not find Peru in America. Neither was it needful for the Spaniards themselves, had it not been for the plenty of gold in the East-India islands, far above the mines of any one place of America, to sail every year from the west part of America thither, and there to have strongly planted, and inhabited the richest of those islands: wherein they have built a city called Manilia. Solomon therefore needed not to have gone farther off than Ophir in the east, to have sped worse: neither could he navigate from the east to the west in those days, whereas he had no coast to have guided him.

Tostatus also gathereth a phantastical opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a country, whose mountains of gold are kept by griffins: which mountains Solinus affirmeth to be in Scythia Asiatica, in these words. Nam cum auro & gemmis affluant, griphes tenent universa, alites ferocissimæ, Arimaspi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these countries abound in gold, and rich stone, the griffins defend the one and the other, a kind of fowl the fiercest of all other; with which griffins a nation of people, called Arimaspi, make war. These Arimaspi are said to have been men with one eye only, like unto the Cyclopes of Sicilia; of which Cyclopes Herodotus and Aristeus make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third book, and ^a Valerius Flaccus, and ^b Diodorus Siculus in the story of Alexander Macedon. But for mine own opinion, I believe none of them. And for these Arimaspi, I take it, that this name signifying one-eyed was first given them by reason that they used to wear a vizard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serve both eyes; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Solinus borroweth these things out of Pliny, who speaks of such a nation in the extreme north, at a place called Gisolithron, or the cave of the north-east wind. For the rest, as all fables were commonly grounded upon some true stories, or other things done, so might these tales of the griffins receive this moral. That if those men, which fight against so many dangerous passages for gold, or other riches of this world, had their perfect senses, and were not deprived of half their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and understanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subject themselves to famine, corrupt air, violent heat, and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And tho' this fable be feigned in this place, yet if such a tale were told of some other places of the world, where wild beasts or serpents defend mountains of gold, it might be avowed. For there are in many places of the world, especially in America, many high and impassable mountains which are very rich and full of Gold, inhabited only by tygers, lions, and other ravenous and cruel beasts: unto which if any man ascend (except his strength be very great) he shall be sure to find the same war, which the Arimaspi make against the griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of the gold, or seek to defend that metal, but being disquieted, or made afraid of themselves or their young ones, they grow enraged and adventurous. In like sort it may be said that the Alegartos, which the Egyptians call the Crocodiles, defend those pearls which lie in the lakes of the inland: for many times the poor Indians are eaten up by them, when they dive for the pearl. And though the Alegartos know not the pearl, yet they find favour in the flesh and blood of the Indians, whom they devour.

+ VI.

Of Havilah the son of Joctan, who also passed into the East-Indies : and of Mesha and Sepher named in the bordering of the families of Joctan : with a conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the world.

OF Havilah the son of Joctan there is nothing else to be said, but that the general opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East-Indies in the continent, from which Ophir pass'd into the islands adjoining. And whereas Ganges is said to water Havilah, it is meant by Havilah in the East-Indies, which took name of Havilah the son of Joctan : but Havilah, which Pison compasseth, was so called of Havilah, the son of Chus, as is formerly proved by this place of scripture : " Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah, as thou comest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Saul ever made war in the East-Indies, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteen sons of Joctan, these three Saba, Havilah, and Ophir ; tho' at the first seated by their brethren about the hill Masius, or Mesh, Gen. x. 30. to wit, between Cilicia and Mesopotamia ; yet at length either themselves or their issues removed into the East-Indies, leaving the other families of Joctan, to fill the countries of their first plantation, which the scripture defines to have been from Mesh unto Sephar. And altho' St. Jerome takes Mesh to be a region of the East-Indies, and Sephar a mountain of the same (which mountain Montanus would have to be the Andes in America) those fancies are far beyond my understanding. For the word [east] in the scriptures, where it hath reference to Judea, is never farther extended than into Persia. But Mesh is that part of the mountain of Masius in the north of Mesopotamia, out of which the river Chaboras springeth, which runneth by Charran : and in the same region we also find for Sephar (remembered by Moses) Sipphara by Ptolemy, standing to the east of the mountain Masius ; from whence Joctan having many sons, some of them might pass into India, hearing of the beauty and riches thereof. But this was in process of time.

The other fashion of planting I understand not, being grounded but upon mens imaginations, contrary to reason and possibility. And that this mountain in the east was no farther off than in those regions before remembered, it appeareth by many places of the scripture where the same phrase is used : as in Numbers xxiii. 7. Balac the king of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the mountain of the east ; which was from the east part of Mesopotamia. For Balac brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia (witness this place of Deuteronomy xxiii. 4.) Because they hired Balaam the son of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Nabaraiim, to curse thee : for Aram Nabaraiim was Syria fluviorum, which is Mesopotamia, as aforesaid.

This plantation of the world after the flood doth best agree, as to me it seems, with all the places of scripture compared together. And these be the reports of reason and probable conjecture ; the guides which I have followed herein, and which I have chosen to go after, making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their own fancies, be they ancient or modern. Neither have I any end herein, private or publick, other than the discovery of truth. For as the partiality of man to himself hath disguis'd all things, so the factious and hireling historians of all ages (especially of these latter times) have, by their many volumes of untrue reports, left honour without a monument, and virtue without memory : and instead thereof, have erected statues and trophies to those, whom the darkest forgetfulness ought to have buried, and covered over for evermore. And altho' the length and dissolving nature of time hath worn out or changed the names and memory of the world's first planters after the flood (I mean the greatest number and most part of them) yet all the footsteps of antiquity (as appears by that which hath been spoken) are not quite worn out nor overgrown : for Babylon hath to this day the sound of Babel ; Phenicia hath Zidon, to which city the eldest son of Canaan gave name ; so hath Cilicia Tharsis ; and the Armenians, Medes, Hiberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumeans, Libyans, Moors, and other nations, have preserved from the death of forgetfulness some signs of their first founders and true parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

SECT. I.

Of the proceeding from the first government under the eldest of families to regal, and from regal absolute to regal tempered with laws.

IT followeth now to intreat how the world began to receive rule and government, which (while it had scarcity of people) underwent no other dominion than paternity and eldership. For the fathers of nations were then as kings, and the eldest of families as princes. Hereof it came, that the word [elder] was always used both for the magistrate, and for those of age and gravity : the same bearing one signification almost in all languages. For in Numbers xi. God commanded Moses to gather together 70 of the elders of the people, and governors over them : the Hebrew bearing the same sense, which the Latin word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Susannah, Then the assembly believed them as those that were the elders and judges of the people. And so in the words of those false judges and witnesses to Daniel, Shew it unto us, seeing God hath given thee the office of an elder. Demosthenes useth the same word for the magistrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato, giveth two other reasons for this appellation : Apud Lacedemonios qui amplissimum magistratum gerunt, ut sunt, sic etiam appellantur Senes : Among the Lacedemonians the chief magistrates, as they are, so are they called Eldermen : and again, Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus non summum concilium majores nostri appellassent Senatum ; If reason and advisement were not in old men, our ancestors had never called the highest council by the name of a senate.

But tho' these reasons may well be given, yet we doubt not but in this name of [elders] for governors or counsellors of state, there is a sign that the first governors were the fathers of families ; and under them the eldest sons. And from thence did the French, Italian and Spaniard, take the word [Signor] and out of it [Seignoury] for lordship and dominion : signifying, according to Loyseau, puissance in propriety, or proper power. The kinds of this Seignoury, Seneca makes two : the one, Potestas aut imperium, Power or command : the other, Proprietas aut dominium, Propriety or mastership :

the correlative of the one is the subject, of the other the slave. Ad Cæsarem, saith he, potestas omnium pertinet, ad singulos proprietas; Cæsar hath power over all, and every man proprietor in his own. And again, Cæsar omnia imperio possidet, singuli dominio; Cæsar holdeth all in his power, and every man possesseth his own. But as men and vice began abundantly to increase, so obedience (the fruit of natural reverence, which but from excellent seed seldom ripeneth) being exceedingly overshadowed with pride and ill examples, utterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of paternal persuasions (after mankind began to neglect and forget the original and first giver of life) became in all over-weak, either to resist the first inclination of evil, or after (when it became habitual) to constrain it. So that now, when the hearts of men were only guided and steered by their own fancies, and tofs'd to and fro' on the tempestuous seas of the world, while wisdom was severed from power, and strength from charity; * Necessity (which bindeth every nature but the immortal) made both the wise and foolish understand at once, that the estate of reasonable men would become far more miserable than that of beasts, and that a general flood of confusion would a second time overflow them, did they not by a general obedience to order and dominion prevent it. For the mighty, who trusted in their own strengths, found others again (by interchange of times) more mighty than themselves: the feeble fell under the forcible; and the equal from equal received equal harmis. Inasmuch, that licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a liberty upon the first acquaintance) proved upon a better trial, no less perilous than an unendurable bondage.

These arguments by necessity propounded, and by reason maintained and confirmed, persuaded all nations which the heavens cover, to subject themselves to a master, and to magistracy in some degree. Under which government, as the change (which brought with it less evil, than the former mischiefs) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wise that observe it) found some imperfection and corrosive in this cure. And therefore the same necessity which invented, and the same reason which approved sovereign power, bethought it self of certain equal rules, in which dominion (in the beginning boundless) might also discern her own limits. For before the invention of laws, private affections in supreme rulers, made their own fancies both their treasurers and hangmen: measuring by this yard, and weighing in this balance both good and evil.

For as wisdom in eldership preceded the rule of kings, so the will of kings forewent the inventions of laws. Populus nullis legibus tenobatur: arbitria principum pro legibus erant; The people were not governed by any other laws than the wills of princes. Hereof it followed, that when kings left to be good, neither did those mens virtues value them, which were not fancied by their kings, nor those mens vices deform them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt; Love sees one while too much, another while stark nothing. Hence it came to pass, that after a few years (for direction and restraint of royal power) laws were established: and that government which had this mixture of equality (holding in an even balance supreme power and common right) acquired the title of regal; the other (which had it not) was known for tyrannical: the one God established in favour of his people; the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancy of this regal authority, princes, as they were chosen for their virtues only, so did they measure their powers by a great deal of moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia iusti erant, & religionibus dediti, jure habiti Dii & dicti; Princes, because they were just and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods.

And tho' (speaking humanly) the beginning of empire may be ascribed to reason and necessity; yet it was God himself that first kindled this light in the minds of men, whereby they saw that they could not live and be preserved without a ruler and conductor: God himself by his eternal providence having ordained kings; and the law of nature leaders and rulers over others. For the very bees have their prince, the deer their leaders; and cranes (by order imposed) watch for their own safety. The most High beareth rule over the kingdoms of men; and appointeth over it whomsoever he pleaseth. ^d By me, saith Wisdom, spoken by the Son of God) kings reign; by me princes rule; and it is God (saith Daniel) that setteth up kings, and taketh away kings: and that this power is given from God, Christ himself witnesseth, speaking to Pilate, 'Thou couldest have no power at all against me except it were given thee from above.

It was therefore by a threefold justice that the world hath been governed from the beginning, to wit, by a justice natural: by which the parents and elders of families governed their children, and nephews, and families, in which government the obedience was called natural piety: again, by a justice divine, drawn from the laws and ordinances of God; and the obedience hereunto was called conscience: and lastly, by a justice civil, begotten by both the former; and the obedience to this we call duty. That by these three those of the eldest times were commanded; and that the rule in general was paternal, it is most evident: for Adam being lord over his own children, instructed them in the service of God his Creator; as we read, Cain and Abel brought oblations before God, as they had been taught by their parent, the father of mankind.

SECT. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of government with their opposites: and of the degrees of human society.

WHAT other policy was exercised, or state founded after such time as mankind was greatly multiplied before the flood, it cannot be certainly known, tho' it seems by probable conjecture, that the same was not without kings in that first age: it being possible that many princes of the Egyptians (remembered among their antiquities) were before the general flood; and very likely, that the cruel oppressions in that age proceeded from some tyranny in government, or from some rougher form of rule, than the paternal.

^B Berosus ascribeth the rule of the world in those days to the giants of Libanus, who mastered (saith he) all nations from the sun-rising to the sun-set. But in the second age of the world, and after such time as the rule of eldership failed, three several sorts of government were in several times established among men, according to the divers natures of places and people.

The first, the most ancient, most general, and most approved, was the government of one, ruling by just laws, called Monarchy: to which Tyranny is opposed, being also a sole and absolute rule, exercised according to the will of the commander, without respect or observation of the laws of God or men. For a lawful prince or magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the keeper of right and equity: and of this condition ought every magistrate to be, according to the rule of God's word. ^a Judges and officers shalt thou make thee in thy cities: and these shall judge the people with righteous judgment.

The second government is of divers principal persons established by order, and ruling by laws, called Aristocracy, or Optimum potestas; to which Oligarchy (or the particular faction and usurpation of a few great ones) is opposed: as the Decemviri, or Triumviri, and the like.

The third is a state popular (or government of the people) called Democratia, to which is opposed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent unjust ruling of the confused multitude, seditiously swaying the state, contrary to their own laws and ordinances. These three kinds of government are briefly express'd by Tholosanus: Unius, paucorum, & multorum; Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policy since the second increase of mankind, the same grew in this sort: first of all, every father, or eldest of the family, gave laws to his own issues; and to the people from him and them increased. These, as they were multiply'd into many households (man by nature loving society) joined their cottages together in one common field or village, which the Latins call Vicus, of the Greek οἶκος, which signifieth a house, or of the word [Via] because it hath divers ways and paths leading to it. And as the first house grew into a village, so the village into that which is called Pagus (being a society of divers villages) so called of the Greek πῆχυς, which signifieth a fountain: because many people (having their habitations not far asunder) drank of one spring or stream of water. To this word the English hundreds, or (as some think) shires answereth not unfitly.

But as men and impiety began to gather strength, and as emulation and pride between the races of the one and the other daily increased: so both to defend themselves from outrage, and to preserve such goods as they had gathered, they began to join and set together divers of their villages, environing them first with banks and ditches, and afterwards with walls: which being so compassed were then called Oppida; either ab opponendo se hostibus, because walls were opposed against enemies, or ab opibus, because thither they gathered their riches for safety and defence: as also they were called Urbes, ab orbe; because when they were to build a city, they made a circle with a plough (saith Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortify. And altho' Urbs and Civitas be often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Urbs signified no other than the very walls and buildings, and Civitas was taken for the citizens, inhabiting therein: so called of Civis; and that, ab eo quod multitudo coivit, of coming together. But all inhabitants within these walls are not properly citizens, but only such as are called free-men; who bearing proportionably the charge of the city, may by turns become officers and magistrates thereof: the rest go under the name of subjects, tho' citizens by the same general name of subjects are also known. For every citizen is also a subject, but not every subject a citizen: perhaps also some citizen (as the chief magistrate, if he be to be termed one of the citizens) is no subject; but of this we need not stand to inquire. The word [magistrate] is taken a magistro, from a master, and the word [master] from the adverb magis (as also magisteria, precepts of art) or else from the Greek word [megistos:] and so the Greeks call them megistanes, whom the Latins call magnates or magistratus.

The office and duty of every magistrate Aristotle hath written in few words: ^b A magistrate or prince, saith he, is the keeper of right and equity; but the same is best taught by St. Paul, who expresseth both the cause efficient and final, that is, by whom magistrates and princes are ordained, together with their duties and offices. ^c A magistrate is the minister of God for thy wealth; but if thou do evil, fear: for he beareth not the sword for nought. For he is the minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth evil. He also teacheth in verse 1, 2. That every soul ought to be subject to the higher powers, because they are by God ordained; and that whosoever resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giver and fountain thereof: and shall not only be therefore subject to the judgment and condemnation of man, but of God: For ye must be subject, saith he, not because of wrath only, but also for conscience sake. ver. 5.

The examples are not to be numbred of God's punishments upon those that have resisted authority, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any subject therefore to resist the power of kings, because they may be taxed with injustice or cruelty: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the commandment of obedience is without distinction. The prophets and Christ himself subjected themselves to the power of magistracy. Christ commanded that all due to Cesar should be given unto him: and he pay'd tribute for himself and Peter. ^d Jeremy commanded the Israelites (even those that were captives under heathen kings) to pray for them, and for the peace of Babylon. So ^e Abraham pray'd for Abimelech; and Jacob blessed the king of Egypt. And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saviour, saith Paul, that ye make supplications and prayers for kings, and for all that are in authority: and if for such kings as were idolatrous, much more for Christian kings and magistrates. And so much did St. Chrysostom in his homily to the people, prefer monarchical government, as he rather commended the rule of kings (tho' tyrants) than that they should be wanting: Præstat regem tyrannum habere, quam nullum; better a tyrannous king, than no king: To which also Tacitus subscribeth: Præstat (saith Tacitus in the first of his history) sub malo principe esse, quam nullo; It is better to have a bad prince than none at all. And be they good kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no liberty more safe, than to serve them: Neque enim libertas tutior ulla est, saith Claudian, quam domino servire bono; No liberty, saith he, more safe for us than to be servants to the virtuous. And certainly howsoever it may be disputed, yet is it safer to live under one tyrant, than under 100000 tyrants: under a wise man that is cruel, than under the foolish and barbarous cruelty of the multitude. For as Agésilas answered a citizen of Sparta that desired an alteration of the government, that kind of rule which a man would disclaim in his own house, were very unfit to govern great regions by.

Lastly, as many fathers erected many cottages for their many children: and as (for the reason before remembered) many households joined themselves together, and made villages; many villages made cities: so when these cities and citizens joined together, and established laws by consent, associating themselves under one governor and government, they so joined were called a commonwealth: the same being sometimes governed by kings; sometimes by magistrates; sometimes by the people themselves.

Of the good government of the first kings.

NOW this first age after the flood, and after such time as the people were increased, and the families became strong, and dispersed into several parts of the world, was by ancient historians called golden: ambition and covetousness being as then but green, and newly grown up, the seeds and effects whereof were as yet but potential, and in the blowth and bud. For while the law of nature was the rule of man's life, they then sought for no larger territory than themselves could compass and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, than sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest: they cared for no other delicacy of fare, or curiosity of diet, than to maintain life: nor for any other apparel than to cover them from the cold, the rain and the sun.

And sure if we understand by that age (which was called golden) the ancient simplicity of our forefathers, this name may then truly be cast upon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time than to another (I mean to one limited time, and none else) it may be doubted. For good and golden kings make good and golden ages; and all times have brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancy of empire (when princes play'd their prizes, and did then only woo men to obedience) might be called the golden age: so may the beginning of all princes times be truly called golden: for be it that men affect honour, it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deservings have commonly the least impediments: and if ever liberality overflow her banks and bounds, the same is then best warranted both by policy and example. But age and time do not only harden and shrink the openest and most jovial hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth princes torn estates before their eyes, and withal persuadeth them to compassionate themselves. And altho' there be no kings under the sun whose means are answerable unto other men's desires; yet such as value all things by their own respects, do no sooner find their appetites unanswered, but they complain of alteration, and account the times injurious and iron. And as this falleth out in the reign of every king; so doth it in the life of every man, if his days be many: for our younger years are our golden age; which being eaten up by time, we praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and indeed the grievous alterations in our selves, and the pains and diseases which never part from us but at the grave, make the times seem so differing and displeasing: especially the quality of man's nature being also such, as it adareth and extollet the passages of the former, and condemneth the present state how just soever. "Fit humane malignitatis vitio, ut semper vetera in laude, presentia in fastidio sint; It comes to pass, saith Tacitus, by the vice of our malignity, that we always extol the time past, and hold the present fastidious. For it is one of the errors of way-ward age: Quod sint laudatores temporis acti; That they are praisers of forepassed times, forgetting this advice of Solomon: ^b Say not then, why is it that the former days were better than these? for thou dost not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose Seneca, Majores nostri questi sunt, & nos querimur, posterique rentur, everfos esse mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum, & in omne nefas labi; Our ancestors have complained, we do complain, our children will complain, that good manners are gone, that wickedness doth reign, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all evil. These are the usual discourses of age and misfortune. But hereof what can we add to this of Arnobius: "Nova res quandoque vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus quibus cepit nova fuit & repentina; Whatsoever is new, in time shall be made old: and the ancientest things when they took beginning were also new and sudden. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentments of present times have made golden, this we may set down for certain, that as it was the virtue of the first kings, which, after God, gave them crowns: so the love of their people thereby purchased, held the same crowns on their heads. And as God gave the obedience of subjects to princes: so (relatively) he gave the care and justice of kings to the subjects; having respect, not only to the kings themselves, but even to the meanest of his creatures. ^c Nunquam particulari bono servit omne bonum; The infinite goodness of God doth not attend any one only: for he that made the small and the great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which kings have of all theirs, which makes them beloved of all theirs; and by a general love it is, that princes hold a general obedience: for Potestas humana radicitur in voluntatibus hominum; All human power is rooted in the will or dispositions of men.

Of the beginning of nobility: and of the vain vaunt thereof without virtue.

AND with this supreme rule and kingly authority began also other degrees and differences among subjects. For princes made election of others by the same rule, by which themselves were chosen; unto whom they gave place, trust and power. From which employments and offices sprung those titles, and those degrees of honour, which have continued from age to age to these days. "But this nobility, or difference from the vulgar, was not in the beginning given to the succession of blood, but to succession of virtue, as hereafter may be proved. Tho' at length it was sufficient for those, whose parents were advanced, to be known for the sons of such fathers: and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excel, upon whom glory or worldly nobility necessarily descended: Yet hereof had nobility denomination in the beginning, that such as excelled others in virtue were so called: Hinc dictus nobilis, quasi virtute præ aliis notabilis. But after such time as the deserved honour of the father was given in reward to his posterity, St. Jerome judged of the succession in this manner: Nihil aliud video in nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod nobiles quadam necessitate constringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent; I see no other thing to be affected in nobility, than that noblemen are by a kind of necessity bound not to degenerate from the virtue of their ancestors. For if nobility be virtus & antique divitiæ, virtue and ancient riches, then to exceed in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like, do no otherwise define nobility, than the word animal alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour, according to L. Vives, be a witness of virtue and well-doing: and nobility, after Plutarch, the continuance of virtue in a race or lineage: then are those, of whom virtue is extinguished, but like unto painted and printed papers, which ignorant men worship instead of Christ, our Lady, and other Saints: men, in whom there remain but the dregs and vices of ancient virtue: flowers and herbs, which by change of soil and want of manuring are turned to weeds. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure fountains, if in all the rest of their course they run foul, filthy, and defiled? ^a Ex terra fertilis producitur aliquando cicuta venenosa, & ex terra sterili pretiosum aurum; Out of fruitful ground ariseth sometimes poisoning henbane: and out of barren soil precious gold. For as all things consist of matter and form, so doth Charron (in his chapter of nobility) call the race and lineage but the matter of nobility: the form (which gives life and perfect being) he maketh to be virtue and quality, profitable to the commonweal. For he is truly and entirely noble, who maketh a singular profession of publick virtue, serving his prince and country, and being descended of parents and ancestors that have done the like. And altho' that nobility, which the same author calleth personal (the same which our selves acquire by our virtue and well-deservings) cannot be ballanced with that which is both natural by descent, and also personal; yet if virtue be wanting to the natural, then is the personal and acquired nobility by many degrees to be preferred: for, saith Charron, this honour, to wit, by descent, may light upon such an one, as in his own nature is a true villain. There is also a third nobility which he calleth nobility in parchment, bought with silver or favour: and these be indeed but honours of affection, which kings with the change of their fancies wish they knew well how to wipe off again. But surely if we had as much sense of our degenerating in worthiness, as we have of vanity in deriving our selves of such and such parents, we should rather know such nobility (without virtue) to be shame and dishonour, than nobleness, and glory to vaunt thereof. ^b What calamity is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is born in sin, of a putshare body and barren mind? for (according to the same father) Dele fucum fugacis honoris hujus, & male coronata nitorem glorie, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill crowned glory, that then thou may'st consider thy self nakedly: for thou camest naked out of thy mother's womb. Camest thou thence with thy mitre, or glittering with jewels, or garnished with silks, or adorned with feathers, or stuffed with gold? if thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration as certain morning clouds, which do or will soon pass over, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poor, and wretched, and miserable man, and blushing because he is naked, and weeping because he is born, and repining because he is born to labour, and not to honour.

For as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference between it and dust: which if ^c thou dost not believe (saith St. Chrysostom) look into the sepulchres and monuments of thy ancestors, and they shall easily persuade thee by their own example, that thou art dust and dirt: so that if man seem more noble and beautiful than dust, this proceedeth not from the diversity of his nature, but from the cunning of his Creator.

^d For true nobility standeth in the trade
Of virtuous life; not in the fleshly line:
For blood is brute, but gentry is divine.

And howsoever the custom of the world have made it good, that honours be cast by birth upon unworthy issues: yet Solomon (as wise as any king) reprehendeth the same in his fellow princes. ^e There is an evil (saith he) that I have seen under the sun, as an error that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth. Folly is set in great excellency.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

SECT. I.

That Nimrod was the first after the flood that reigned like sovereign lord: and that his beginning seemeth to have been of just authority.

THE first of all that reigned, as sovereign lord after the flood, was Nimrod, the son of Chus, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to St. Augustine) in one of these two respects: either for his eminency, and because he was the first of name, and that took on him to command others: or else in that he was begotten by Chus, after his other children were also become fathers; and of a later time than some of his grandchildren and nephews. Howsoever, seeing Moses in express words calleth Nimrod the son of Chus, other mens conjectures to the contrary ought to have no respect. This empire of Nimrod, both the fathers, and many later writers, call tyrannical: the same beginning in Babel (which is) confusion. But it seemeth to me, that Melancthon conceived not amiss hereof: the same exposition being also made by the author of that work called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirms that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, a bitter or severe governor, because his form of rule seemed at first far more terrible than paternal authority. And therefore is he in this respect also called a mighty hunter: because he took and destroy'd both beasts and thieves. But St. Augustine understands it otherwise, and converts the word [ante] by [contra] affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mighty hunter against God, Sic ergo intelligendus est gigas ille, venator contra Dominum; So is that giant to be understood, a hunter against the Lord. But howsoever this word [a mighty hunter] be understood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those, which went with him from the east into Shinaar: so this charge was rather given him, than by him usurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himself, or any of the sons of his own body, came with this troop into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the years of his life excepted) in the succeeding story of the Hebrews: nor that Sem was in this disobedient troop, or among the builders of Babel.

The same is also confirmed by divers ancient historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Jochan were the captains and leaders of all those which came from the east. And tho' Sem came not himself so far west as Shinaar (his lot being cast on the east parts) yet from his son's nephew Heber, the name and nation of the Hebrews (according to the general opinion) took beginning, who inhabited the southermost parts of Chaldea about the city of Ur; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charan, and thence into Canaan.

^a Pint. in Ezek. ^b Bernard. 1. 2. de Consider. ad Eugen. Pap. ^c Chrysost. homil. 2. de incomposita Dei natura, con. 5.

^d Phaer. ^e Eccles. 10.

And because those of the race of Sem which came into Chaldea were no partners in the unbelieving work of the tower: therefore (as many of the fathers conjecture) did they retain the first and most ancient language, which the fathers of the first age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his issues. ^a In familia Heber remansit hæc lingua; In the family of Heber this language remained (saith St. Augustine out of Epiphanius;) and this language Abraham used: yea, it was anciently and before the flood the general speech: and therefore first called (saith Cælestinus) lingua humana, the human tongue.

We know that Goropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Aegyptius, Vergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoever we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolve, that none of the godly seed of Sem were the chief leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by just authority, than by violence of usurpation.

That Nimrod, Belus and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

BEnzo, and out of him Naclerus, with others, make many Nimrods. Eusebius confounds him with Belus; and so doth St. Jerome upon Osea: and these words of St. Augustine seem to make him of the same opinion. ^b Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Beli, qui primus illic regnaverat 65 annos; There did Ninus reign after the death of his father Belus, who first governed in Babylon 65 years. But it could not be unknown to St. Augustine, that Nimrod was the establisher of that empire: Moses being plain and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom (saith he) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, in the land of Shinaar: wherefore Nimrod was the first king of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus's time, the world was marvellously replenished. And if St. Augustine had undoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would have given him the name which the scriptures give him, rather than have borrowed any thing out of prophane authors. And for those words of St. Augustine (qui primus illic regnaverat, who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words do not disprove that Nimrod was the founder of the Babylonian empire. For altho' Julius Cesar overthrew the liberty of the Roman commonwealth, making himself perpetual dictator; yet Augustus was the first established emperor, and the first that reigned absolutely by sovereign authority over the Romans, as an emperor. The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of eldership and paternity, laying the foundation of sovereign rule, as Cesar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with a general allowance, exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200 years after the flood, as they account, that Belus reign'd: but such agreement of times prove it not. For so Edward III. and his grandchild Richard II. were kings both in one year; the one died, and the other in the same year was crowned king.

And yet the opinion, that Nimrod and Belus were one, is far more probable than that of Mercator, who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plain, that the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom was Babel, and the towns adjoining: but the first and most famous work of Ninus was the city of Nineveh.

Now whereas D. Siculus affirmeth that Ninus overcame and suppress'd the Babylonians, the same rather proveth the contrary, than that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seat of his empire at Nineveh in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recovered again by strong hand; which was easy: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis's time.

—————Dicitur altam

Coctilibus muris cinxisse Semiramis urbem.

Semiramis with walls of brick the city did inclose.

Further, where it is alledged, that as the scriptures call Nimrod mighty: so Justin hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercator's arguments: it may be answered, that such an addition might have been given to many other kings as well. For if we may believe Justin; then were Vexoris king of Egypt, and Tanaïs of Scythia, mighty kings before Ninus was born. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the undertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference between them. For whereas Mercator conceiveth that it was too early for any that lived about the time of the confusion of languages, to have invaded and mastered those cities so far removed from Babel, namely Erec, Accad and Chalne: which work he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest undertaking; and consequently would have Nimrod to have been long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I do not find that supposition true, that ever Nimrod invaded any of these cities; but that he founded them and built them from the ground, being the first after the flood, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Besides, whereas these cities in many mens opinions are found to stand far away from Babylon, I find no reason to bring me to that belief. The city of Accad which the Septuagint calls Archad, and Epiphanius Arphal; Junius takes to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the region thereabout, the Cosmographers (saith he) call Accabene for Accadene. Others understand Nisibis and Nineveh to be one city: so do Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran; but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, and Charran are distinct places. Tho' I cannot deny Accadene to be a region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of St. Jerome calls Achad: and so do the Hebrews also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the city of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech, St. Augustine Oreg, and Pagninus Erec, this place Junius understands for Arraca in Susiana: but there is also a city in Comagena called Arace: and indeed likelihood of name is no certain proof, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third city (called Chalneb) some take it for Calanisis: of which ^a Am. Marcellinus. St. Jerome takes it for Selencia; Hierosolymitanus for Ctesiphon: others do think it to be the Agrani upon Euphrates, destroy'd and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the moderator and judge of this dispute, who teacheth us directly, that these cities are not seated in so divers and distant regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his kingdom (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalneb, in the land of Shinaar: so as in this valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must find them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) think with Viterbiensis, that these four made but one Babylon, than that they were cities far removed, and in several provinces, did not the prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalne from Babylon. Go you (saith Amos, vi. 2.) to Chalne, and from thence go you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistines. The Geneva translation favouring the former opinion, to set these cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginal note expressing that Shinaar was here named: not that all these cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldea, from Babylon in Egypt; but I find little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's empire, there was no such Babylon, nor any city at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great city of Cairo, which was built long after, not far from the place where stood Memphis the ancient city, but not so ancient as Babylon upon Euphrates. Now that Chalne is situate in the valley of Shinaar, it hath been formerly proved in the chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, that Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successive kings.

SECT. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Nineveh: and that it is probable out of Isaiah xxiii. 13. that Assur built Ur for the Chaldees.

NOW as of Nimrod: so are the opinions of writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great state of Babylon and Assyria: a controversy wearisomely disputed without any direct proof, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the scriptures are silent, the voice of reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Junius is most agreeable; who besides all necessary consequence doth not disjoin the sense of the scriptures therein, nor confuse the understanding thereof. For in this sort he converteth the Hebrew text. Erat enim principium regni ejus Babel, & Erec, & Accad, & Chalneb, in terra Shinaaris; e terra hac processit in Assyriam ubi edificavit Niniven: (which is) For the beginning of his kingdom was Babel, and Erec, and Accad, and Chalneb, in the land of Shinaar: and he went forth of this land into Assyria, and built Nineveh. So as Junius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the region of Assyria: the land being so called in Moses's time, and before it. For certainly the other construction, (where the word [Assur] is taken for Assur the son of Sem) doth not answer the order which Moses observeth thro' all the books of Genesis, but is quite contrary unto it. For in the beginning of the 10th chapter he setteth down the sons of Noah in these words. Now these are the generations of the sons of Noah: Shem, Ham, and Japhet, unto whom sons were born after the flood: then it followeth immediately. The sons of Japhet were Gomer, &c. so as Japhet is last named among Noah's sons, be he eldest or youngest: because he was first to be spoken of: with whom (having last named him) he proceeds and sets down his issue, and then the issue of his sons: first, the issue of Gomer, Japhet's eldest son; and then speaks of Javan and his sons: for of the rest of that family he is silent. Anon, after he numbrells the sons of Ham, of which Cush was the eldest: and the sons of Cush and Mizraim; and afterwards of Canaan; leaving Shem for the last, because he would not disjoin the story of the Hebrews. But after he beginneth with Shem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, unto Abraham; and so to Jacob, and the fathers of that nation. But to have brought in one of the sons of Shem in the middle of the generations of Ham, had been against order; neither would Moses have pass'd over so slightly the erection of the Assyrian empire, in one of the sons of Shem, if he had had any such meaning; it being the story of Shem's sons which he most attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the sons of Cush, because he founded the Babylonian and Assyrian empire: and in the 11th chapter he returns to speak of the building of Babel in particular, having formerly named it in the 10th chapter, with those other cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as he did in the 10th chapter, so also in the 11th he maketh no report of Shem, till such time as he had finish'd so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the issue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Israel. And of Junius's opinion touching Assur, was Calvin: to which I conceive that P. Comestor in Historia Scholastica gave an entrance, who after he had deliver'd this place in some other sense, he useth these words. Vel intelligendum non est de Assur filio Sem, &c. sed Assur, id est, regnum Assyriorum inde egressum est, quod tempore Sarug proavi Abrahami factum est (which is) Or else it is not to be understood of Assur the son of Shem, &c. but Assur (that is the kingdom of the Assyrians) came from thence (viz. from Babylon) or was made out of it; which happened in the time of Sarug the great grandfather of Abraham. After which he reconcilerh the differences in this sort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first erecter of the Assyrian empire, or the first founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium, respecting the beginning; but others conceive, that it had beginning from Ninus, which is also true, Quantum ad regni ampliationem, regarding the enlargement of the empire. To this I may add the opinion of Epiphanius confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Assur to be the son of Nimrod: and so doth Metbodius, and Viterbiensis, St. Jerome and Cyrillus, and now lastly, ^b Torniellus; who saith, he took upon him that name of Assur after he had beaten the Assyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus after his conquest in Africa: and that Assur was a common name to the kings of Assyria, as it appeareth by many scriptures, as Pſalm lxxx. Iſaiab x. Hoſea v, &c. but to help the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the ſon of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was archbiſhop of Mentz in the year of Chriſt 854, an ancient and learned writer, underſtands this place with Comeſtor, or Comeſtor with him, agreeing in ſubſtance with that tranſlation of Junius : to which words of Moses he giveth this ſenſe, De hac terra Affyriorum pulſavit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, Beli filii, Nilum condiderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this land grew the empire of the Affyrians, who built Ninus the great city, ſo named of Ninus the ſon of Belus. On the contrary, Calvin objecteth this place of Iſaiab xxiii. 13. Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this was no people, Affur founded it by the inhabitants of the wilderneſs; than which there is no one place in the ſcriptures that hath a greater diverſity in the tranſlation and underſtanding; inſomuch as Michael de Palatio upon Iſaiab (tho' in all elſe very diligent) paſſeth it over. But Calvin ſeemeth hereby to infer, that becauſe Affur founded the ſtate of the Chaldeans, therefore alſo Affur rather than Nimrod eſtabliſhed the Affyrian empire, and built Nineveh: contrary to the former tranſlation of Junius, and to his own opinion. Now out of the Vulgar (called Jerome's tranſlation) it may be gathered, that Affur both founded and ruin'd this ſtate or city of the Chaldeans, by Iſaiab remembred: unto which city, people, or ſtate, he plainly telleth the Tyrians, that they cannot truſt or hope for relief thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the prophet maketh this city of Chaldea, and that ſtate, an example unto thoſe Phenicians, whom in this place he foretelleth of their ruin: which city of Chaldea being of ſtrength, and carefully defended, was notwithstanding by the Affyrians utterly waſted and deſtroyed: whereby he giveth them knowledge, and foretelleth them that their own city of Tyre (invincible, as themſelves thought) ſhould alſo ſoon after be overturned by the ſame Affyrians: as indeed it was by Nabuchodonosor. And theſe be the words of Jerome; Ecce terra Chaldeorum, talis populus non fuit, Affur fundavit eam, in captivitatem traduxerunt robuſtos ejus, ſuffoderunt domos ejus, poſuit eam in ruinam; which is, Behold the land of the Chaldeans, ſuch a people there were not (or this was no people, after the Geneva) Affur, or the Affyrians founded it, they carried away their ſtrong men captive, they undermined their houſes, and ruined their city. The Septuagint expreſs it but in a part of another verſe, in theſe words; Et in terra Chaldeorum, & hæc deſolata eſt ab Affyriis, quoniam murus ejus corruit, making the ſenſe perfect by the preceding verſe, which altogether may be thus underſtood. If thou go over to Chittim (which is Macedon or Greece) yet thou ſhalt have no reſt, (ſpeaking to the Tyrians) neither in the land of the Chaldeans, for this is made deſolate by the Affyrians, becauſe their walls fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Vatablus convert it thus, Ecce terra Chafdim, iſte populus non erat illic olim; nam Affur fundavit eam navibus, erexerunt arces illius, contriverunt ædes ejus, poſuerunt eam in ruinam: which may be thus engliſhed. Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this people was not once therein inhabiting: for Affur built it a harbour for ſhips, they erected the towers thereof, and again brake down the houſes thereof, and ruined it. Junius in the place of ſhips ſets the word [pro Barbaris] that is, for the Barbarians: and the Geneva, by the Barbarians. But this is undoubted, that the prophet Iſaiab (as may be gathered by all the ſenſe of the chapter) did therein aſſure the Tyrians of their future deſtruction, which accordingly fell on them: wherein (for the more terror) he maketh choice to note the calamities of thoſe places, cities and regions, whoſe trade the ſtate and greatneſs of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tbarſis; from the Macedonians, and other Grecians under the name of Cittim; alſo by the Egyptians, the Chaldeans and the reſt. For Tyre was then the mart-town of the world moſt renowned. And (as it appears in our diſcourſe of Paradiſe) not the leaſt part of her chief merchandiſe came in by the city Ur, or Urchoa in Chaldea, where the body or chief ſtream of Euphrates (even that ſtream which runneth thro' Babylon and Otris, which now falleth into Tigris) had his paſſage into the Persian gulf; though now it be ſtopped up. For (as we have heretofore noted) the Arabians, that deſcended from Sheba and Raamah, dwelling on the eaſt banks of the Persian gulf, trading with the Tyrians (as thoſe of Eden, Charran and Chalne did) tranſported their merchandiſe by the mouth of Tigris, that is, from Teredon, and of Euphrates, that is, from Ur or Urchoa; and then by Babylon, and thence by river and over land they conveyed it into Syria, and ſo to Tyre, as they do this day to Aleppo. So then Ur of the Chaldees was a port-town, and one of thoſe cities which had intelligence, trade and exchange with the Tyrians: for it flood by the great lakes of Chaldea, thro' which that part of Euphrates ran, which paſſage is now ſtopt up. Ejus curſum vetuſtas abolevit (ſaith Niger.) And Pliny, Locus ubi Euphratis oſtium fuit, flumen ſaluſum; Time hath worn away the channel of Euphrates: and the place where the mouth thereof was, is a bay of ſalt water. Theſe things being thus, certainly (not without good probability) we may expound the city of the Chaldees, whoſe calamities Iſaiab here noteth for terror of the Tyrians to be the city anciently called Ur; and by Hecateus, Camerina; by Ptolemy, Urchoa; and by the Greeks, Chaldæopolis, The city of Chaldea; which the ſons of Shem, until Abraham's time, inhabited. And whereas in all the tranſlations it is ſaid, that Affur both founded it and ruin'd it: it may be underſtood, that Affur the founder was the ſon of Shem; and Affur the deſtroyers were the Affyrians, by whom thoſe that inhabited Ur of Chaldea, were at length oppreſſed and brought to ruin: which thing God foreſeeing, commanded Abraham thence to Charran, and ſo into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Pagninus converted [by ſhips] do bear that ſenſe, the ſame may be the better approved; becauſe it was a port-town: and the river ſo far up as this city of Ur, was in ancient time navigable, as both by Pliny and Niger appeareth. And if the word [for the Barbarians] or [by the Barbarians] be alſo in the Hebrew text, it is no leſs manifeſt, that the moſt barbarous Arabians of the deſart were and are the confronting, and next people of all other unto it. For Chaldea is now called Arachdar, which ſignifieth deſart lands, becauſe it joineth to that part of Arabia ſo called: and Cicero (calling thoſe Arabians by the name of Itureans) addeth that they are of all other people the moſt ſavage; calling them, Homines omnium maxime barbaros.

So as this place of Iſaiab, which breedeth ſome doubt in Calvin, proveth in nothing the contrary opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former tranſlation of Junius, nor the interpretation of Comeſtor and Rabanus. For tho' other men have not conceived (for any thing that I have read) that Affur is in this place diverſly taken; (as for the ſon of Shem, when he is ſpoken of as a builder of Ur; and when, as a deſtroyer thereof, then for the Affyrian fyrian nation) yet certainly the evidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seem to inforce it. And so this founding of the city of the Chaldees by Affur (into which the most of the posterity of Sem that came into Shinaar, and were separate for the idolatry of the Chusites and Nimrodians, retired themselves) hath nothing in it to prove that the same Affur built Nineveh, or that the same Affur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Affur, who was the son of Shem, both an idolater and the son of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the first notorious sacrificer to idols, and the first that set up a statue or image to be honoured as God. Now if Affur must be of that race, and not of the family of Sem, as he must be if he founded Nineveh, then all those which seek to give him the honour thereof, do him by a thousand parts more injury, by taking from him his true parent and religion.

Besides, if this supposed Affur whom they make the founder of Nineveh (and so the son of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainly he was very unworthy and obscure, and not like to be the founder of such an empire and such a city, if no man have vouchsafed to leave to posterity his expulsion thence, and how he lost that empire again, or quitted it to Ninus; whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) far differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to scripture and to reason, and best agreeing with the story of that age written by prophane authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first works and beginnings of his empire, according to Moses, and that these works being finish'd within the valley of Shinaar, he look'd farther abroad, and set in hand the work of Ninus, lying near unto the same stream that Babel and Chalne did: which work his grandchild Ninus afterwards amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus's wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to pass, that as Semiramis was counted the foundress of the city which she only finish'd: so also Ninus of Nineveh. Quam quidem Babylonem potuit instaurare; She might repair or renew Babylon, saith St. Augustine. For so did Nabuchodonosor vaunt himself to be the founder of Babylon also, because he built up again some part of the wall overborn by the fury of the river: which work of his stood till Alexander's time; whereupon he vaunted thus: Is not this great Babel which I have built?

SECT. IV.

Of the acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known.

BUT to return to the story, it is plain in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfugium, and Julius Africanus surnamed Saturn) was the establiher of the Babylonian monarchy, of whom there is no other thing written, than that his empire in the beginning consisted of those four cities before remembred, Babel, Erech, Accad and Chalne: and that from hence he propagated his empire into Affyria; and in Affyria built four more cities, to wit, Nineveh, Reboboht, Celub, and Resen. And seeing that he spent much time in building Babel it self and those adjoining, and that his travels were many ere he came into Shinaar, that work of Babel (such as it was) with the other three cities, and the large foundation of Ni- neveh, and the other cities of Affyria which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficulty than any thing performed by his successors in many years after: to whose undertakings time had given so great an increase of people; and the examples and patterns of his beginning so great an advancement and encouragement: in whose time (saith Glycas) all these nations were called Meropes, A sermonis linguarum terræque divisione; By reason that the earth and the speech were then divided.

Belus or Bel, or Jupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114 years; of whose acts and undertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in disburdening the low lands of Babylon, and drying and making firm ground of all those great fens and overflown marshes which adjoin'd unto it. For any of his wars or conquests there is no report, other than of his begun enterprize against Sabatius king of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia which Berosus calls Scythia Saga, whose son and successor Barzanes became subject and tributary to Ninus, that followed the war to effect, which was by his father Belus begun.

SECT. V.

That we are not to marvel how so many kingdoms could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia.

THAT so many kingdoms were erected in all those eastern parts of the world so soon after Nimrod (as by the story of Ninus is made manifest) the causes were threefold; namely, opportunity, example and necessity. For opportunity, being a princess liberal and powerful, bestoweth on her first entertainers many times more benefits, than either fortune can, or wisdom ought; by whose presence alone the understanding minds of men receive all those helps and supplies, which they either want or wish for: so as every leader of a troop (after the division of tongues and dispersion of people) finding these fair offers made unto them, held the power which they possess'd, and governed by discretion all those people, whom they conducted to their destin'd places. For it cannot be conceived, that when the earth was first divided, mankind straggled abroad like beasts in a desert; but that by agreement they disposed themselves, and undertook to inhabit all the known parts of the world, and by distinct families and nations: otherwise those remote regions from Babylon and Shinaar, which had kings, and were peopled in Ninus's time, would not have been possess'd in many hundreds of years after, as then they were; neither did those that were sent, and travelled far off (order being the true parent of prosperous success) undertake so difficult enterprizes without a conductor or commander. Secondly, The example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every humour that aspired. Thirdly, Necessity resolved all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a commander and magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enjoy the harvest of their own travels: nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible violence: nor those which sought after any proportion of greatness, either possess the same in quiet, or rule and order their own ministers and attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the undertakings and conquests of Ninus (the son of Belus) made it apparent : for he found every where kings and monarchs, what way soever his ambition led him in the wars.

But Nimrod (his grandfather) had no companion king, to us known, when he first took on him sovereignty and sole commandment of all those the children of Noah, which came from the east into Babylonia : tho' in his life-time others also raised themselves to the same estate ; of which hereafter. Belus, his son and successor, found Sabatius king of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerful to resist his attempts : which Sabatius I take to be the same which Justin calls Tanais ; and should conjecture, that Mizraim had been his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error (as ^a*Justin* placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seems to me rightly accounted by the judicious and learned Reineccius all one with the great Sesostris, that lived certain ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second king of Babylon, reigned 65 years, according to the common account.

SECT. VI.

(Of the name of Belus, and other names affine unto it.

WHENCE this second king and successor of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus, question hath been made ; for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) given by Ninus, than assumed by Belus himself.

Cyrellus against Julian calls the father of Ninus, Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himself to be called a god : which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence deriv'd. But Bel, as many learned writers have observed, signifieth the sun in the Chaldean tongue ; and therefore did Ninus and Semiramis give that name to their father, that he might be honoured as the sun, which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this title was assumed in after-times by divers others of the Chaldean princes, and Babylonians Satrapæ : so was it used (in imitation) by the chief of the Carthaginians and other nations, as some historians have conceived.

To this Bel, or Belus, pertain (as in affinity) those voices of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Beelphegor, Belsebub, and Beelsephon. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldean, convert the word Baal by the Latin, Princeps militiæ, Chief in the war, tho' Daniel was so called (saith Suidas) ob honorem explicationis arcanarum rerum ; In honour of his expounding secrets. ^b*St. Jerome* makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to have the same signification : and saith, that the idol of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memory of his father set up to be worshipped : to which that he might add the more honour and reverence, he made it a sanctuary and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith ^c*Lyranus*) came idolatry, and the first use of images into the world. ^d*Isidore* doth interpret Bel by Vetus, old or ancient ; adding, that as among the Assyrians it is taken for Saturn and the Sun : so in the Punic or Carthaginian language it signifieth God. Glycas makes it an Assyrian name properly ; and Josephus, a Tyrian. He also affirmeth, that the idol which the Moabites worshipped (by them erected on the mountain Phogor, or Peor, and called Baal) is the same which the Latins call Priapus, the God of gardens ; which also was the opinion of ^e*St. Jerome*. But that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the idol of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel, foundeth [God] and Sebub [flies or hornets :] by which name notwithstanding the Jews express the prince of devils. But the prophet Hosea teacheth us the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himself ; And at that day (saith the Lord) thou shalt call me Isbi, and shalt call me no more Baalim : for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. For altho' the name of Baal, or Babal, be justly to be used towards God ; yet in respect that the same was given to idols, God both hated it and forbade it. And the using of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the sun, was not because it properly signifieth the sun, but because the sun there was worshipped as a god : as also the fire was, Tanquam Solis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembred) as Belphegor, and Belsephon ; Belsephon is expounded out of Facius, Dominus speculæ vel custodiæ ; The lord of the watch tower, or of the guard : the other word noteth the idol, and the place wherein it was worshipped. It is also written Belpeor or Baalpeor : and Peor, they say, is as much as denudavit ; and therefore the word joined expresseth a naked image. Some there are that call this Belus, the son of Saturn ; for it was used among the ancients to name the father Saturn, the son Jupiter, and the grandchild Hercules. Saturni dicuntur familiarum nobilium, regum qui urbes condiderunt senissimi ; primogeniti eorum Joves & Junones ; Hercules vero nepotes eorum fortissimi ; The ancientest of noble families, and kings which founded cities, are called Saturns ; their first-born Jupiters and Juno's ; their valiant nephews Hercules. But this Belus (saith L. Vives) was famous by reason of his warlike son Ninus, who caused his father to be worshipped as a God by the name of ^f*Jupiter Babylonius*, whom the Egyptians (transported by the dreams of their antiquity) make one of theirs. For Neptune, say they, upon Libya the daughter of Epaphus, begat this Jupiter Belus, who was father to Egyptus. They add, that this Belus carrying a colony to the river of Euphrates there built a city, in which he ordained priests after the Egyptian manner. But were there any Belus the son of Epaphus and Isis, or of Neptune and Libya, or with Eusebius of Telegonus, who after the death of Apis married Isis, Cecrops then reigning in Athens, the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom we speak, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Egyptians so much vaunted.

SECT. VII.

Of the worshipping of images begun from Belus in Babel.

AS for the Babylonian Belus, he was the most ancient Belus, and the inventor of Astronomy, if Pliny say true : from whence the Egyptians might borrow both the name and the doctrine. Some part of the temple, in which his statue or image was honoured as a god, the same author affirmeth that it remained in his time.

Of the sepulchre of Belus, ^h*Strabo* writeth thus. Over the river, saith he, there are gardens, where they say the ruins of Belus's tomb, which Xerxes broke up, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramid made of brick, a furlong high, and on every side it had a furlong in breadth. It appears by ⁱ*Cyrel* against Julian, that he obtained divine worship yet living : for so he writes of him (calling him Arbelus : Arbelus, vir superbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur à subditis deitatis nomen accepisse: perseverarunt igitur Assyrii, & finitimæ illis gentes sacrificantes ei. Arbelus, A man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was ever honoured by their subjects with the title of deity (or with the name of God) the Assyrians therefore and the bordering nations have persevered, sacrificing to him. Even Arius also, whom Suidas calls Thuras, who succeeded next after Ninyas, was made an idol-god among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninyas) Thuras reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the planet Mars; a man of shape and fierce disposition, who bidding battle to Caucasus of the stock of Japhet, slew him. The Assyrians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus far Suidas. Neither is it unlikely but that many among idolatrous nations were deified in their life-times, or soon after: tho' I deny not but that the most of their images and Statue were first erected without divine worship, only in memory of the glorious acts of benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiveth; and so afterwards the devil crept into those wooden and brazen carcases, when posterity had lost the memory of their first invention. Hereof Isidore speaketh in this manner. Quos autem Pagani Deos asserunt homines fuerunt, & pro uniuscujusque vitæ meritis vel magnificentia, colit apud suos post mortem coeperunt: sed (demonibus persuadentibus) quos illi pro sua memoria honoraverunt, minores Deos existimârunt: ad ista vero magis excolenda acceperunt poetarum figmenta; They were men, saith he, whom the Pagans affirmed to be Gods: and every one for his merits or magnificence began after his death to be honoured of his own. But at length (the devils persuading) they accounted them lesser gods, whose memories they honoured: and the fictions of the poets made the opinions (concerning the honours of the dead) much more superstitious.

And that the worshipping of images was brought in by the Pagans, and heathen nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth; but Gregory: “ Gentilitas (saith he) inventrix & caput est imaginum; Gentilism is the inventress and ground of images: and Ambrose; “ Gentes lignum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei; The Gentiles adore wood as it were the image of God. “ Eusebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of images a custom borrowed of the heathen. The like hath “ St. Augustine against Adimantus. Et verentur (saith “ Lactantius) ne religio vana sit, si nihil vident quod adorent; They fear their religion would be vain, should they not see that which they worship.

And (out of doubt) the schoolmen shift this fearful custom very strangely. For seeing the very workmanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christian satisfy it self with the distinction of Doulia and Hyperdoulia, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those images after they are made? and it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should strain their wits to defend the use of those things, which the scriptures have not only no where warranted, but expressly in many places forbidden, and cursed the practisers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the devil was so strongly and subtilly rooted, as neither the express commandment of God himself, Thou shalt not make any graven image, nor all the threatnings of Moses and the prophets after him could remove, weed it, or by fear, or by any persuasions, lead the hearts of men from it. For where shall we find words of greater weight, or of plainer instruction than these? Take therefore good heed to your selves (for ye saw no image in the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire) that ye corrupt not your selves, and make you a graven image, or representation of any figure, whether it be the likeness of male or female.

And besides the express commandment, Thou shalt make thee no graven image, and the prohibition in many scriptures, so it is written in the book of Wisdom, That the invention of idols was the beginning of whoredom: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for ever.

And whereas the schoolmen affirm, that the prophets spake against the worshipping of the heathen idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of images of the living God, and not of Baal and the rest of that nature, For you saw no image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Basil, Noli aliquam in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscribas eum mente tua; Do not imagine any form to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy mind too. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption unlawful to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts and minds, how far do those men presume that put him under the greasy pencil of a painter, or the rusty ax, or other instrument of a carpenter or carver.

For as this dishonour to the infinite and incomprehensible God began in Babel: so did the devil transport and spread this invention into all the regions adjoining, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romans for a while resisted the erection of these idols and images, refusing to set them in their temples for 170 years, observing therein the law of Numa: who thought it impiety to resemble things most beautiful, by things most base. But Tarquinius Priscus afterwards prevailing, and following the vanity of the Grecians (a nation of all others under the sun most deluded by Satan) set up the images of their Gods; which (as “ St. Augustine witnesseth) that learned Varro both bewailed, and utterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth. Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis supplicant, genu posito illa adorant, & cum hæc suspiciant, fabros qui illa fecere contemnunt; The images of the Gods are worshipped, those they pray unto with bended knees, those they adore; and while they so greatly admire them, they contemn the handicraftsmen that made them: which also Sedulius the Poet in this sort scoffed at.

Iheu miseri qui vana colunt, qui corde sinistro Religiosa sibi sculpunt simulachra, suumque factorem fugiunt, & quæ fecere verentur. Quis furor est? quæ tanta animos dementia ludit? Ut volucrem, turpemque bovem, torvumque draconem, Semi-hominemque canem supplex homo pronus adoret.

Ah wretched they that worship vanities,
And consecrate dumb idols in their heart,
Whom their own Maker (God on high) despise,
And fear the work of their own hands and art.
What fury? what great madness doth beguile
Mens minds? that man should ugly shapes adore,
Of birds, or bulls, or dragons, or the vile
Half-dog half-man on knees for aid implore.

And tho' this device was barbarous, and first, and many years practised by heathen nations only,

till

till the Jews were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorn the ignorant stupidity of his nation: but Justin Martyr remembreth how the Sibyls inveighed against images: and Hospinian, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the souls of men to erect and adore those Babels. Strabo and Herodotus witness, that the Persians did not erect or set up any statue of their gods. Lycurgus never taught it the Lacedemonians, but thought it impiety to represent immortal natures by mortal figures. Eusebius also witnesseth in his sixth book de præparatione evangelica, that it was forbidden by a law in Serica, or among the Brachmans in India, that images should be worshipped. The same do Tacitus and Crinitus report of the ancient Germans. Many other authors might be remembered that witness the disdain which the heathens themselves had of this childish idolatry: of which Hospinian hath written at large in his tract de origine imaginum. And it was truly said, Omnia mala exempla bonis initiis orta sunt; All ill examples have sprung from good beginnings. The heathen at first made these statuæ and images, but in memory of such remarkable men, as had deserved best of their countries and commonwealths: Effigies hominum (saith Pliny) non solebant exprimi nisi aliqua illustri causa perpetuitatem merentium; Men were not wont to make pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to be perpetually remembered. And tho' of the more ancient Papists, some have borrowed of the Gentiles (as appeareth in Lactantius) that defence for images: That Simulachra are pro clementis literarum, ut per ea discerent homines Deum invisibilem cognoscere; Images (say they, and so before them the heathen said) are instead of letters, whereby men might learn to know the invisible God: in which understanding (perhaps) they no otherwise esteemed them than pictures indeed; yet as that of Baal or Bel, set up in memory of Belus the Babylonian,¹ became afterwards the most revered idol of the world, by which so many nations (and they which were appropriate to God himself) were misled and cast away: so those very stocks and stones, and painted canvases (called the pictures of Christ, or Lady, and others) were by thousands of ignorant people, not only adored, but esteemed to have life, motion, and understanding. On these stocks we call (saith the book of Wisdom) when we pass through the raging waves, on these stocks more rotten than the ship that carrieth us.

This heathen invention of images became so fruitful in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods, that they were forced to distinguish them into degrees and orders; as Dii consentes, seu majorum gentium; selecti, patritii, insigniores, dii medii: counselling gods, or gods of the mightiest nobility; select gods, patritian, gods of mark, and common gods (which the Romans called Medioximi) dii infimi, and terrestrial hero's, and multitudes of other gods: of which St. Augustine hath made large mention in his book de Civitate Dei, lib. 14. But (saith Lactantius) among all those miserable souls and rotten bodies, worshipped by men more like to their idols, did Epimenides Cretenfis (by what good angel moved I know not) erect in the Athenian fields, altars to the unknown God, which stood with the same title and dedication even to the times of St. Paul: who made them first known to whom those altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might discern the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth every man, and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the devil had so many years led and misled them. And it sufficed not that the multitude of these gods was so great in general, or that every nation had some one which took particular and singular care of them; as Jupiter in Crete, Isis in Egypt, in Athens Minerva, in Samos Juno, in Paphos Venus, and so of all other parts; but every city, and almost every family, had a god apart. For it is written in the 2d of Kings xvii. 18, 31. the men of Babel, made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Asbima, and the Avims made Nibhaz and Tarrack, and the Sephernaims burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech. All which how plainly hath the prophet Isa. c. xliv. derided? Men cut down trees, rinde them, burn a part of them, make ready their meat, and warm themselves by the fire thereof, and of the residue he maketh a god, an idol, and prayeth unto it: but God hath shut their eyes from sight, and their hearts from understanding. It is therefore safest for a Christian to believe the commandments of God so direct against idolatry, to believe the prophets, and to believe St. Paul, who speaketh thus plainly and feelingly. My beloved fly from idolatry, I speak as unto them which have understanding, judge ye what I say.

SECT. VIII.

Of the wars of Ninus: and lastly of his war against Zoroaster.

UNT O this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commanded the exercise of idolatry, the first that injuriously invaded his neighbour-princes; and the first that without shame or fear committed adultery in publick. But as of Belus there is no certain memory (as touching particulars:) so of this Ninus (whose story is gathered out of prophane authors) I find nothing so warrantable, but that the same may be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For altho' that piece of Berosus set out and commented upon by Annius hath many good things in it, and giveth great light (as Chrytaeus noteth) to the understanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halicarnassæus, and others: yet Lodovicus Vives, B. Rhenanus, and others after them, have laid open the imperfection and defects of the fragment; proving directly that it cannot be the same Berosus which lived in Alexander's time, cited by ^a Athenæus and Josephus: and whose statue the Athenians erected, saith Pliny. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many have gathered the succession of the Babylonian and Assyrian princes, even from Nimrod to the 18th king Ascatades, and to the times of Joshua. For of Metasthenes an historian, of the race of the Persian priests, there are found but certain papers, or some few lines of the Chaldean and Assyrian monarchies: but he afterwards in the collection of the Persian kings is not without his errors.

Ctesias of Cnidus (a city adjoining to Halicarnassus) who lived together with Cyrus the younger, and with Artaxerxes Mnemon, gathered his history out of the Persian records, and reacheth as far upwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and tho' in the story of Cyrus the younger, Xenophon approveth him in some things, and Athenæus, Pausanias and Tertullian cite him; yet so base and apparent are his flatteries of the times and princes with whom he lived, and so incredible are the numbers which he finds in the armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as whatsoever his reports were, times have consumed his works, saving some very few excerptions lately published.

And therefore in things uncertain, seeing a long discourse cannot be pleasing to men of judgment, I will pass over the acts of this 3d Assyrian, in as few words as I can express them. St. Augustine affirms that Ninus mastered all Asia, India excepted. Others say that he won it all, save India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Aricus of Arabia the companion of his conquests, with whom he entered into a straight league of amity, because he commanded many people, and was his kinsman, and a Chusite, and the nearest prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprise was upon Syria, which he might easily subdue, both because he invaded it on the sudden, and because it lay next him: and also because the Arabians and their king Aricus (which bordered Syria) assisted him in the conquest thereof.

The king of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aid him in his war against Zoroaster: for from Armenia he bent himself that way towards the east; but that ever he commanded the lesser Asia, I do not believe, for none of his successors had any possession therein.

His third war was against Pharnus, king of the Medes, whom it is said that he overthrew, and cruelly murdered with his seven children, tho' others affirm that they all died in one battel against him. Whether he invaded Zoroaster before the building or amplifying of Nineveh, or after, it is uncertain. It is said that he made two expeditions into Bactria: and that finding little or ill success in the first, he returned, and set the work of Nineveh forward: and then a second time entred Bactria with 1700000 foot, and 200000 horse, and 10600 chariots: being encountred by Zoroaster with 400000. But ^a Ninus prevailing, and Zoroaster being slain, he entred farther into the country, and besieged the chief city thereof, called Bactra or Bactrion (saith ^b Stephanus;) which by a passage found, and an assault given by Semiramis (the wife of Menon) he entred and possessed. Upon this occasion Ninus both admiring her judgment and valour, together with her person and external beauty, fancy'd her so strongly, as (neglecting all princely respects) he took her from her husband, whose eyes he threatned to thrust out if he refused to consent. He therefore yielding to the passion of love in Ninus, and to the passion of sorrow in himself, by the strong persuasions of shame and dishonour, cast himself headlong into the water and died.

C H A P. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to have been the chief author of magick arts: and of the divers kinds of magick.

S E C T. I.

That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first inventor of astrology, or of magick: and that there were divers great magicians of this name.

Zoroaster king of the Bactrians, Vincentius supposeth to be Cham, the son of Noah: a fancy of little probability. For Cham was the paternal ancestor of Ninus, the father of Chus, the grand-father of Nimrod, whose son was Belus, the father of Ninus. It may be that Vincentius had heard of that book which was called Scripturæ

Cham, devised by some wicked knave, and so intitled: of which Sixtus Senensis hath made the due mention.

It is reported by ^c Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gave the invention of magick to Cham, the son of Noah: so did Comestor in his scholastical history: with art (saith he) with the seven liberal sciences he writ in fourteen pillars: seven of which were made of brass, to resist the defacing by the waters of the flood; and seven of brick against the injury of fire. There was also another devised discourse, which went under the title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like unto this of Comestor. These be Cassianus's words: Cham (filius Noah) qui superstitionibus istis & sacrilegis fuit artibus infectus, sciens nullum se posse super hiis memorialem librum in arcam prorsus inferre, in qua erat cum patre justo, &c. Cham (the son of Noah) who was infected with these superstitions, and sacrilegious arts, knowing that he could not bring any book or memorial of that nature into the ark, wherein he was to remain with his godly father, caused the precepts and rules thereof to be graven in metal and hard stone.

St. Augustine noteth, that Zoroaster was said to have laugh'd at his birth, when all other children weep; which presaged the great knowledge which afterwards he attained unto: being taken for the inventor of natural magick and other arts; for the corrupter, saith Pliny and Justin. But I do not think that Zoroaster invented the doctrine of the horoscopes or nativities: or first found out the nature of herbs, stones, and minerals, or their sympathetic or antipathetical workings; of which I know not what king of Chaldea is also made the inventor. I rather think that these knowledges were far more ancient, and left by Noah to his sons. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster (as Josephus reporteth) was no less learned herein than any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then living: differing from the wisdom of after-times in this, that he knew and acknowledged the true cause, and giver of life and virtue to nature and all natural things; whereas others (forgetting God's infinite, dispersed, and universal power) admired the instruments and attributed proper strength to the things themselves (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisdom, ^d Which being one, and remaining in it self, can do all things and reneweth all.

Now whether this Zoroaster (overthrown by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the magician, Ctesias calls Oxyartes, whom Pliny finds of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a spirit (being in the midst of his disciples) as some authors report, then Zoroaster, slain by Ninus, was not the magician: which is also the opinion of ^e Scaliger.

Again, ^f Josephus and Cedrenus affirm that Seth first found out the planets, or wandering stars, and other motions of the heavens: for if this art had been invented by Zoroaster, he could not have attained to any such excellency therein, in his own life-time; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular judgment, he might add somewhat to this kind of knowledge, and leave it by writing to posterity.

But of this Zoroaster there is much dispute: and no less jangling about the word and art of magick. Arnobius remembreth four to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zoroastres, was given: which by Hermodorus and Dion seemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of art, and was as much to say, as astro-rum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactri- an, which may be the same that Ninus overthrew: the second, a Chaldean, and the astronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaster Pamphilius, who lived in the time of Cyrus, and his familiar: the fourth Zoroaster Armenius, the nephew of Hofstanes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: between whom and Cyrus there pass'd 78 years. Suidas remembreth a fifth, called Perfomedus sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the son of Oromasdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what nation the first and chief Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Pliny and Laertius make him a Persian. Gemisthius or Pletho, Ficinus and Steu-chius make him a Chaldean. But by those books of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the author of them was a Chaldean by nation, tho' the word (Chaldean) was as often given to the learned priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishment of nations. Porphyry makes the Chaldæi and Magi divers; Picus the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldean both by nation and profession, it appeareth by his books, which (saith Picus) were written in the Chaldean tongue; and the comment in the same language. Now that the Magi and they were not differing, it may be judged by the name of those books of Zoroaster, which in an epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he saith, to be intitled, Patris Ezre Zoroastris & Melchior magorum oracula.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently far diverse from conjuring and witchcraft.

NOW for magick it self; which art (saith ^a*Mirandula*) pauci intelligunt, multi reprehendunt; Few understand, and many reprehend: Et sicut canes ignotos semper allatrant; As dogs bark at those they know not: so they condemn and hate the things they understand not: I think it not amiss (leaving Ninus for a while) to speak somewhat thereof.

It is true that many men abhor the very name and word [Magus] because of Simon Magus, who being indeed, not Magus, but Goes, that is, familiar with evil spirits, usurped that title. For magick, conjuring and witchery are far differing arts, whereof Pliny being ignorant, scoffeth thereat. For Nero, saith ^b*Pliny*, who had the most excellent magicians of the east, sent him by Tyridates king of Armonia, who held that kingdom by his grace, found the art after long study and labour altogether ridiculous.

^c*Magus* is a Persian word primitively, whereby is express'd such a one as is altogether conversant in things divine. And, as ^d*Plato* affirmeth, the art of magick is the art of worshipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his epistles expounding the word [μαγικός] saith, that the Persians called their gods μάγας: whence he addeth that Magus is either ὁ κατὰ φύσιν θεός or θεοπροπαιδης θεός, that is, that Magus is a name sometime of him that is a God by nature; sometimes of him that is in the service of God: in which latter sense it is taken, Matt. ch. ii. ver. 1. And this is the first and highest kind: which ^e*Piccolomini* calleth divine magick: and these did the Latins newly intitle sapientes or wise men: For the fear and worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These wisemen the Greeks call Philosophers: the Indians Brachmans: which name they somewhat nearly retain to this day, calling their priests Bramines; among the Egyptians they were termed priests; with the Hebrews they were called Cabalists, Prophets, Scribes, and Pharisees: amongst the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldeans: and among the Persians Magicians: of whom Arnobius (speaking of Hofstanes, one of the ancient magicians) useth these words, 'Et verum Deum merita majestate prosequitur, & angelos ministros Dei, sed veri, ejus venerationi novit assistere. Idem demonas prodit terrenos, vagos, humanitatis inimicos. Sophenes (for so M. Felix calleth him, not Hofstanes) ascribeth the due majesty to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his angels are ministers and messengers which attend the worship of the true God. He also hath delivered that there are devils earthly and wandring, and enemies to mankind.

His majesty also in his first book of Demonology, c. iii. acknowledgeth, that in the Persian tongue the word [Magus] imports as much as a contemplator of divine and heavenly sciences, but unjustly so called, because the Chaldeans were ignorant of the true divinity. And it is also right which his majesty avoweth, that under the name of magick, all other unlawful arts are comprehended, and yet doth his majesty distinguish it from necromancy, witchcraft, and the rest: of all which he hath written largely and most learnedly. For the magick which his majesty condemneth, is of that kind whereof the devil is a party. Daniel, in his 2d chapter, nameth four kinds of those wisemen: Arioli, Magi, Malefici, & Chaldæi. Arioli the old Latin translation calleth Sophistas: Vatablus and Pagninus, Genethliacos, or Physicos, or Philosophers, or (according to the note of Vatablus) Naturalists: Nempe sunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod philosophi apud Græcos (scilicet) divinarum humanarumque rerum scientiam profitentes; For the Magi are the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Greeks, that is, men that profess the knowledge of things both divine and human. The Greek and the English call them incanters; Junius magicians; Castalion conjecturers: in the Syrian they are all four by one name called Sapientes Babylonis, The wisemen of Babel.

The second sort Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our English call Astrologers, Jerome and the Septuagint, Magicians.

The third kind are Malefici, or Venefici; in Jerome, Pagnin, and the Septuagint, Witches, or Poisoners; in Junius, Præstigiatores, or Sorcerers, as in English.

That witches are rightly so called Venefici, or Poisoners; and that indeed there is a kind of Malefici, which without any art of magick or necromancy, use the help of the devil to do mischief, his majesty confirmeth in the first chapter of his second book: speaking also in the fifth chapter of their practice, to mix the powder of dead bodies with other things by the devil prepared; and at other times to make pictures of wax, or clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the devil by other means bringeth to pass.

The fourth, all translators call Chaldeans: who took upon them to foretel all things to come, as well natural as human, and their events: and this they vaunted to perform by the influences of the stars by them observed, and understood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which have made odious the very name of magick, having chiefly sought (as is the manner of all impostures) to counterfeit the highest and most noble part of it, yet so as they have also crept into the inferiour degrees.

A second kind of magick was that part of Astro- logy, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kinds of agriculture and husbandry : which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the stars into those lower elements.

Philo Judeus goeth farther, affirming that by this part of magick or astrology, together with the motions of the stars and other heavenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he lived in Chaldea : Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognovit Creatorem (saith Jo. Damascen.) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Josephus reporteth of Abraham, that he instructed the Egyptians in arithmetick and astronomy, who before Abraham's coming unto them knew none of these sciences.

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo in defence of Mirandula against Garfias. Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham sanctitate & sapientia omnium præstantissimus Chaldeos primum, deinde Phœnices, demum Aegyptios sacerdotes astrologiam & divina docuerit : Alexander (saith he) meaning Alexander Polyhistor, and Eupolemon affirm, that Abraham the holiest and wisest of men did first teach the Chaldeans, then the Phœnicians, lastly the Egyptian priests astrology and divine knowledge.

The third kind of magick containeth the whole philosophy of nature ; not the brablings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost virtues, and draweth them out of nature's hidden bosom to human use, Virtutes in centro centri latentes ; Virtues hidden in the center of the center, according to the chymists. Of this sort were Albertus, Arnoldus de villa Nova, Raymond, Bacon, and many others : and before these, in elder times, and who better understood the power of nature, and how to apply things that work to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of : Apolonius Tyaneus remembred by St. Jerome to Paulinus ; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans : among the Indians, Thespion : among the Egyptians, Hermes : among the Babylonians, Budda : the Thracians had Zamolxis : the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abbaris : and the Italians, Pet. Aponensis. The magick which these men profess'd is thus defin'd. Magia est connexio à viro sapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus, sibi congruenter respondentibus, ut inde opera prodeant non sine eorum admiratione qui causam ignorant : Magick is the connexion of natural agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wise man to the bringing forth of such effects, as are wonderful to those that know not their causes. In all these three kinds which other men divide into four, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned ; especially in the first and highest. For in his oracles he confesseth God to be the Creator of the universal : he believeth of the Trinity, which he could not investigate by any natural knowledge : he speaketh of angels, and of Paradise : approveth the immortality of the soul : teacheth truth, faith, hope, and love, discoursing of the abstinence and charity of the magi : which oracles of his, Pfellus, Picinus, Patritius, and others have gathered and translated.

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the theology of the Phœnicians using Zoroaster's own words : Hæc ad verbum scribit (saith Eusebius) Deus primus incorruptibilium, sempiternus, ingenuus, expers partium, sibi ipsi simillimus, bonorum omnium auriga, munera non expetens, optimus, prudentissimus, pater juris, sine doctrina justitiam perdoctus, natura perfectus, sapiens, sacræ naturæ unicus inventor, &c.

Thus writeth Zoroaster, word for word. God the first incorruptible, everlasting, unbegotten, without parts, most like himself, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, having learn'd justice without teaching, perfect wise by nature, the only inventor thereof.

Sixtus Senensis,¹ speaking of the wisdom of the Chaldeans, doth distinguish those wise men into five orders, to wit, Chascedim, or Chaldeans : Asaphim, or Magicians : Chartumim ; (which he translates Arioli or Sophists) Mechasphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Poisoners ; and Gazarim Augures, or Aruspices, or Diviners.

Chascedim were those which had the name of Chaldeans, which were astronomers ; Hi cælorum motus diligentissime spectarunt ; These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heavens : whom Philo in the life of Abraham describeth.

Asaphim were in the old Latin translation called philosophers : of the Septuagint and of Jerome, magicians : Qui de omnium tam divinarum quam humanarum rerum causis philosophati sunt ; Who discoursed of the causes of all things, as well divine as human : of whom Origen, makes Balaam the son of Beor, to be the first : but Laertius ascribeth the invention of this art to Zoroastres the Persian.

Chartumim, or inchanters, the disciples (saith St. Augustine, Pliny and Justin) of another Zoroastres : who corrupted the admirable wisdom of the magi, which he received from his ancestors.

Mecasphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those of which we have spoken already out of his majesty's book of Demonology.

Gazarim, or Aruspices, after St. Jerome, which divine from the entrails of beasts slain for sacrifices : or by Gazarim others understand Augures, who divine by the flying, singing, or feeding of birds.

By this distinction we may perceive the difference between those wise men which the kings of Babylon entertained ; and that the name and profession of the magi among the ancient Persians was most honest. For as Peucer truly observeth, Præerant religioni Persicæ, ut in populo Dei Levitæ, studiisque veræ philosophiæ dediti erant : nec quisquam Rex Persarum poterat esse, qui non antea magorum disciplinam scientiamque percipisset. The magi (saith he) were the chief ministers of the Persian religion, as the Levites among God's people, and they were given to the studies of true philosophy : neither could any be king of the Persians, who had not first been exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the magi. Sixtus Senensis in the defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus hath two kinds of magick ; his own words are these : Et ne quem moveant præmissa Polychronii & Theophili testimonia, sciendum est duplicem esse magiam ; alteram ubique ab Origene damnatam, quæ per sœdera cum demonibus inita aut vere aut apparenter operatur ; alteram ab Origene laudatam, quæ ad prælicen naturalis philosophiæ pertinet docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad invicem agentium ac patientium : That the testimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius, saith he, may not move any man, it is to be understood that magick is of two sorts, the one every where condemned by Origen ; which worketh (whether truly or seemingly) by covenants made with devils : the other commended by Origen ; which appertaineth to the prælic part of natural philosophy, teaching to work admirable things by the mutual application of natural virtues, agent and suffering reciprocally. This partition Jerome doth embrace in the first of his commentaries upon Daniel; where considering of the difference which Daniel makes between these four kinds of wise men formerly remembred, he useth this distinction; Quos nos Hæriolos, cæteri ἐπαοιδῆς (id est) Incantatores interpretati sunt, videntur mihi esse qui verbis rem peragunt; magi, qui de singulis philosophantur; malefici, qui sanguine utuntur & victimis, & sæpe contingunt corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldeis Genethliacos significari puto, quos vulgo mathematicos vocant. Consuetudo autem communis magos pro maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem suam, eo quod sint philosophi Chaldeorum: & ad artis hujus scientiam reges quoque & principes ejusdem gentis omnia faciunt; unde & in nativitate Domini Salvatoris ipsi primum ortum ejus intellexerunt, & venientes in sanctam Bethlehem adoraverunt puerum, stella desuper ostendente. They whom we call forcerers, and others interpret inchanters, seem to me such as perform things by words; magicians, such as handle every thing philosophically; witches, that use blood and sacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldeans I take them to be signified by the name of conjecturers upon nativities, whom the vulgar call mathematicians. But common custom takes magicians for witches, who are otherwise reputed in their own nation: for they are the philosophers of the Chaldeans: yea kings and princes of that nation do all that they do according to the knowledge of this art: whence at the nativity of the Lord our Saviour they first of all understood his birth, and coming unto holy Bethlehem did worship the child, the star from above shewing him unto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is great difference between the doctrine of a magician, and the abuse of the word. For tho' some writers affirm, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex fœdere factò utitur diaboli opera ad rem quamcunque; That he is called a magician now-a-days, who having entered league with the devil, useth his help to any matter; yet (as our Saviour said of divorce) it was not so from the beginning. For the art of magick is of the wisdom of nature; other arts which undergo that title were invented by the falshood, subtlety and envy of the devil. In the latter there is no other doctrine, than the use of certain ceremonies per malam fidem, by an evil faith: in the former no other ill, than the investigation of those virtues and hidden properties which God hath given to his creatures, and how fitly to apply things that work to things that suffer. And tho' by the Jews those excellent magicians, philosophers and divines, which came to worship our Saviour Christ, were termed Mechaschephim, or Mecasphim; yet had they no other reason than common custom therein. Consuetudo autem communis magos pro maleficis accipit; Common custom, saith ^a St. Jerome, understandeth witches under the name of magicians: and antiquity, saith ^b Peter Martyr, by the word [magi] understood good and wise men. Quid igitur expavescis magi nomen formidolose, nomen evangelio gratiosum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, sed sapientem sonat & sacerdotem? O thou fearful one, saith Ficinus, why doubtest thou to use the name of Magus, a name gracious in the gospel, which doth not signify a witch or conjurer, but a wise man and a priest? For what brought this slander to that study and profession but only idle ignorance, the parent of causeless admiration? Causa fuit mirificentia quorundam operum, quæ revera opera naturalia sunt: veruntamen quia procuratione demonum naturas ipsas vel conjungentium, vel commiscuentium, vel aliter ad operandum expedientium facta sunt, opera demonum credebantur ab ignorantibus hæc. De operibus hujusmodi est magia naturalis, quam necromantiam multi improprie vocant. The marvellousness of some works, which indeed are natural, hath been the cause of this slander: but because these works have been done by procurement of devils joining the natures together, or mingling them, or howsoever fitting the natures to their working, they were thought the works of the devils by the ignorant. Among these works is natural magick, which men call very improperly necromancy.

Mirandula in his Apology goeth further: ^c For by understanding, saith he, the uttermost activity of natural agents we are assisted to know the divinity of Christ: for otherwise (to use his own words) Ignoratis terminis potentie & virtutis rerum naturalium, stat nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quæ fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia; The terms or limits of natural power and virtue not understood, we must needs doubt whether those very works which Christ did, may not be done by natural means: after which he goeth on in this sort: Ideo non hæretice, non superstitiose dixi, sed verissime & Catholice, per talem magiam adjuvari nos in cognoscenda divinitate Christi; Therefore I said not heretically, not superstitiously, but most truly and catholickly, that by such magick we are furthered in knowing the divinity of Christ. And seeing the Jews and others the enemies of Christian religion, do impudently and impiously object, that those miracles which Christ wrought were not above nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula, a man for his years fuller of knowledge than any that this latter age hath brought forth, might with good reason avow, that the uttermost of nature's works being known, the works which Christ did, and which (as himself witnesseth) no man could do, do manifestly testify of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held nature therein but as a pencil, and by a power infinitely supreme and divine: and thereby those that were faithless, were either converted or put to silence.

SECT. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient magick is not to be condemned; tho' the devil here as in other kinds, hath sought to obtrude evil things under the name and colour of good things.

SEEING therefore it is confessed by all of understanding, that a magician (according to the Persian word) is no other than Divinorum cultor & interpres; A studious observer and expounder of divine things: and the art itself (I mean the art of natural magick) no other, Quam naturalis philosophiæ absoluta consummatio, Than the absolute perfection of natural philosophy. Certainly then it proceedeth from ignorance, and no way forteth with wise and learned men promiscue, and without difference and distinction, to confound lawful and praise-worthy knowledge with that impious, and, to use St. Paul's words, With those beggarly rudiments, which the devil hath shuffled in, and by them bewitcheth and besootheth graceless men. For if we condemn natural magick, or the wisdom of nature, because the devil, who knoweth more than any man, doth also teach witches and poisoners the harmful parts of herbs, drugs, minerals, and excrements: then may we by the same rule condemn the physician, and the art of healing. For the devil also in the oracles of Amphib- raus, Amphiloehus, Trophonius, and the like, taught men in dreams, what herbs and drugs were proper for such and such diseases. Now no man of judgment is ignorant, that the devil from the beginning hath sought to thrust himself into the same employment among the ministers and servants of God, changing himself for that purpose into an angel of light. He hath led men to idolatry as a doctrine of religion; he hath thrust in his prophets among those of the true God; he hath corrupted the art of astrology, by giving a divine power to the stars, teaching men to esteem them as gods, and not as instruments. And (as ^a Bunting observeth) it is true that judicial astrology is corrupted with many superstitions: but the abuse of the thing takes not away the art; considering that heavenly bodies (as even general experience sheweth) have and exercise their operation upon the inferior. For the sun, and the star of Mars do dry; the moon doth moisten, and govern the tides of the sea. Again, the planets, as they have several and proper names, so have they several and proper virtues: the stars do also differ in beauty and in magnitude; and to all the stars hath God given also their proper names, which (had they not influences and virtues different) needed not. ^b He counteth the number of the stars, and calleth them by their names. But into the good and profitable knowledge of the celestial influences, the devil ceaseth not to shuffle in his superstitions: and so to the knowledge of the secret virtues of nature hath he fastned his doctrine of characters, numbers and incantations; and taught men to believe in the strength of words and letters: (which without faith in God are but ink or common breath) thereby either to equal his own with the all-powerful word of God, or to diminish the glory of God's creating word, by whom are all things.

Moreover, He was never ignorant, that both the wise and the simple observe when the sea-birds forsake the shores and fly into the land, that commonly some great storm followeth; that the high flying of the kite and the swallow betokeneth fair weather; that the crying of crows and bathing of ducks foreshew rain: for they feel the air moistened in their quills. And it is written in Jeremy the prophet, 'Even the fowl in the air knoweth her appointed times, and the turtle, and the crane, and the swallow.' Hereupon this enemy of mankind working upon these, as upon the rest of God's creatures, long time abused the heathen, by teaching them to observe the flying of fowls, and thereby to judge of good or ill success in the war: and withal to look into their entrails for the same, as if God had written the secrets of unsearchable providence in the livers and bowels of birds and beasts. Again, because it pleased God sometimes by dreams, not only to warn and teach his prophets and apostles, but heathen princes also; as ^c Abimelech to restore Sarah to Abraham; because he admonished Joseph, and by dream informed Jacob, Laban, Pharaoh, Solomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the east, and others. For as it is remembered in Job: ^e In dreams and visions of the night when sleep falleth upon men, &c. then God openeth the ears, that he might cause man to return from his enterprise: therefore, I say, doth the devil also practise his divinations by dreams, or alter ^f Parisiensis, Divinitatis imitationes, His mock divinity. This in the end grew so common, as Aristides compiled an Ephemerides of his own dreams: Mithridates of those of his concubines. Yea, the Romans finding the inconvenience hereof, because all dreams, without distinction of causes, were drawn to divination, forbade the same by a law, as by the words of prohibition, ^g Aut narrandis somniis occultam aliquam artem divinandi, it may appear. Likewise by the law of God in Deuteronomy xiii. seducing dreamers were ordered to be slain. Yet it is not to be contemned that Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his dream for two grievous diseases that oppress'd him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolemy's poison'd wound; nor that which ^h St. Augustine reporteth of a Millanoise, whose son (the father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his father in a dream where the acquittance lay to discharge it; nor that of Astyages of his daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, forasmuch as the cause is not in ourselves, this place denieth dispute.

SECT. IV.

That Daniel's misliking Nabuchodonosor's condemning of the magicians doth not justify all their practices.

BUT it may be objected, that if such divinations as the heathens commonly used were to be condemned in them, who took on them very many and strange revelations: how came it to pass that Daniel both condemned the hasty sentence of Nabuchodonosor against the magicians of Chaldea, and in a sort forbade it? especially considering that such kind of people God himself commanded to be slain. To this divers answers may be given. First, It seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldeans, because they acknowledged that the dream of the king, which himself had forgotten, could not be known to any man by any art, either natural or diabolical: For there is no other (said the Chaldeans) that can declare it before the king, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confessed the power of the ever-living God.

Secondly, It may be conjectured, and that with good reason, that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any evil or unlawful arts, but were merely magicians and naturalists: and therefore when the king commanded to kill all, Daniel persuaded the contrary, and called it a hasty judgment, which proceeded with fury without examination. And that some of those mens studies and professions were lawful, it may be gathered by Daniel's instructions: For himself had been taught by them, and was called chief of the inchanters; of which some were termed Soothsayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldeans, others Magi or Wise men: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel misliked and forbade the execution of that judgment, because it was unjust. For howsoever those men might deserve punishment for the practice of unlawful arts (tho' not unlawful according to the law of that state) yet herein they were altogether guiltless. For it exceeded human power to pierce the king's thought, which the devil himself could not know. So then in Daniel's dislike, and hindering of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the magicians, there is no absolute justifying of their practice and profession.

SECT. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemn the right use of them.

NOTwithstanding this mixture every where of good with evil, of falshood with truth, of corruption with cleanness and purity: the good, the truth, the purity in every kind may well be embraced: as in the ancient worshipping of God by sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the elders, that therefore forbore to offer sacrifice to the God of all power, because the devil in the image of Baal, Astaroth, Chemoth, Jupiter, Apollo, and the like, was so adored.

Neither did the abuse of astrology terrify Abraham (if we may believe the most ancient and religious^a historians) from observing the motions and natures of heavenly bodies; neither can it deter wise and learned men in these days from attributing those virtues, influences, and inclinations to the stars and other lights of heaven, which God hath given to those his glorious creatures.

The sympathetical and antipathetical working of herbs, plants, stones, minerals, with their other utmost virtues sometimes taught by the devil, and applied by his ministers to harmful and uncharitable ends, can never terrify the honest and learned physician or magician from the using of them to the help and comfort of mankind: neither can the illusions whereby the devil betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reject the observation of dreams; so far as with a good faith and a religious caution they may make use of them.

Lastly, The^b prohibition to mark flying of fowls (as signs of good or evil success) hath no reference at all to the crying of crows against rain, or to any observation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be given. For if we confound arts with the abuse of them, we shall not only condemn all honest trades and interchange among men (for there are that deceive in all professions) but we shall in a short time bury in forgetfulness all excellent knowledge and all learning, or obscure and cover it over with a most scornful and beggarly ignorance: and (as Pliny teacheth) we should shew ourselves Ingratos erga eos, qui labore curaque lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce; Unthankful we should shew ourselves toward those, who with pains and care have discovered unto us light in this light.

Indeed not only these natural knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant; but the mathematicks also and professors thereof; tho' those that are excellently learned judge of it in this sort. In speculo mathematico verum illud, quod in omni scibili queritur, relucet; non modo remota similitudine, sed fulgida quadam propinquitate; In the glass of the mathematicks, that truth doth shine, which is sought in every kind of knowledge; not in an obscure image, but in a near and manifest representation.

SECT. VI.

Of the divers kinds of unlawful magick.

IT is true that there are many arts, if we may so call them, which are covered with the name of magick, and esteemed abusively to be as branches of that tree, on whose root they never grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancy or Goetia: and of this again there are divers kinds. The one is an invocation at the graves of the dead, to whom the devil himself gives answer instead of those that seem to appear. For certain it is, that the immortal souls of men do not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they give motion and understanding to the living: death being nothing else but a separation of the body and soul: and therefore the soul is not to be found in the graves.

A second practice of those men, who pay tribute, or are in league with Satan, is that of conjuring or of raising up devils, of whom they hope to learn what they list. These men are so distracted, as to believe that by terrible words they make the devil to tremble; that being once impaled in a circle (a circle which cannot keep out a mouse) they therein, as they suppose, insconce themselves against that great monster. Doubtless they forgot that the devil is not terrified from doing ill, and all that is contrary to God and goodness; no, not by the fearful word of the Almighty: and that he feared not to offer to sit in God's seat; that he made no scruple to tempt our Saviour Christ, whom himself called the Son of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of his, an unworthy wretch will yet resolve himself, that he can draw the devil out of hell, and terrify him with a phrase: whereas in very truth, the obedience which devils seem to use, is but thereby to possess themselves of the bodies and souls of those which raise them up; as his majesty in his book aforementioned hath excellently taught, That the devil's obedience is only secundum quid, scilicet, ex pacto; respective, that is, upon bargain.

I cannot tell what they can do upon those simple and ignorant devils, which inhabit^d Jamblicus's imagination; but sure I am, the rest are apt enough to come uncalled: and always attending the cogitations of their servants and vassals, do no way need any such enforcement.

Or it may be that these conjurers deal altogether with Cardan's mortal devils, following the opinion of^e Rabbi Avornathan and of Porphyrius, who taught that these kind of devils lived not above a thousand years: which Plutarch, in his treatise De oraculorum defectione, confirmeth, making example of the great god Pan. For were it true, that the devils were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they always fear those words or threats, by which at other times they are willingly mastered. But the^f familiar of Simon Magus, when he had lifted him up in the air, cast him headlong out of his claws, when he was sure he should perish with the fall. If this perhaps were done by St. Peter's prayers (of which St. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the same prank at other times upon his own accord the devil play'd with^g Theodotus: who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to have been) had the same mortal fall that he had. The like success had Budas, a principal pillar of the Manichean heresy, as^h Socrates in his ecclesiastical history witnesseth: and for a manifest proof hereof, we see it every day, that the devil leaves all witches and forcerers at the gallows, for whom at other times he maketh himself a Pegasus, to convey them in haste to places far distant, or at least makes them so think: ⁱ For to those that received not the truth, saith St. Paul, God shall send them strong illusions. Of these their supposed transportations (yet agreeing with their confessions) his majesty, in the 2d book and the 4th chapter of the Demonology, hath confirmed by unanswerable reasons, that they are merely illusive. Another sort there are who take on them to include spirits in glasses and crystals: of whom Cusanus: ^k Latui sunt incantatores, qui in ungue & vitro volunt spiritum includere: quia spiritus non clauditur corpore; They are foolish inchanters which will shut up their spirits within their nails or in a glass; for a spirit cannot be inclosed by a body.

There is also another art besides the aforementioned, which they call Theurgia, or white magick; a pretended conference with good spirits or angels, whom by sacrifice and invocation they draw out of heaven, and communicate withal. But the administering spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due unto their Creator: so seeing they are most free spirits, there is no man so absurd to think (except the devil have corrupted his understanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of heaven by threats. Wherefore let the professors thereof cover themselves how they please by a professed purity of life, by the ministry of infants, by fasting and abstinence in general; yet all those that tamper with immaterial substances and abstract natures, either by sacrifice, vow, or enforcement, are men of evil faith, and in the power of Satan. For good spirits or angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are devils which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked divinations: as by fire, called Pyromantia: by water, called Flydromantia: by the air, called Matæotechnia, and the like.

The last, and, indeed, the worst of all other is fascination or witchcraft: the practisers whereof are no less envious and cruel, revengeful and bloody, than the devil himself. And these accursed creatures having sold their souls to the devil, work two ways; either by the devil immediately, or by the art of poisoning. The difference between necromancers and witches, his majesty hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command, the other obey the devil.

There is another kind of petty witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of beasts and birds, of which ^a Pythagoras was accused, because an eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the art of falconry, yet was it no more to be admired than Mahomet's dove, which he had used to feed with wheat out of his ear: which dove, when it was hungry, lighted on Mahomet's shoulder, and thrust his bill therein to find his breakfast: Mahomet persuading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghost that gave him advice. And certainly if Banks had lived in elder times, he would have shamed all the enchanters in the world: for whosoever was most famous among them, could never master or instruct any beast as he did his horse.

For the drawing of serpents out of their dens, or killing them in their holes by enchantments (which the Marfians, a people of Italy, practised. ^b Colubros disrumpit Marfia cantu, Inchanting Marfia makes the snakes to burst.) That it hath been used, it appears Psalms lviii. 6. tho' I doubt not, but that many impostures may be in this kind; and even by natural causes it may be done. For there are many fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them; as womans hair burnt, and the like. So many things may be laid in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I find no other magick or enchantment, than to draw out a mouse with a piece of toasted cheese.

SECT. VII.

Of divers ways by which the devil seemeth to work his wonders.

BUT to the end that we may not doat with the Manichees, who make two powers of Gods:

that we do not give to the devil any other dominion than he hath (not to speak of his ability, when he is the minister of God's vengeance, as when Egypt, according to David, was destroyed by evil angels) he otherwise worketh but three ways: the first is, by moving the cogitations and affections of men: the second, by the exquisite knowledge of nature: and the third, by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And that they cannot work what they would, G. Parisiensis giveth three causes: the first a natural impotency: the second, their own reason dissuading them from daring over much, or indeed (and that which is the only certain cause) the great mercy of the Creator, ^c Tenens eos ligatos (saith the same author) velut immanissimas belluas. St. Augustine was of opinion, that the frogs which Pharaoh's forcerers produced were not natural, but that the devil (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appear to be such. For as Vairus observeth, those frogs of the enchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeed. Hereof saith St. Augustine, Nec sane demones naturas creant, sed quæ a Deo creatæ sunt commutant, ut videantur esse quod non sunt; The devils create not any natures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seem to be that which they be not: of which in the 83d question he giveth the reason, Dæmon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes meatus intelligentiæ, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet; that is, The devil fills with certain clouds all passages of the understanding, by which the beam of the mind is wont to open the light of reason.

And as Tertullian in his book de anima rightly conceiveth, if the devil can possess himself of the eyes of our minds, and blind them, it is not hard for him to dazle those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the devil entreth in, beginning with the fancy, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soul: for the ^d fancy is most apt to be abused by vain apprehensions.

Aquinas on the contrary held that those frogs were not imaginary, but such indeed as they seemed: not made magicæ artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the art, but (according to Thomas) per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem, By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceived by that sleight of false semblance; and St. Augustine in another case like unto this, to wit, of the turning of Diomedes's companions into birds, per activa cum passivis, inclineth rather to this opinion: tho' I am not persuaded that St. Augustine believed that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis, a man very learned, also confirmeth. For speaking of natural magick, he useth these words. ^e De hujusmodi autem operibus est subita generatio ranarum, & pediculorum, & vermium, aliorumque animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verum adhibitis adiutoriis, quæ ipsa semina naturæ confortant & acunt, ita ut opus generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus naturæ videatur (quæ tardius talia efficere consuevit) sed potentia dæmonum, &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in hiis docti sunt talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in hiis glorificant; In such works, saith he, the sudden generation of frogs, and lice, and worms, and some other creatures is: in all which nature alone worketh; but by means strengthening the seeds of nature, and quickning them; in such wise that they so hasten the work of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to be the work of nature, which usually worketh more leisurely, but they think it is done by the powers of devils. But they who are learned in these arts marvel not at such working, but glorify the Creator. Now by these two ways, the devils do most frequently work, to wit, by knowing the uttermost of nature; and by illusion: for there is no incomprehensible or unsearchable power, but of God only.

For shall we say, he caused sometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempests; and can infect the air, as well as move it or compress it; who knows not that these things are also natural? or may it be objected that he foretelleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion? it is true, that he sometimes doth it; but how? in elder ages he stole his knowledge out of the predictions of the prophets: and he foretold the death of Saul, at such time as he was in his own possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath lived from the infancy of the world to this day, and observed the success of every council: he that by reason of his swift motions can inform himself of all places, and preparations: he that is of counsel with all those that study and practise subversion and destruction: he that is prince of the air, and can thence better judge, than those that inhabit the earth: if he should not sometimes, yea if he should not very oftentimes, guess rightly of things to come (where God pleaseth not to give impediment) it were very strange. For we see that wise and learned men do oftentimes by comparing like causes conceive rightly of like effects, before they happen: and yet where the devil doubteth, and would willingly keep his credit, he evermore answereth by riddles, as,

Cræsus Halym penetrans magnam subvertit opum vim.

If Cræsus over Halys go,
Great kingdoms he shall overthrow.

Which answer may be taken either way: either for the overthrow of his own kingdom, or of his enemies. And thus far we grant the devil may proceed in predictions, which otherwise belong to God only; as it is in Isaiah, Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are gods: shew us at all times and certainly what is to come. ^b Solius enim divine intelligentie ac sapientie est occulta nosse & revelare; It is only proper to God's understanding and wisdom to know and reveal hidden things.

SECT. VIII.

That none was ever raised from the dead by the power of the devil: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

TO conclude, it may be objected that the devil hath raised from the dead: and that others by his power have done the like, as in the example given of Samuel raised by the witch of Endor: which were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed that some of the devil's acts exceeded all the powers of nature, false semblance, and other illusions. ^c Justin Martyr was sometimes of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeed: and so was Ambrose, Lyra, and Burgensis; from which authorities those men borrow strength which so believe. But Martyr changed his opinion: and so did St. Augustine, who at first seemed to be indifferent: for in his questions upon the Old and New Testament, he accounteth it detestable to think that it was Samuel which appeared: and these be his words elsewhere to the same effect: In requie sunt animæ piorum a corpore separate, impiorum autem pœnas luunt, donec istarum ad vitam æternam, illarum vero ad æternam mortem quæ secunda dicitur corpora reviviscant; The souls of the godly separated from their bodies are at rest, but those of the wicked suffer punishment, till the bodies of the just rise to eternal life, and of the wicked to an eternal and second death.

And (besides ^d St. Augustine) Justin Martyr, Hilarius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostom, and others, believed firmly, and taught it: that the souls of men being once separate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all. Credere debemus (saith Cyril) quum a corporibus sanctorum animæ abierint, tanquam in manus charissimi patris Bonitati divine commendari; We must believe when the souls of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the divine Goodness as into the hands of a most dear father. If then they be in heaven, the power of the devil cannot stretch so high: if in hell, ab inferno nulla est redemptio, from hell there is no redemption. For there are but two habitations after death; Unum (saith Augustine) in igne æterno; alterum in regno æterno; The one in eternal fire; the other in God's eternal kingdom. And tho' it be written in Jure Pontificio, that many there are who believe that the dead have again appeared to the living; yet the Gloss upon the same text finds it ridiculous. ^e Credunt & male, quia sunt phantasmata (saith the Gloss;) They believe, and they believe amiss, because they be but phantasms, or apparitions. For whereas any such voice hath been heard, saying, I am the soul of such a one; hæc oratio a fraude atque deceptione diabolica est; That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the devil, saith Chrysostom. Likewise of the same saith Tertullian. Ab sit ut animam cujuslibet sancti, nedum prophetæ, a demonio credamus extraham; God forbid that we should think that the soul of any holy man, much less of a prophet, should be drawn up again by a devil.

It is true that the scriptures call that apparition Samuel; so do they the wooden images Eberninus: and false brazen gods are called gods, and the like. And whereasthese of the contrary opinion build upon that place of the 26th of ecclesiasticus (a book not numbered among the canonical scriptures) as St. Augustine himself in his treatise, if it be his, de cura pro mortuis agenda, confesseth; yet Siracides following the literal sense and phrase of the scriptures, proveth nothing at all: for tho' the devil would willingly persuade, that the souls (yea even of just men) were in his power, yet so far is it from the promises of the scriptures, and from God's just and merciful nature, and so contrary to all divine reason, as St. Augustine (or whosoever wrote that book before cited) might rightly term it a detestable opinion to think. For if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that he refused to answer him either by dreams, by Urim, or by his prophets: it were foolish to conceive, that he would permit the devil, or a wicked witch to raise a prophet from the dead in Saul's respect: it being also contrary to his own divine law to ask counsel of the dead; as in Deuteronomy 18, and elsewhere. Therefore it was the devil, and not the soul of a dead body, that gave answer and advice.

But because Helias and Helizeus had raised some from the dead by the power of God ; those devils which St. Augustine calleth ludificatores animantium sibi subjeſtorum, mockers of their own vassals, casting before their eyes a semblance of human bodies, and framing sounds to their ears like the voices of men, do also persuade their graceless and accursed attendants, that themselves both possess, and have power over the souls of men: Eludit diabolus aciem tum spectantium, tum etiam cogitantium, saith L. Vives ; The devil beguileth the sense both of the beholders, and of those that so imagine. These then are the bounds of the devil's power, whom if we will not fear, we must fear to sin. For when he is not the instrument of God's vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himself his voluntary vassal: poteſt ad malum invitare, non poteſt trahere, saith St. Augustine, he can allure, but he cannot enforce to evil. Such as think otherwise may go into the number remembered by Lucretius.

C H A P. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus, and of his wife Semiramis: and of other of her acts.

S E C T. I.

Of the magnificent building of Nineveh by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

BUT to come back to Ninus the amplifier and finisher of Nineveh: whether he performed it before or after the overthrow of Zoroaster, it is uncertain. As for the city it self, it is agreed by all prophane writers, and confirmed by the scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and answerable magnificence. For it had in compass ^a 440 stadia, or furlongs; the walls whereof were an hundred foot upright, and had such a breadth as three chariots might pass on the rampire in front: these walls were garnished with 1500 towers which gave exceeding beauty to the rest, and a strength no less admirable for the nature of those times.

But this city (built in the plains of Aſſyria, and on the banks of Tigris, and in the region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus's time; and (as ancient historians report, and more lately Nauclerus) had the name of Campſor, at such time as Ninus amplified the same, and gave it a wall, and called it after his own name.

For these works of Babylon and Nineveh begun by Nimrod in Chaldea, and in Aſſyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. ^b Ninus finished Nineveh, Semiramis Babylon: wherein she sought to exceed her husband by far. Indeed in the first age when princes were moderate, they neither thought how to invade others, nor feared to be invaded: labouring to build towns and villages for the use of themselves and their people without either walls or towers; and how they might discharge the earth of woods, briars, bushments, and waters, to make it more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis living in that age, when ambition was in strong youth: and purposing to follow the conquest which her husband had undertaken, gave that beauty and strength to Babylon which it had.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis's reign.

THIS she did after the death of her husband Ninus: who after he had mastered Bactria, and subjected unto his empire all those regions between it and the Mediterranean sea and Helleſpont (Asia the less excepted) and finished the work of Nineveh, he left the world in the year thereof 2019 after he had reigned 52 years. Plutarch reporteth, that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would grant unto her the absolute sovereign power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Atheneus, and others, speak of five days. In which time (moved either with desire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her husband to be slain. But this seemeth rather a scandal cast on her by the Greeks, than that it had any truth.

Howsoever Ninus came to his end, Semiramis took on her after his death the sole rule of the Aſſyrian empire: of which Ninus was said to be the first monarch, because he changed his seat from Babylonia in Chaldea to Nineveh in Aſſyria. ^c Justin reports that Semiramis (the better to invest herself, and in her beginning without murmur or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented herself to the people in the person of her son Ninias or Zameis, who bare her external form and proportion without any sensible difference.

This report I take also to be feigned, for which many arguments might be made. But as she ruled long, so she performed all those memorable acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that letter which she sent to the king of India (her last challenge and undertaken conquest) by her own name. And were it true that her son Ninias had such a stature at his father's death, as that Semiramis (who was very personable) could be taken for him; yet it is very unlikely that she could have held the empire from him 42 years after by any such subtilty (for so long she reigned after the death of her husband:) but it may be true that Ninias or Zameis (being wholly given to his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleased with his mother's prosperous government and undertakings.

S E C T. III.

Of Semiramis's parentage, and education, and metamorphosis of her mother.

SOME writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to have been of base parentage, calling her after the name of her country, a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her city wherein she was born, Semiramis Aſcalonitis, of Aſcalon, the ancient city and metropolis of the Philistines. Others report her to be the daughter of Derceta, a Courtizan of Aſcalon, exceeding beautiful. Others say that this Derceta or Dercetis, the mother of Semiramis, was sometime a recluse, and had profess'd a holy and a religious life, to whom there was a temple dedicated seated on the bank of a lake adjoining to Aſcalon; and afterwards falling in love with a goodly young man, she was by him made with child, which (for fear of extreme punishment) she conveyed away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high reeds which grew on the banks of the lake: in which (while the child was left to the mercy of wild beasts) the same was fed by certain birds, which used to feed upon or near those waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adjoining to this lake had the charge and fosteridge of this child, who being perchance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to cover her dishonour and breach of vow; notwithstanding which she was cast from the top of her temple into the lake adjoining, and (as the poets have feigned) changed by Venus into a fish, all but her face, which still held the same beauty and human shape. It is thought, that from this Derceta the invention of that idol of the Philistines (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a man's face, and a fish's body: into whose temple when the ark of God was brought, the idol fell twice to the ground: and at the second fall there remained only the trunk of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so St. Jerome hath converted that place. Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius writ it by Dagon only, which signifieth a fish, and so it only appeared: the head thereof by the second fall being sundred from the body.

For my self I rather think, that this Dagon of the Philistines was an idol representing Triton, one of those imaginary sea-gods under Neptune. For this city being maritime (as all those of the Philistines were, and so were the best of Phenicia) used all their devotions to Neptune, and the rest of the petty gods which attended him.

S E C T. IV.

Of her expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbability of her vices.

BUT for her pedigree I leave it to the Affyrian heralds: and for her vicious life I ascribe the report thereof to the envious and lying Grecians. For delicacy and ease do more often accompany licentiousness in men and women, than labour and hazard do. And if the one half be true which is reported of this lady, then there never lived any prince or princess more worthy of fame than Semiramis was, both for the works she did at Babylon, and elsewhere, and for the wars she made with glorious success: all but her last enterprise of India; from whence both Strabo and Arianus, report that she never returned: and that of all her most powerful army there survived but only 20 persons: the rest being either drowned in the river of Indus, dead of the famine, or slain by the sword of Staurobates. But as the multitude which went out are more than reason hath numbred: so were those that returned less than could have escaped of such an army, as consisted of four millions and upwards. For these numbers which she levied by her lieutenant Dercetæus (saith ^a Suidas) did consist of footmen three millions; of horsemen one million; of chariots armed with hooks on each side one hundred thousand; of those which fought upon camels as many; of camels for burden two hundred thousand; of raw hides for all uses three hundred thousand; of galleys with brazen heads three thousand, by which she might transport over Indus at once three hundred thousand soldiers: which galleys were furnished with Syrians, Phenicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had every man and beast but fed upon grass) are taken from the authority of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: so Diodorus himself hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes's expedition into Greece, and afterwards: whose army (tho' the same was far inferior to that of Semiramis) yet had it weight enough to overload the belief of any reasonable man. For all authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an army of 1700000 and gathered together (therein to pass the Hellepont) three thousand galleys, as Herodotus out of the several provinces whence those galleys were taken hath collected the number.

But of what multitude soever the army of Semiramis consisted: the same being broken, and overthrown by Staurobates upon the banks of Indus, canticum cantavit extremum, she sang her last song; and (as antiquity hath feigned) was changed by the gods into a dove (the bird of Venus) whence it came that the Babylonians gave a dove in their ensigns.

S E C T. V.

Of the temple of Belus built by Semiramis: and of the pyramids of Egypt.

AMONG all her other memorable and more than magnificent works (besides the wall of the city of Babylon) was the temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this city, invironed with a wall carried four square of great height and beauty, having on each square certain brazen gates curiously engraven. In the Core of the square she raised a tower of a furlong high, which is half a quarter of a mile; and upon it again (taking a basis of a less circuit) she set a second tower; and so eight in all, one above another: upon the top whereof the Chaldeans priests made the observation of the stars, because this tower overtopped the ordinary clouds.

By beholding the ruins of this tower, have many travellers been deceived; who suppose that they have seen a part of Nimrod's tower, when it was but the foundation of this temple of Bel (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this temple one hundred thousand talents of frankincense every year (saith Herodotus.) This temple did Nabuchodonosor adorn with the spoils of Jerusalem, and of the temple of Solomon: all which vessels and ornaments Cyrus redelivered. This temple Xerxes evened with the soil; which Alexander is said to have repaired by the persuasions of the Chaldeans. I deny not that it might have been in his desire so to do; but he enjoyed but a few years after Babylon taken, and therefore could not perform any such work. the Egyptians (saith ^b Proclus) inhabiting a low and level ground, and given to the same superstition of the stars that the Chaldeans were, erected in imitation, and for the same service and use, the Pyramids by Memphis, which were conspicue undique navigantibus, saith Pliny. Of these pyramids ^c Bellonius, a careful observer of rarities (who being in Egypt mounted by steps to the top of the highest) maketh this report: Le meilleur archer qui seroit a sa sommite, & tirant une fleche en l'air, a peine pourroit l'envoyer hors de sa base qu'elle ne se tombast sur les degrez. The best archer standing on the top of one of these pyramids, and shooting an arrow from thence into the air as far as he can, with great difficulty shall be able so to force the same, but that it will fall upon some of the degrees or steps.

WORLD:

INTREATING of the Times from the Birth of ABRAHAM, to the Destruction of the Temple of SOLOMON.

The SECOND BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the Time of the Birth of Abraham : And of the use of this Question, for the ordering of the Story of the Assyrian Empire.

SECT. I.

Of some of the successors of Semiramis : with a brief transition to the question, about the time of the birth of Abraham.

AFTER the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zameis succeeded her in the empire, on whom Berosus Amianus bestows the conquest of Bactria, and the overthrow of Zoroaster ; contrary to Diodorus, Justin, Orosius, and all other approved writers.

For Ninias being esteemed no man of war at all, but altogether feminine, and subjected to ease and delicacy, there is no probability in that opinion. Now because there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other than that out of jealousy he every year changed his provincial governours, and built colleges for the Chaldean priests, his astronomers: nor by Arius his successor, whom Suidas calleth Thuras ; but that he reduced again the Bactrians and Caspians, revolted (as it seemeth) in Ninias's time : nor of Aralius, the successor of Arius, but that he added sumptuosity, invented jewels of gold and stone, and some engines for the war: I will for this present pass them over, and a while follow Abraham, whose ways are warrantable (till we meet these Assyrians again in this story) by whom, and by whose issues we shall best give date to the kings of Babylon : Abraham living at once with Ninus, Ninias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralius, and Xerxes or Balanus. For otherwise, if we seek to prove things certain by the uncertain, and judge of those times, which the scriptures set us down without error, by the reigns of the Assyrian princes, we shall but patch up the story at adventure, and leave it in the same confusion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the scriptures do not help us (as Plut. in Theſeo) Mirum non est in rebus antiquis historiam non conflare : No marvel if then in things very ancient, history want assurance.

The

The better therefore to find out, in what age of the world, and how long these Assyrian kings reigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abraham's birth, and in what year the same happened after the flood. Now since all agree; that the forty-third year of Ninus was the birth year of Abraham; by proving directly out of the scriptures, in what year after the flood the birth of Abraham happened, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much jangling between those chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part make 292 or 293 years; others 352 years between Abraham's birth and the flood; a matter often disputed, but never concluded.

Archilochus de temporibus (as we find him in Annius) makes but 250 years from the flood to Ninus: then seeing that Abraham was born in the forty-third year of Ninus, according to Eusebius and St. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the year of Abraham's birth was in the year after the flood 293, or, as the most part of all chronologers gather, the year 292.

Now, since I do here enter into that never-resolved question, and labyrinth of times, it behoveth me to give reason for my own opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walk aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, and without companions, tho' the fewer in number: with whom I rather chuse to endure the wounds of those darts, which envy casteth at novelty, than to go on safely and sleepily in the easy ways of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diversity.

SECT. II.

A proposal of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the year 292 after the flood, and not in the year 352.

THOSE which seek to prove this account of 292 years, between the general flood and Abraham's birth, ground themselves, first on these words of the scripture, So Terah lived 70 years, and begat Abraham, Nabor, and Haran: 2dly, Upon the opinion of Josephus, St. Augustine, Beda, Isidore, and many of the ancient Hebrews before them: authorities (while they are slightly look'd over) seeming of great weight.

From the place of scripture last remembred, the latter chronologers gather these arguments. First, Out of the words as they lie; that Terah at 70 years begat Abraham, Nabor and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the son of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest son of Terah, and so necessarily born in the seventieth year of his life. Secondly, It was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heir of the blessing; and not of Nabor and Haran: for the scope of this chapter was to set down the genealogy of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nabor and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, That if Abraham were not the eldest son, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtful. For it cannot then be proved, that Abraham was born more assuredly in the 130th year of Terah's age, than in the year 131, 132, &c. Moses having no-where set down precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very year in which his father died.

Fourthly, It is thought improbable, that Terah begat Abraham at 130 years, seeing Abraham himself thought it a wonder to be made a father at 100 years.

SECT. III.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and that, after his father's death.

TO answer all which objections it is very easy, the way being prepared thereto by divers learned divines long since, and to which I will add somewhat of my own, according to the small talent which God hath given me. Now forasmuch as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, unless the time of Abraham's journey into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend unto the particular examination of these arguments, I will make bold with order and method so far, as to search into a strange tradition concerning his travels, that serveth as a ground for this opinion, and a bulwark against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceived that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan: the latter after his father's death, the former presently upon his calling, which he performed without all delay, not staying for his father's death at Haran: a conjecture drawn from a place in the epistle to the Hebrews; where it is written, * By faith Abraham, when he was called, obeyed God, to go into a place, which he should afterwards receive for an inheritance: and he went out not knowing whither he went. This supposition (if it be granted) serves very well to uphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let us therefore see whether we may give credit to the supposition it self.

Surely that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his father, the same is proved, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of St. Stephen: And after his father was dead, God brought him into this land, where ye now dwell, that was out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place, so direct and plain, what force hath any man's fancy or supposition, persuading that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan; one before Terah's death, and another after, no such thing being found in the scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability, or reason to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alledg'd can pick any argument, proving, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham passed into Canaan, and then returned unto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I think it reason, that he be believed in the rest. But that he performed the commandment of God after his father's death, leaving Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the scriptures themselves are true. For after his father was dead, saith the martyr Stephen, God brought him into this land. And, as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double journey into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembred the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abraham's coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Jews his adversaries too great an occasion both of scandalizing himself and the gospel of Christ. Indeed we shall find small reason to make us think that Abraham passed and repassed those ways, more often than he was enforced so to do, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome journey, than the strength of his faith in God's promise: in which if any thing would have brought him to despair, he had more cause than ever man had to fall into it. For he came into a region of strong and stubborn nations: a nation of valiant and resolved idolaters. He was besieged with famine at his first arrival, and driven to fly into Egypt for relief. His wife was old, and he had no son to inherit the promise. And when God had given him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him up to himself for sacrifice: all which discomforts he patiently and constantly underwent.

Secondly, Let us consider the ways themselves, which Abraham had to pass over, the length whereof was 300 English miles: and thro' countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himself over the great river of Euphrates, to travel thro' the dangerous and barren desarts of Palmyrena, and to climb over the great and high mountains of Libanus, Hermon or Gilead: and whether these were easy walks for Abraham to march twice over, containing, as aforesaid, 300 miles in length, let every reasonable man judge. For if he travelled it twice, then was his journey in all 1800 miles from Ur to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove this fancy, the manner of Abraham's departing from Haran hath more proof, that he had not Animum revertendi, not any thought of looking backward, than any man's bare conjecture, be he of what antiquity or authority soever. For thus it is written of him: ^a Then Abraham took Sarah his wife, and Lot his brother's son, and all their substance that they possess'd, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, and to the land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was dear unto him; his wife and kinsmen, and their goods; it is not probable, that he meant to walk it back again for his pleasure, in so warm, dangerous, and barren a country as that was: or if he could have been thereto moved, it is more likely that he would have then returned, when he was yet unsettled, and press'd with extreme famine at his first arrival. For had his father been then alive, he might have hoped from him to receive more assured comfort and relief, than among the Egyptians, to whom he was a mere stranger both in religion and nation.

What the cause might be of Abraham's return to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the scriptures have sent him back thither, about the time of his father's death: so they perhaps, if they were urged, could say little else, than that without such a second voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plain, if it be not over-troublesome. They say, that Abraham was in Haran at his father's death, or some time after, being then by their account 135 years old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite undone the business, which, as we read, was within four or five years after that time his greatest, or (as may seem) his only care? Did not he bind with a very solemn oath his principal servant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to travel into those parts, and seek out a wife for Isaac his son? and doth it not appear by all circumstances, that neither he nor his servant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, that they could particularly design any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely if Abraham had been there in person so lately, as within four or five years before, he would not have forgotten a matter of such importance; but would have trusted his own judgment, in chusing a woman, fit for her piety, virtue, and other desirable qualities, to be link'd in marriage with his only son, who was then 35 years old, before which age most of the patriarchs after the flood had begotten children, rather than have left all at random to the consideration of a servant, that neither knew any, nor was known of any in that country. But let it be supposed (if it may be believed) that either Abraham forgot his business when he was there, or that somewhat happened which no man can devise. What might be the reason, that ^c Abraham's man, in doing his master's errand, was fain to lay open the whole story of his master's prosperity, telling it as news, that Sarah had born to him a son in her old age? If Abraham himself, a more certain author, had so lately been among them, would not all this have been an idle tale? It were needless to stand long upon a thing so evident. Whether it were lawful for Abraham to have returned back to Haran, would perhaps be a question hardly answerable: considering how averse he was from permitting his son to be carried thither, even tho' a wife of his own kindred could not have been obtained without his personal presence. ^d Jacob indeed was sent thither by his parents, to take a wife of his own lineage; not without God's special approbation, by whose blessing he prospered in that journey: yet he lived there as a servant; suffered many injuries; and finally was driven to convey himself away from thence by flight. For altho' it be not a sentence written, yet out of all written examples it may be observed, that God alloweth not in his servants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken and transplanted them. That brief saying, Remember Lot's wife, contains much matter. Let us but consider Mesopotamia, from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt out of which the whole nation of the Israelites was delivered: we shall find, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the posterity of the Hebrews. When ^e Hezekiah was visited with an honourable embassy from Babel, it seems that he conceived great pleasure in his mind, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the prophecy which thereupon he heard by Isaiab, made him to know, that the counsel of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when by the waters of Babylon they sat down and wept. Concerning Egypt we read, that ^f Sesac and Neco kings of Egypt brought calamity upon Israel: also that their confidence in the Egyptian succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to return into Egypt, I do not remember, nor can readily find; but it is found in Deuteronomy xvii. 16. that God had said, They should no more return that way; which is given, as the reason, why their king might not cause the people to return to Egypt, for the multiplying of his horses. Whether the Lord had laid any such injunction upon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things do argue it probably: that he never did return, all circumstances do (to my understanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But because this double passage of Abraham is but an imagination: and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can persuade those of judgment or understanding: I take it sufficient, that St. Stephen hath directly taught us, that Abraham left Haran, his father being dead

^a Gen. 12. 5. ^b Gen. 24. ^c Gen. 24. 35, 36, &c. 47. ^d 1 Kings 14. 25. and 2 Kings 23. 29.

And for the rest, when they shew any one scripture to prove it, I will believe as they do. For all the travels of Abraham are precisely set down in the scriptures: as first from Ur or Camerina in Chaldea, to Haran or Charran: and then from Haran (after his father's death) to Sichem; from Sichem he removed to a mountain between Bethel and Hai: thence into Egypt: from Egypt he returned thither again, where Lot and he parted, because their flocks and herds of cattle were more than could be fed in that part: from thence the second time he removed to Mamre, near Hebron: and thence having pursued Amraphel, and rescued Lot, he after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumea, under Abimilech: and after near unto it at Bersabe, at which time he was ready to offer up his son Isaac on the mountain Moriab. But this fiction of his retreat to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in any one story, either divine or human. Now if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former journey into Canaan, as Levita in his Cabala hath feigned, it should in reason be therewithal believed, that he would in those his first travels have provided himself of some certain seat, or place of abiding: and not have come a second time, with his wife, kinsmen, family, goods and cattle, not knowing whereon to rest himself. But Abraham, when he came from Charran, pass'd thro' the north part of Canaan, thence to ^a Sichem, and the plain of Moriab: where finding no place to inhabit, he departed thence to Bethel and Hai: and so from nation to nation, to discover and find out some fit habitation: from whence again, as it is written in Genesis xi. He went forth, going and journeying towards the south, and always unsettled. By occasion of which wandring to and fro, some say, the Egyptians gave him and his the name of Hebraei.^b Further, to prove that he had not formerly been in the country, we may note, that ere he came to Bethel and Hai, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared unto him, saying, Unto thy seed will I give this land, shewing it him as unto a stranger therein, and as a land to him unknown. For Abraham, without any other provident care for himself, believed in the word of the living God: neither sending before, nor coming first to discover it; but being arrived he received a second promise from God, that he would give those countries unto him and his seed to inhabit and inherit.

Lastly, What should move any man to think, that Moses would have omitted any such double journey of Abraham's, seeing he setteth down all his passages elsewhere, long and short? As when he moved from Sichem, and seated between Hai and Bethel, the distance being but twenty miles: and when he moved thence to the valley of Mamre, being but twenty-four miles; and when he left Mamre, and sat down at Gerar, being less than six miles; no, Moses pass'd over all the times of the first age with the greater brevity, to hasten him to the story of Abraham: shutting up all between the creation and the flood in six chapters; which age lasted 1656 years: but he bestoweth on the story of Abraham fourteen chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleventh, and ending with his death in the five and twentieth; and this time endured but 175 years. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abraham's travels, or other actions: or that he would set down those small removes of five miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a journey in going and coming would have ministred some variety of matter, or accident, worthy the inserting and adding to Abraham's story.

SECT. IV.

The answer to another of the objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his 130th year.

NOW touching the objection, where it is said, that it was very unlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his 130th year, seeing Abraham himself thought it a wonder to have a son at an hundred: this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeed miscast, and mistaken; Abraham having respect only to Sarah his wife, when he spake of their many years. For when the angel said unto Abraham in his tent door at Mamre; Lo, Sarah thy wife shall have a son, it followeth in the next verse, Now Abraham and Sarah were old and stricken in age, and it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then, in that it is said it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second wife Keturah had many sons after Sarah's death, as Zimron, Jockshan, Medan, Midian, Isback and Shuab: and the eldest of these was born 37 years after Isaac: and the youngest 40 years after. What strangeness then, that Terah being 130 years old should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed despair of Abraham at 100 years? For Sarah died in the year of the world 2145, and Isaac was born in the year 2109, and Abraham did not marry ^c Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109 out of 2145, there remaineth 36; and therefore if Abraham begat five sons 36 years after this supposed wonder, and when Abraham was 137 years old; it is not strange, that his father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Boaz, Obed and Jesse, who lived so many years and ages after Abraham, begat sons at 100 years, or near it, it cannot be marvelled at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130, and Abraham others at the same age, and seven years after.

SECT. V.

The answer to two more of the objections: shewing that we may have certainty of Abraham's age from the scripture, tho' we make not Abraham the eldest son: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

IT followeth now to speak something to the objection, which brings Abraham's age altogether in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest son of Terah, and born when Terah was 70 years old. For Abraham's age being made uncertain, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That we cannot be certain of Abraham's age, unless we make him the eldest son, is false. For it is plain in the scriptures, that when Terah was 205, which was the year of his death, then was Abraham 75. And if you ask, how I can judge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, that St. Stephen hath told us, that Abraham's departure followed the death of his father Terah: and Terah died at 205; so as the 75th year of Abraham was the 205th year of Terah which known, there can be no error in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the objection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect unto Nachor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham only, with whom God established the covenant, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses, for many great and necessary causes, had respect of Nachor and Haran. For the succession of God's Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nachor and Haran, were they idolators or otherwise. For Nachor was the father of Bethuel and Bethuel of Rebecca the mother of Israel: and Haran was the parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcab: and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and grandmother to Jacob: Milcab also the wife of Nachor, and mother of Bethuel, was Jacob's great grandmother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to give her a son at 90 years, and when by nature she could not have conceived. And therefore, tho' it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nachor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grandchild of Nachor; and Jacob Leah and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grandchild also of Nachor; it was not superfluous in Moses to give light of these men's times and ages. And tho' sometimes they worshipped strange Gods, as it is Joshua xxiv. 2. yet I see no cause to think, that they still continued idolaters. For they believed and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leaving their natural country, and city of Ur in Chaldea, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his father Terah, ere they left Chaldea; but Lot, his son, followed Abraham in Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nachor also, who remained at Charran, gave his sons daughters to Isaac and Jacob, his own kinsmen; he himself having also married in his own family; not thinking it pleasing unto God to mix themselves with strangers and idolaters. And that these men at length believed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seen the servant of Abraham standing at the well beside Charran, he invited him to his father's house in this manner;  Come in thou blessed of Jehovah*, &c. And when this servant of Abraham's demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said; b This thing is proceeded of Jehovah; meaning that it was the will of the true God it should be so; wherein he acknowledged God's providence. Likewise in the following verse it is written; Take, go, that she may be thy master's son's wife, even as Jehovah hath said. This their often using of the name of Jehovah, which is the proper name of the true God, is a sign that they had the knowledge of him.

Now altho' it be the opinion of St. Chrysostom, and some later writers, as Cajetan Oleaster, Muscus, Calvin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an idolater, because he retained certain idols or household gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he believed in the true God, it cannot be denied. For he acknowledgeth the God of Abraham, and of Nachor, and he called Abraham's servant, Blessed of Jehovah, as aforesaid. So as for my self, I dare not avow, that these men were out of the church, who sure I am were not out of the faith.

SECT. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Gen. xi. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest: together with divers reasons proving that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah.

TO the main objection, which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strive to shorten the times, endeavour to prove, that Abraham was the eldest son of Terah, and born in the 70th year of Terah's life: grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the scripture, c And Terah lived 70 years, and begat Abraham, Nachor and Haran: To this I say, that altho' Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no proof at all that he was the eldest and first-born son of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in scriptures was therefore eldest in blood and birth, neither doth it appear that it pleased God to make especial choice of the first sons in nature and time: for Seth was not the first-born of Adam, nor Isaac of Abraham, nor Jacob of Isaac, nor Judah and Joseph of Jacob, nor David the eldest son of Jesse, nor Solomon of David, as is formerly remembred.

But it is written of Noah; Noah was five hundred years old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham and Japhet: shewing that at the 500th year of his age he began to get the first of those three sons. For according to St. Augustine, speaking generally, d Nec attendendus est in his ordo natiuitatis, sed significatio futuræ dignitatis: in qua excelluit Abraham; The order of nativity is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignity: in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore as in the order of the sons of Noah, so is it here; where it is said, That Terah lived 70 years and begat Abraham, Nachor and Haran: For it was late ere Terah began to beget sons, himself being begotten by his father Nachor at 29, as others his ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah; for whereas Adam begat Seth at 130, Enosh Kenan at 90, Kenan Mahalaleel at 70, Mahalaleel Jared at 60, Noah was yet 500 years old when he began to beget the first of his three sons as aforesaid. And St. Augustine in the place before-cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the youngest of Terah's sons, than otherwise: tho' for his excellency he was worthily named first. His own words are these: Pieri enim potuit ut posterior sit generatus Abraham: sed merito excellentiæ, qua in scripturis valde commendatur, prior fuit nominatus. It might be, saith he, that Abraham was begotten later; but was first named in regard of his excellency, for which in scripture he is much commended. So as the naming first or last, proveth nothing who was first or last born: either in those issues of Noah or in these of Terah: neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spiritual blessing: for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest and first in God's favour. Pietas ergo vel ipsa potius electio divina, quæ comitem secum trahit pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dat Semo in liberis Noa, & Abrahamo in liberis Thare. Piety, saith he, or rather divine election, which doth evermore draw with it, or after it piety and the fear of God, gave place and precedency to Shem among the children of Noah, and to Abraham among those of Thare.

For the rest it is manifest, that  Abraham* entred Canaan in the 75th year of his age. And it was in a Gen. 24. 31. b Gen. 24. 50. c Gen. 11. 26. d Aug. quæst. super Gen. 25. e Gen. 12. 4.

Canaan that ^a Hagar bare him Ismael, when Abraham had lived 86 years. It was at Gerar (the south border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had consumed 100 years. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham rose out, when he ^b rescued Lot and overthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83 years: and it is as manifest that he parted from Haran after his father Terah was dead. But if Terah begat Abraham at 70 years old, then must Abraham have been 135 years when he first set his foot in Canaan: seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted, and so 70 added to 135, made 205, the true age of Terah, which is contrary to all those places of scripture before remembered. For he entred at 75, he rescued Lot at 83, he had Ismael at 86, he had Isaac at 100, proved by the former places.

Moreover, if Abraham were the eldest son of Terah, and born in the 70th year of his age: then had Terah lived till Isaac had been 35 years old, and Ismael 49, both which must then have been born in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: unless we should either deny credit to St. Stephen, who saith that Abraham departed from Mesopotamia after his father's death; or else give credit to the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Chronologia antoptica, saith it was about his father's death: because the Greek word μετα may be translated by the Latin sub, as well as by post: which tho' elsewhere it may be, yet cannot it be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say that those things were done about Terah's death, which were 60 years before. Wherefore, supposing Abraham to have been born in the 70th year of Terah, we must give those times and places of birth to Abraham's children, which no authority will warrant; for Abraham had no children in Ur of Chaldea, nor in Haran: nor in 10 years after his arrival into Canaan. For the year of Terah's death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the year of the world 2083: and the year of Ismael's birth was the world's year 2094, which maketh 10 years difference. And that Isaac was born in Canaan, and was to be offered upon the mountain Moriab therein, 39 miles from Bersabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot be that any of Abraham's sons were born in Mesopotamia: nor while Terah lived: nor in less than 10 years after Terah's death: and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest son of Terah, nor born in the 70th year of Terah's age.

Thirdly, Whereas ^c Abraham came into Canaan at 75, if Terah had begotten him at 70, then had Terah lived but 145, for 70 and 75 make 145, which must also have been the full age of Terah: but Terah lived 205 years; and therefore was not Abraham born in the 70th year of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldest brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Iscah wanted but 10 years of Abraham's age: Isaac being born when Abraham was 100, and Sarah 90 years old.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had been the elder brother of Haran, Haran must have begotten Sarah at 9 years old: for granting that Haran was born but one year after Abraham, and Sarah within 10 years as old as Abraham, then of necessity must Haran beget her, when he had lived but 9 years; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Iscah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, saith he, bearing the same signification; and names of principality. Again; to what end was the word Iscah or Ishecah inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? for to speak of any thing superfluous it is not used in God's books: and if Iscah had not belonged to the story, it had been but an idle name to no purpose remembered.

Now if it had been true (as those of the contrary opinion affirm) that Moses had no respect of Nachor and Haran, who were notwithstanding the parents of Bethuel and Rebecca, the mother of Israel, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Iscah in this place, were she not Sarah, but otherwise an idle name of whom there is nothing else first or last?

The age also of Lot disproveth the eldership of Abraham: for Lot was called an old man when Abraham was but 83 years: and if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were father to Lot, Sarah and Milcah, Abraham marrying one of Haran's daughters, and Nabor the other, Sarah also being within 10 years as old as Abraham: it may appear to every reasonable man (not obstinate and prejudicate) that Haran was the eldest son of Terah, and not Abraham: who also died first and before his father left Ur in Chaldea. Also Lyra reasoneth against the opinion of Abraham's eldership, upon the same place of Genesis: drawing argument from the age of Sarah, who was but 10 years younger than Abraham himself. Lyra's words are these; Si igitur Haran fuit junior ipso Abraham, sequitur quod non habebat decem annos quando genuit Saram: imo nec octo, &c. and afterwards, & ideo melius videtur dicendum, quod Abraham fuit ultimò natus de tribus filiis Thare, tamen nominatur primò, propter ejus dignitatem: & quia ponendus erat caput stirpis & generationis sequentis: & quia primo facta est ei repromissio expressa de Christo, sicut supra dictum est de Sem, &c. If therefore (saith Lyra) Haran was younger than Abraham himself, it followeth, that he was not 10 years old when he begat Sarah; and therefore it seemeth better to be said, that Abraham was the last born of the three sons of Thare, nevertheless he is named first for his dignity, both because he was to be ordained head of the stock and generation following, and because the promise of Christ was first made unto him, as before it is said of Sem.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the authors on both sides: with an admonition that they which shorten the times make all ancient stories the more improbable.

IT therefore agreeth with the scriptures, with nature, time, and reason, that Haran was the eldest son of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was born in the 130th year of Terah's life, and not in the 70th year. For Abraham departing Charran after ^d Terah died, according to St. Stephen, and that journey by Abraham performed when he was ^e 75 years old, these two numbers added make 205 years, the full age of Terah: seeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my self, I have no other end herein, than to manifest the truth of the world's story: I reverence the judgments of the fathers; but I know they were mistaken in particulars. St. Augustine was doubtful, and could not determine this controversy. For whatsoever is borrowed from him out of his 16th book de Civitate Dei, c. 15. the same may be answered out of himself in his 25th question upon Gen. But St. Augustine herein followed Josephus, and Isidore: and Beda followed St. Augustine. And it was out of a foolish pride and vanity, that the Hebrews and Josephus sought to make Abraham the first-born: as if God had had respect to the eldest in nature. So did Josephus, together with Nicholas Damascenus (thinking thereby to glorify the Jewish nation) make Abraham a king, intitling Sarah by the name of queen Sarah: and said that Abraham was followed with 318 captains, of which every one had an infinite multitude under him; trecentos & octodecim præfectos habuit: quorum singulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Pharaoh invading him with a great army, took from him his wife Sarah. Such fables argue that Josephus is not to be believed, but with discreet reservations.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292 years from the flood to Abraham, is upheld by many of the Hebrews. But how should we value the opinion of such chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their judgment in such matters were worthy to be regarded, it would have appeared in setting down the succession of the Persian kings, under whom they lived, whose history was not so far remote in time, as these antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good writers. Yet grossly have they erred therein, and so familiar are their mistakings in all things of like nature, that we seldom find their opinion rehearsed without the confutation treading on the heels of it. They of the Roman religion are also generally on the same side: it being a thing usual among them, to maintain whatsoever they have been formerly known to hold and believe. Contrariwise, of the more ancient Theodoret, and some following him: of later times Beroaldus, Codoman, Peucer, Calvin, Junius, Beza, Broughton, Doct. Gibbons, and Moor, with divers of the Protestants, hold Abraham to have been born in the 130th year of his father Terah. From these (as in a case not concerning any point in religion) divers of the same religion, and those nevertheless good authors, as Bucholcerus, Chitræus, Functius and others, are very averse herein, especially Josephus Scaliger with his Sethus Calvisius, proclaiming Beroaldus an arch-heretick in chronology, and condemning this opinion of his as poisonous. Contrariwise Augustinus Tornielus a priest of the congregation of St. Paul, a judicious, diligent, and free writer, whose annals are newly set forth, very earnestly defends the opinion, which I have already delivered: not alledging Beroaldus, nor any protestant writer, as being perhaps unwilling to owe thanks to hereticks. For my self, I do neither dislike the contrary opinion, because commonly those of the Romish religion labour to uphold it; nor favour this large account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant writers have approved it; but for the truth it self. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of scripture, I will add thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparent to all men of judgment, that the best approved historians, divine and prophane, labour to investigate the truth of times, thereby to approve the stories and forepast actions of the world: and not the truth of histories to approve the times by. Let us then make judgment to our selves; which of those two accounts give the best reputation to the story of the scriptures, teaching the world's new plantation, and the continuance of God's church: either that of Josephus, and those which follow him, who make but 292 years, or thereabouts, between the flood and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352 years between the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to be the first-born of Thare, in the 70th year of his life: the other a younger son of Thare, and born when he had lived 130 years. And if we look over all, and do not hastily satisfy our understanding with the first things offered, and thereby being satiated do slothfully and drowsily sit down; we shall find it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some editions, make it above 1072 years between the flood and Abraham's birth: than to take away any part of those 352 years given. For if we advisedly consider the state and countenance of the world, such as it was in Abraham's time, yea, before Abraham was born, we shall find that it were very ill done of us, by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times over-deeply between Abraham and the flood: because in cutting them too near the quick, the reputation of the whole story might perchance bleed thereby, were not the testimony of the scripture supream, so as no objection can approach it: and that we did not follow withal this precept of St. Augustine, that wheresoever any one place in the scriptures may be conceived disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation misunderstood. For in Abraham's time, all the then-known parts of the world were peopled: all regions and countries had their kings. Egypt had many magnificent cities: and so had Palestina, and all the bordering countries: yea, all that part of the world besides, as far as India: and those not built with sticks, but of hewen stones, and defended with walls, and rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquity, than those other men have supposed. And therefore, where the scriptures are plainest, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and marvels? giving also strength thereby to common cavillers, and to those mensapish brains, who only bend their wits to find impossibilities and monsters in the story of the world and mankind.

SECT. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians, and others, grounded upon the times noted in the story of Abraham.

IN this sort therefore for the reasons before alledged, I conclude, that from the general flood, to the birth of ^a*Abraham*, 352 years were consumed: and taking the Assyrian history with us, the same number of years were spent from the flood to the 43d year of Ninus: in which 43d year of Ninus Abraham was born: which happened in the year of the world 2009.

Now of this time of 352 years, we must give one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinar, as to those that staid in the east, to wit, 30 years to Chus, ere he begat Seba: of which tho' the scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sons, we may the more safely give the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34, Peleg Regn at 30, Regn Serug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Havila, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was born, as it appeareth Gen. x. which ^b*St. Augustine* approveth. Giving then 30 years more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and 5 years to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, may be gathered that 65 years were consumed ere Nimrod himself was born: and that Raama had that age ere any of his sons were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and comparison: for ^a*Peleg*, the 4th from Noah, as Raama was, begat Regu in the same year of his life.

Let us then allow 60 years more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly find people to build Babel: for sure we are that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65 and 60 make 125: the rest of the time of 131 (in which year they arrived in Shinar, whereof there were 6 years remaining) we may give them for their travels from the east: because they were pestered with women, children and cattle: and, as some ancient writers have conceived, and Becanus of later times, they kept always the mountains sides, for fear of a second flood. Now if we take this number of 131 out of 352, there remains 221, of which number ^b*Berosus* bestoweth 65 on Belus, and 42 on Ninus, before Abraham born: both which St. Augustine approveth: which two numbers taken again out of 221, there remaineth 114 years of the 352, from the flood to Abraham's birth: which number of 114, necessity bestoweth on Nimrod.

And if it be objected that this time given to Nimrod, is over-long: sure if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appear over-short. For Nimrod, by this account, lived in all but 179 years: whereof he reigned 112: whereas Sale, who was the son of Arphaxad the son of Sem, lived 403 years: and of the same age of the world was Nimrod, the son of Cbus, the son of Cham.

Now after Abraham was born,

Ninus reigned 9 years: which added to 43, make 52.

Ninus dieth and leaveth Semiramis his successor.

Semiramis governed the empire of Babylonia and Assyria 42 years, and died in the 52d year ^ccomplete of Abraham's life.

Ninias or Zameis succeeded Semiramis, and ruled 38 years, in the 2d year of whose reign Abraham left Mesopotamia.

When Abraham was 85 years old, he rescued his nephew Lot, and overthrew by surprise Amraphel king of Shinar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38 years, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23 years after Semiramis died: which was the 75th year of his age: so that Amraphel may seem to have been this Ninias the son of Ninus, and Semiramis, whose 23d year, as aforesaid, being the 75th year of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might have received this overthrow in the 85th year of Abraham, and the 33d year of his own reign: after which he reigned 5 years: which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, urging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not easily answered. Howbeit for the times of the Assyrian kings, that they are to be ordered as we have set them down, according to the times noted by Moses, in the story of Abraham, it is most certain: unless we will either derogate from the truth of Moses's computation, which were impiety: or account the whole history of Ninus and Semiramis to be but a fiction: which were to condemn all ancient historians for fablers.

SECT. IX.

That Amraphel, one of the four kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. xiv. may probably be thought to have been Ninias the son of Ninus.

AND now touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes king of Shinar or Babylonia, in the 85th year of Abraham's life, that is, in the 33d year of the reign of Ninias Zameis the king of the Assyrians, the son of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirm what he was, and how he could be at this time king of Babylonia: Ninias Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it self as most probable, is that which hath been already noted, that this Ninias or Zameis, was no other than our Amraphel: who invaded Traconitis or Basan, and overthrew those five kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the scriptures tell us, that Amraphel was king of Shinar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the successor of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85th year of Abraham's life: wherein he rescued Lot, slew Chedorlaomer, and overthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest monarch: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chief, tho' Amraphel be first named by Moses in the 1st verse of the xivth chapter of Genesis. For the kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis or of the five cities, were the vassals of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel: as it is written: "Twelve years were they subject to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13th year they rebelled, and in the 14th year came Chedorlaomer and the kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principal in this enterprise, who was then king of Elam, which is Persia: Now Persia being seated over Tigris, and to the east of Amraphel's country: and the other two kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the west of Shinar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it self, seemeth at this time to have had no great scope or large dominion. For had Amraphel been so great a prince as prophane historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom he succeeded, he should not have needed the assistance of three other kings for this expedition. But tho' Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those four kings (as it is manifest that he was: for these little kings of Sodom, Gomorra, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphel's) yet this makes not the conjecture less probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninias. For it may be, that the great and potent empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall shew more plainly in that which followeth) received a downright fall at the time of this war: tho' not long before it commanded all the kingdoms between India and the Phenician sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

SECT. X.

Of Arioch another of the four kings: and that Ellas, whereof he is said to have been king, lies between Cœlesyria and Arabia Petraea.

NOW the two other kings joined with Amraphel, and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tidal; the one king of Ellassar, the other of the nations. For Ellassar, Aquila and Jerome write Pontus: so Tostatus thinketh that it should be Hellepont: which opinion Pererius favoureth. But this is only to defend the Latin translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellepont far distant, and out of the way to send any armies into Arabia Petraea, or into Idumæa: which countries these four kings chiefly invaded, besides that, it is certain, that the Affyrians (when they were greatest) had never any dominion in Asia the less. For at such time as the Affyrians feared the invasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the less as commanders: but used all the art they had to invite Cræsus to their assistance: persuading him that nothing could be more dangerous for himself, and the other kings of those parts, than the success of the Medes against the Affyrians. But examine the enterprize what it was. ^b These kings (saith the text) made war with Bera, king of Sodom, Birsba king of Gomorrha, Shinab king of Admah, and Shemebar king of Zeboim, and the king of Bela which is Zoar. All which five kings had not so much ground as Middlesex: being such a kind of Reguli, as Joshua found in the land long after: namely, lords of cities and small territories adjoining; of which Canaan had 33 all slain or hanged by Joshua. Neither can the other countries, which in the text they are said also to have invaded, be imagined to have been at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in kings from Pontus or Hellepont, had manifested a great impotence and weakness in the kings of Babylon and Persia.

And tho' it be alledged for an example, that divers kings far off, came to assist Pompey against Cesar: yet these same examples, without like occasions and circumstances, do neither lead nor teach. For there was no cause to fear the greatness of these petty kings, or of the other countries: but the eyes of the world were fixed on Cesar; and his undertakings and intents were to all other princes no less doubtful than fearful: but the whole country by these four kings mastered in their passage, was afterwards given to the half tribe of Manasseh, Gad, and Ruben: a narrow valley of ground lying between Jordan and the mountains of Seir: inclosed by the river of Arnon on the south-side, and by Libanus on the north, consisting of the two small provinces of Traconitis or Basan, and the region of the Moabites: a conquest far unvaluable, and little answering to the power of the Affyrian empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus and Semiramis, who subjected all the great kings of that part of the world, without the assistance of any of the kings of Hellepont, or any other part of Asia the less. But as the Vulgar and Aquila convert Ellassar by Pontus: so Symmachus makes Arioch a king of the Scythians, a king indeed, as far fetched to join with the Affyrians in this war, as the world had any at that time. The Septuagint do not change the word of Ellassar at all, but as they keep the word Ararat, on the mountains whereof the ark did rest, so do they in this place retain the Hebrew word Ellassar, being doubtful to give it a wrong interpretation. And Pererius himself remembreth other opinions far more probable than this of Pontus or Hellepont: yet he dares not avow his liking of them, because the Latin translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Urbibus, a Grecian cosmographer, findeth the city of Ellas in the border of Cælesyria. And St. Jerome calleth Ellas the city of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now altho' the same be seated by Stephanus in Cælesyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was king: who formerly joined with Ninus in all his conquests, being of the same family, and descended from Chim and Cbus: after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrews written Arioch: and afterwards again Aretas: as in the Maccabees: the kings of Arabia holding that name even to the time of St. Paul, who was sought to be betray'd by the lieutenants of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They were princes for the most confederate and depending upon the Affyrian empire. It is true, that we find in Daniel ii. that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arioch was general of his army, and the principal commander under him, who was a king of kings: which makes it plain, that Arioch here spoken of, the son of that Arioch, confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Scythia: regions far removed from the Affyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch who commanded under Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Judith, by the name of King of the Elymeans, who are a nation of Persians bordering Affyria, according to Stephanus; tho' Pliny sets it between the sea-coast, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian kings, or other of that house (known by the name of Arius, Arioch, Areta or Aretas) had the government of that Persian province called Elymais (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the same was in Nabuchodonosor's time. But this Arioch here spoken of, may with more reason be taken for the king of Arabia, the son of Arius, the confederate of Ninus: whose sons held league as their fathers did, being the next bordering prince of all on that side towards the west to Babylonia, and Chaldea: and in amity with them from the beginning, and of their own house, and blood: which D. Siculus also confirmeth.

Of Tidal another of the four kings.

THE fourth king by Abraham overthrown was Tidal, king of the nations. The Hebrew writes it Gojim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mix'd people: Calvin of runnagates without habitation: Pererius out of Strabo, finds that Galilea was inhabited by divers nations, which were a mix'd people: namely of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phenicians. ¹ Nam tales sunt qui Galileam habitant; Such are the inhabitants of Galilee, saith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called king of these nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authority of Strabo is nothing in this question. For Galilea was not peopled at this time as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the land, howsoever they might be afterwards mix'd; which I know not. But there are many petty kingdoms adjoining to Phenicia, and Palesina; as Palmyrena, Batanea, Laodicene, Apamena, Chalcedice, Cassiotis, Chalibonitis, and all these do also join themselves to Mesopotamia on the north, and to Arabia on the east. And that these nations gathered themselves together under Tidal, I take to be the probablest conjecture.

S E C T. XII.

That Chedorlaomer the chief of the four kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian empire at this time was much impaired.

LASTLY, whereas it is conceived that Chedorlaomer was the Affyrian emperor, and that Amraphel was but a satrape, viceroy, or provincial governor of Babylonia, and that the other kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Pererius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur, and Shinar, to call the Affyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the scriptures evermore called by the name of Chaldea, Shi- nam. Babylonia or Affyria : but never by Elam ; and Chedorlaomer or Kedarlaomer was so called of Arior, from Cidarim, which in the Hebrew signifieth regale : for so Q. Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian kings ware on their heads.

Neither do I believe that the Affyrian or Babylonian empire stood in any greatness at the time of this invasion, and my reasons are these : First, Example and experience teach us, that those things which are set up hastily, or forced violently, do not long last : Alexander became lord of all Asia on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to over-look what itself had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetual : for his empire died at once with himself : all whose chief commanders became kings after him. Tamerlane conquered Asia and India with a storm-like and terrible success : but to prevalent fury God hath adjoined a short life : and whatsoever things nature herself worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus being the first whom the madness of boundless dominion transported, invaded his neighbour princes, and became victorious over them : a man violent, insolent and cruel. Semiramis taking the opportunity, and being more proud, adventurous, and ambitious, than her paramour, enlarged the Babylonian empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings unexampled. But her son having changed nature and condition with his mother, proved no less feminine than she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continual smart put the patient in mind how to cure the one, and revenge the other ; so those kings adjoining, (whose subjection and calamities incident were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleep, when the advantage was offered by such a successour. For in Regno Babylonico hic parum resplenduit ; This king shined little (saith Naucerus of Ninias) in the Babylonian kingdom. And likely it is, that the necks of mortal men having been never before galled with the yoke of foreign dominion, nor having ever had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of living in slavery ; no long descent having as yet invested the Affyrian with a right, nor any other title being for him pretended than a strong hand ; the foolish and effeminate son of a tyrannous and hated father, could very ill hold so many great princes and nations his vassals, with a power less mastering, and a mind less industrious than his father and mother had used before him. And he that was so much given over to licentious idleness, as to suffer his mother to reign 42 years, and thereof the greatest part after he came to man's estate, witnessed thereby to the world, that he so much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatness, as he neither endeavoured to gain what he could not govern, nor to keep what he could not without contentious peril enjoy.

These considerations being joined to the story of Amraphel, delivered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel king of Shinar was rather an inferior to the king of Persia, than either his superior or equal, make it seem probable, that the empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained again to Babylonia.

For conclusion I will add these two arguments confirming the former : First, That at such time as it pleased God to impose that great travel upon Abraham, from Ur in Chaldea to Charran, and then to Canaan a passage of 700 miles, or little less, with women, children, and carriages : the countries through which he wandered were then settled, and in peace. For it was in the 23d year of Ninias, when Abraham obeying the voice of God, took this great journey in hand : in which time of 23 years after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour princes had recovered their liberty and former estates. For Semiramis's army of four millions, with herself, utterly consumed in India, and all her arms and engines of war at the same time lost, gave an occasion and opportunity even to the poorest souls, and weakest hearted creatures of the world, to repurchase their former liberty.

Secondly, It is affirmed by the best and ancientest historians, that Arius the son of Ninias, or Amraphel, invaded the Bactrians and Caspians, and again subjected them : which needed not if they had not been revolted from Ninias, after Ninus's death. And as Arioch recovered one part, so did Balcus or Balancus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest revolted to their former obedience. Of whom it is said, that he conquered from Egypt to India : and therefore was called Xerxes, id est, Victor & triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher, which undertakings had been no other than the effects of madness, had not those countries freed themselves from the Babylonian subjection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is, of the conquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which lived after Ninus and Ninias, we may as well think the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but feigned : but if we grant this re-conquest, then is it true, that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Affyrian empire was torn asunder, according to that which hath been gathered out of Moses, as before remembred.

SECT. XIII.

That it is not improbable that the four kings had no dominion in the countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their colonies planted themselves : and so retained the names of the countries whence they came : which if it be so, we need not say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble ourselves with many other difficulties.

THE consent of all writers, whose works have come to my perusal, agreeing as they do, that these four kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and those fellows were lords of those regions, whereunto they are or seem intitled : doth almost enforce us to think, that the history must be so understood, as I have delivered. But if in this place, as often elsewhere in the scriptures, the names of countries may be set for people of those lands, or if (as Jerome hath it) Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the nations, that is, of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry regions : then may we otherwise conceive of this history, removing thereby some difficulties which men perhaps have been unwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolve them. For as it had been a strange conjecture to think that Arioch was drawn to assist the Persian, against the Sodomite ; as far as from Pontus, where it very unlikely that Chedorlaomer was known, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should have been once named : so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbability, that Chedorlaomer, if he were king of Persia alone, should pass thro' so great a part of the world, as the countries of Affyria, Chaldea, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia and Canaan, to subdue those five towns, whose very names how they should come to his ear, being disjoined by so many great nations of different languages, a wise man could hardly conjecture. And if all the countries bordering Persia, together with the Babylonian himself, yea the kingdom of Elaffar, and that of Tidal, so far off removed, were become his dependants, what reason can we find that might have induced him to hearken after Sodom and Gomorrha? and when he should have sought the establishment of his new-gotten empire, by rooting out the posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) than to employ the forces of Amraphel, and those other kings, against five petty towns, leaving Tyrus and Sidon, and the great city of Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and far nearer unto him, unsubdued? Now as these doubts which may be alledged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the objections to be made against his re-conquest of these five cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea and more, as being grounded partly upon the text it self. For first, what madness had it been in that small province, to rebel against so powerful a monarch? Or if it were so, that they dwelling far from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, than that he should come or send to reclaim them: was it not more than madness in them, when his terrible army approached, still to entertain hope of evasion: yea, to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute, and therefore unwarlike people) against the power of all the nations between Euphrates, yea between themselves and the river of Indus? Likewise on the part of Chedorlaomer we should find no great wisdom, if he knowing the weakness of this people, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any lieutenant, with small forces, he might have subdued. For the perpetual inheritance of that little country was not sufficient to countervail one month's charges of so huge an army. How small then must his valour have been, who with so mighty preparations effected no more than the walling of that valley, wherein he left the cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the country, altho' he had broken their army in the field? Now the scriptures do not make any fearful matter of this invasion, tho' supposed to be so great: but compose the two armies as equally match'd, saying they were four kings against five; yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall find in Genesis xiv. 17. that Abraham slew all these kings, of which great slaughter no history makes mention: neither will the reign of Ninas, who lived four or five years longer, permit that he should have died so soon; neither would histories have forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appears, that these four kings were not the same that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that these kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title, lords and commanders every one of his own company, which he carried forth as a colony, seeking place where to settle himself and them, as was the usual manner of those times.

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troop of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might consort together, and make the weakest of the country which lay about them to pay them tribute. Whosoever will consider the beginning of the first book of Thucydides, with the manner of discoveries, conquests and plantations, in the infancy of Greece, or the manner of the Saracens invading Africa and Spain, with almost as many kings as several armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoveries, passages and conquests in the West-Indies: may easily perceive, that it was neither unusual for the leaders of colonies to receive title from the people whom they conducted: nor to make alliances together, and break them again, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of commanders, it may seem the more likely, by the slothful quality of Ninias then reigning in Assyria; whose unmanlike temper was such, as might well give occasion to such undertaking spirits, as wanted the employments whereunto they were accustomed, in the reign of Semiramis, rather to seek adventures abroad, than to remain at home unregarded; whilst others more unworthy than themselves, were advanced. If the consent of the whole stream of writers upon this place make this conjecture disagreeable to the text, to the authority whereof all human reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selves to the former conjecture, that Amraphel was Ninias: and that the power of his ancestors being by his sloth decayed, he might well be inferior to the Persian Chedorlaomer: or if this do not satisfy, we may say that Amraphel was an under-king or satrape of Shinar, under Ninias; who may be supposed to have had his imperial seat in his father's city Nineveh: and to have preferred it before Shinar and Babylon the city of his mother, whom he hated as an usurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any man's salvation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great pains, all might err: then can I think that the opinion, that these four kings were leaders of colonies, sent out of the countries named in the text, and not kings of the countries themselves, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the scripture. And hereto add that Chedorlaomer seems rather called a Persian king, than king of Persia: and that Arioch (whose kingdom undoubtedly was between Syria and Arabia) having been a man of action, or being a worthy man's son, was very well pleased to give passage and assistance to these captains or petty kings. These and such like things here to urge, were but with circumstances to adorn a supposition, which either may stand without them, or, if it must fall, is unworthy to have cost bestowed upon it: especially considering, that it is not my intent to employ any more time in making it good, but to leave it wholly to the reader's pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he shall find any that shall seem better than these. But of what countries or people soever these four were kings, this expedition is the only publick action that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his story, and of his sons, and of his nephews Esau and Jacob, as they are registred by Moses, because it is not our purpose, neither to stand upon things generally known to all christians, nor to repeat what hath been elsewhere already spoken, nor to prevent our selves in things that may hereafter in due place be remembered, we pass them here in silence. And because in this story of Abraham and his posterity, there is much mention of Egypt: by which it appears that even in the time of Abraham it was a settled and flourishing kingdom, it will not be amiss in the next place to speak somewhat of the antiquities, and first kings thereof.

C H A P. II.

Of the kings of Egypt from the first peopling of it after the flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

S E C T. I.

A brief of the names and times of the first kings of Egypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

SOON after the confusion at Babel, as it seems, Cham, with many of his issue and followers (having doubtless known the fertility of Egypt before the flood) came thither and took possession of the country: in which they built many cities, and began the kingdom one hundred and ninety one years after the deluge. The ancient governors of this kingdom till such time as Israel departed Egypt, are shewn in the table following.

An. Mundi.	An. Dil.
1847	191	Cham.
2008	352	Osiris.
2269	613	Typhon, } Hercules. }
2276	620	Orus.
2391	735	Sesostris the Great.
2424	768	Sesostris the Blind.
2438	782	Busiris or Orus the second.
2476	820	Acenchere or Thermutis or Meris.
2488	832	Rathoris or Athoris.
2497	841	Chencres drowned in the Red sea.

The table, and especially the chronology, is to be confirmed by probabilities and conjectures, because in such obscurity manifest and resistless truth cannot be found. For St. Augustine, a man of exceeding great judgment, and incomparable diligence, who had sought into all antiquities, and had read the books of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Egyptian kings; which he would not have done, if they had not been more uncertain than the Sicyonians, whom he remembreth, than whom doubtless they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscurity in the Egyptian story, was the ambition of the priests: who, to magnify their antiquities, filled the records, which were in their hands, with many fables: and recounted unto strangers the names of many kings that never reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed kings, it shall appear anon. Sure it is, that the magnificent works and royal buildings in Egypt, such as are never found but in states that have greatly flourished, witness that their princes were of marvellous greatness: and that the reports of the priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Egyptian history, was the too much credulity of some good authors, who believing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Egyptians, and publishing in their own name, such as pleased them best; have confirmed them, and as it were enforced them upon us, by their authority. A third and general cause of more than Egyptian darkness in all ancient histories, is the edition of many authors by John Annii, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very learned I may add mine) I think thus: that Annius having seen some fragments of those writers, and added unto them what he would, may be credited, as an avoucher of true histories; where approved writers confirm him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it cometh to pass that the account of authors, either in the chronology or genealogy of the Egyptian kings, runs three altogether different ways. The Christian writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Eusebius: many late writers follow the edition of Annius's authors: the profane histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Cham's reign in Egypt began in the year after the flood 191.

TO reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient kings, about whom is most controversy, the best mean is by help of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties, besides the authority of approved authors, hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether, with the histories of the Assyrians, Trojans, Italians, and others, &c. The beginning of the 16th Dynasty is joined by general consent with the 43d year of Ninus, in which Abraham was born. The twelve first Dynasties lasted each of them seven years, under the twelve, which were called the greater gods: so that all the years of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynasty endured fourteen years; the fourteenth, twenty-six; the fifteenth, thirty-seven. These three last are said to have been under the three younger gods. So the fifteen first Dynasties lasted 161 years. As I do not therefore believe that the continuance of these Dynasties was such as hath been mentioned, because Annius in such wise limits out their time; so I cannot reject the account upon this only reason, that Annius hath it so; considering that both hitherto it hath passed as current, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty, in the year of Abraham's birth, as aforesaid: the reckoning is easily cast; by which the sum of 161 years, which according to our account were spent in the fifteen former, being subducted out of the sum of 352 years, which were between the flood and Abraham's birth, shew that the beginning of the first dynasty, which was the beginning of Cham's reign in Egypt, was in the year 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appear. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankind which came into Shinar, arrived at Babel, Anno a diluvio 131. In building the tower were consumed forty years, as Glycas recordeth; whose report I have elsewhere confirmed with divers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their wives, children, cattle, and substance, thro' all Syria then desolate, and full of bogs, forests and briars (which the deluge and want of culture in one hundred and seventy one years had brought upon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himself in Egypt, we allow 20 years: and these sums being added together, to wit one hundred thirty-one years after the flood, before they arrived at Babel, 40 years for their stay there, and 20 for Cham's passage into Egypt and settling there, make up the sum of one hundred and ninety one years: at which time we said that Cham began his reign in Egypt, in the beginning of the first Dynasty. And to this sum of 191 years, if we add the 161 years of the 15 first Dynasties, nafties, as they are numbred in common account; we shall fall right with the year of Abraham's birth, which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto, omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to prove that these first Dynasties must needs have been very short, and not containing in the whole sum of their several times above 161 years: let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Egypt have been peopled as soon as Babel after the flood: or the Dynasties (as Mercator thinks) must have been before the flood. That the arrival at Babel was many years before the plantation of Egypt, after the flood, enough hath been said to prove: and that the Dynasties were not before the flood, the number of the long-liv'd generations between Adam and the flood, which was less than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witness. Or if we will think, that one life might (perhaps) be divided into many Dynasties, then may this have been as well after the flood, as before: considering that the sons of Noah did not in every country erect such form of policy, as had been used in the same ere the deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authority and power of the conductor, together with many other circumstances, did induce or inforce them to.

SECT. III.

That these Dynasties were not divers families of kings, but rather successions of regents, oft-times many under one king.

THE short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not several races of kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to stile them. What they were it cannot certainly be warranted. For in restitutions of decay'd antiquities, it is more easy to deny than to affirm. But this may be said, partly upon good circumstance, partly upon the surest proof, that it was the manner of the Egyptian kings, to put the government of the country into the hands of some trusty counsellor, only reserving the sovereignty to themselves, as the old kings of France were wont to the masters of the palace, and as the Turk doth to the chief visier. This is confirmed first, by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are under Cham, and more than one under Osiris or Mizraim; and must therefore have been successions, not of kings, but rather of counsellors and regents. Secondly, by custom of such princes borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the scriptures: of whom Abimilech the Philistine, in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol, captain of his host; tho' in taking Abraham's wife, and in his private carriage, he followed his own pleasure. Likewise of Abimilech the son of Gideon, it was said: Is not he the son of Jerubbal? and Zebulis his officer? also Ishbosheth the son of Saul, feared Abner the captain of the host. Yea, David himself hating Joab for his cruelty, did not punish him, in regard of his greatness, which was such, as was feared even of Hadad the Edomite living then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the scriptures: therefore likely both for his own idleness and pleasure, to have laid the burthen of government upon others; and upon jealousy, the companion of unworthiness, to have changed his lieutenants often. Above all other proofs is the advancement of Joseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Joseph; Only in the king's throne will I be above thee: behold I have set thee over all the land of Egypt. ^a William, archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred eighty, affirms that the like or very same form of government by viceroys, was in his time practised in Egypt, having there been in use (as he believed) ever since the time of Joseph. He plainly shews, that the foldans of Egypt were not lords of the country, however they have been so deemed: but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the duty of subjects unto the Caliph: who residing in a most magnificent palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not only of civil government, but the power of making war and peace, with the whole office and authority royal into the foldan's hands. He that shall read in ^b William of Tyre, the state of the caliph, or Mulene Elbadach, with the form of his court, shall plainly behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a lieutenant, as great in authority as Joseph was, tho' far inferiour in wisdom.

To think that many names of such regents or lieutenants as Joseph was, have crept into the list of the Egyptian kings, were no strange imagination, For Joseph's brethren called him, The man that is lord of the land, and the lord of the country: besides, it is not unlikely that the vain-glorious Egyptian priests would as easily report him a king to posterity, as ignorant men and strangers deem him such, under whose hand all dispatches of importance, and royal managing of the state had pass'd, whilst that the king himself intending his quiet, had given his office to another. How strangers have mistaken in this kind, the example already cited of Joseph's brethren, doth sufficiently witness. The reports of priests do appear in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authority, say; Diodorus, that Sesostris was the 19th king after Menas; Herodotus, that he was the 332d after Menas: which could not have been if Menas had been Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, that the Dynasties were not so many races of kings, but successions of regents, appointed by the kings of so many sundry lineages or sorts of men. Now by whatsoever means a Dynasty or regency continued: whether in one family, as being made an hereditary office: or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is that it was the king's gift, and free choice, that gave the office. But the crown royal always passed by descent, and not by election: which (beside consent of authors) the scriptures also prove. For whereas Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh, if the crown had passed by election, then should Pharaoh's children hereby either have been intralled amongst the rest of the people, to the next successor: or enjoying their father's land, tho' not his estate, have been more mighty than the king: as landlords of all Egypt, and the king himself their tenant. Likewise we find in Exod. xii. that God smote the first-born of Pharaoh, that was to sit on his throne: and in Isaiah it is said of Pharaoh, ^d I am the son of the ancient king.

SECT. IV.

Of Cham, and his son Mizraim, or Osiris.

THAT the succession of kings began, and continued in such wise as the table hath shewed from Cham to Chencres, now it followeth to shew. Egypt is called in the scripture, ^e the land of Ham. That this name is not given to it because the posterity of Cham did reign there, but for that himself did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances. For I think it is no-where found, that the countries of Cush, Put, or Canaan, as well as ^a William Tyr. de bell. sacro, l. 19. c. 17, 18, 19, & 20. ^b Lib. 19, 20. ^c Gen. 42. 30, & 33. ^d Isa. 19. ^e Psal. 78. 51. 105. 23, 27. 106. 22.

Egypt, were called the land of Ham. Further it is found in ^a Diodorus Siculus, that Osiris calleth himself the eldest son of Cham, saying; Mibi pater Saturnus deorum omnium junior: also, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoso ortum: which must needs be understood of Cham: for this Saturnus Egyptius was Cham: as it was said, that on the monument of Ninus was an inscription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Aegyptius. Likewise the temple of Hammon not far from Egypt doth testify, that Ham resided in those parts: and St. Jerome in Quæstionibus Hebraicis, saith, that the Egyptians themselves did in his days call their country Ham: as in four several places in the Psalms this country is called the land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plutarch in Osiride, that in the sacrifices of the Egyptians this country of Egypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia: ut puto (saith he) a Chamo Noes filio, to which also he addeth out of Isidore, Aegyptum usque hodie Aegyptiorum lingua Kam vocari: That Egypt unto this day in the tongue of the Egyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Cham's reign, the same reasons may suffice to be alledged, which I have already given in proof of the time spent in the 15 first Dynasties: neither is it strange that the reign of Cham, should last so long as 161 years: considering that Sem lived 600. Arphachshad and Shelah each above 400. But strange it had been, if one Saltis created by Manetho, had in those long-lived generations reigned there 19 years, and with Bæon, Apachnas, Apochis, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glory of Osiris, Orus and Sesostris. Reineccius, in hisor. Julia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwise called Osiris according to Diodorus: who saith he was the son of Hammon: Krentzhemius saith that Mizraim and Osiris are words of near affinity and found in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoever it be, we know that Mizraim the son of Cham, was lord of Egypt, and Reineccius citing good authority in this case, affirmeth that Egypt is now called by the naturals in their own language Mezre. Neither do I see cause of doubt whether Osiris were the same with Mizraim. It is more necessary, and hard to shew manifestly, how long Mizraim or Osiris reigned. For whereas the year of his death is no-where precisely set down, we must be fain to follow probabilities. That he is not vainly said by Annus's Berosus to have begun his reign at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynasty of the Thebei began, it appeareth, first, by the authority of Eusebius, who avoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who saith that he inhabited Thebes: which habitation of Osiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynasty, I can well believe: assenting so far to Reineccius, who thinks the Dynasties were named only, according to the several seats of the kings.

SECT. V.

Of the time when Osiris's reign ended: and that Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the son of Osiris.

THE death of Osiris, when it was, none can certainly affirm. The only conjecture that I know, is made thus. Lebabin the son of Mizraim, called Hercules Libyus, made war in Italy, to revenge his father's death, on the associates of Typhon, in the 41st year of Baleus king of Assyria: before which year he had made many great wars in Egypt, Phenicia, Phrygia, Crete, Libya, and Spain: and having ended his Egyptian wars, left the kingdom to Orus. Thus far Berosus, or authors following Berosus. That Orus last of all the gods (as they were stiled) held the kingdom of Isis, ^b Diodorus Siculus plainly saith: and Plutarch as much; to which all histories agree. Krentzhemius hereupon infers, that six years may be allowed to the wars, which Hercules made in so many countries, after the Egyptian wars were ended: so should the death of Osiris have been the 34th of Baleus: when himself had reigned 297 years. I think that Krentzhemius was a greater scholar than soldier. For surely in those days when commerce was not such as now, but all navigation made by coasting, a far longer time would have been required to the subduing of so many countries. An allowance of more time, tho' it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent: which was (doubtless) to find the truth. If according to his account the death of Osiris had been the 34th of Baleus, then must Israel have come into Egypt but seven years before the death of Osiris: and have lived there in the reign of Typhon. A thing not easily believed. For it was the same king who advanced Joseph, bad him send for his father, and gave him leave to go into Canaan, to the performance of his father's funeral: as may easily be gathered out of the book of Genesis. Whereas therefore the reign of Osiris, cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the 7th year of Israel's coming into Egypt: we must needs cut off 23 years from that number, which Krentzhemius conjectured his reign to have continued: namely, seven which he should have lived after Jacob's coming into Egypt: nine in which Joseph had there flourished, ere his father's coming: and other seven in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Osiris, yet before Joseph's advancement.

Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules Libyus's wars. For the war which Hercules made in Italy, is said to have indured 10 years: after which proportion we may well give not only six years, as Krentzhemius doth, but 23 more to so many wars in so many and so far distant countries, as are named before: yea, by this proportion we may attribute unto Orus the 13 years, which passed between the time of Joseph's being sold into Egypt, unto his advancement: considering that Putiphar who bought him, and whose daughter he may seem to have married, continued all that while chief steward unto Pharaoh: a thing not likely to have been, if so violent alterations had happened the whilst in Egypt, as the tyrannous usurpation of Typhon must needs have brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old author, I should confidently say, that Putiphar, for his faithfulness to Orus, the son of Osiris, was by him in the beginning of his reign made his chief steward: at which time buying Joseph, and finding him a just man, and one under whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Joseph's hands, than unto any of his Egyptian followers (many of whom he had found either false-hearted, or weak and unlucky in the troublesome days of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this. Perhaps I might proceed further, and say, that when the saying of Joseph pleased Pharaoh, and all his servants: then Putiphar priest of On, being chief officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Joseph, the ancient graces of God, and his injurious imprisonment: whereupon he gave him his daughter to wife: and being old resigned his office of chief steward unto him: who afterwards in regard of Putiphar, did favour the priests, when he bought the lands of all other Egyptians. This might appear to some a tale not unlike to the frierly book of Asenath, Putiphar's daughter: but unto such as consider that God works usually by means: and that Putiphar was the steward of that king, under whom Jacob died: it would seem a matter not improbable, had it an author of sufficient credit to avouch it. Concerning the wars of Hercules, in which by this reckoning he should have spent 42 years after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italy, it is a circumstance which (the length of his Italian wars considered, and his former enterprises and atchievements proportioned to them) doth not make against us, but for us: or if it were against us, yet could it not so weaken our supposition, as these probabilities collected out of the undisputable truth of scripture do confirm it. Nevertheless I freely grant that all these proofs are no other, than such as may be gathered out of authors, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscurity, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy text.

SECT. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Ægyptus, Orus, and the two Sesostris, successively reigning after Misraim: and of divers errors about the former Sesostris.

Concerning the reign of Typhon, and of Hercules, I find none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giveth three years to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is so peremptory without proof, as if his own word were sufficient authority, in many points very questionable; alledging no witness, but as it were saying Tesse meipso: yet herein we may think him to speak probably, forasmuch as the learned Krentzheimius affirmeth, that Hercules did very soon undertake his father's revenge, and was not long in performing it: and that leaving Egypt to his brother, he followed other wars, in the same quarrel, as hath been shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzheimius doth) out of Berosus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon: yet seeing Aventinus, a follower of Berosus, hath it so, I will also believe it. That in the reign of Typhon and Hercules, seven years were spent, howsoever divided between them, I gather out of Krentzheimius only, who placeth the beginning of Orus 7 years after the death of Osiris: forgetting to set down his reasons, which, in a matter so probable, I think he wanted not. Now whereas he alloweth 90 years of the 18th Dynasty to Osiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus: it seems that the reign of Orus lasted 115 years. From the death of Orus to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, there passed 122 years by our account: who (according to Beroaldus, and others) think that Abraham was born in the 130th year of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus. From the end of the flood to the birth of Abraham.

From that time to the	vocation of Abraham 75 departure out of Egypt 430

which sum divers other ways may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt, there do remain (as is aforesaid) only 122 years from the death of Orus: we are now to consider how many of them are to be allowed unto Sesostris or Sesonchosis, who is placed next unto Orus, by authority of the Scholiastes Apollonii; not without good probability. For this great king or conqueror, is by many histories recorded to have over-run a great part of Asia: to have built a fleet of ships on the Red sea; and so to have entered into India: likewise with another fleet on the middle-earth seas, to have passed into Europe, and subdued many nations.

This is he (as Reineccius judgeth) whom Justin erring in account of his time, calleth Vexoris: for Justin placeth Vexoris in ages before Ninus: whereby it would follow that Sesostris, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient than was Osiris (otherwise Mizraim) a thing altogether unlikely. Certain it is, that after the departure of Israel out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Asia) till the father-in-law of Solomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, took Gerar, and gave it to his daughter (as we may read more at large in the holy history of the bible) after which time Sesac oppressed Rehoboam, and Necho sought passage thro' the land of Israel, when he made his expedition against the Chaldeans. Of king Vaphres and Necho it is out of question, that neither of them was the great king Sesostris. Of Sesac it is doubted by some, forasmuch as he came into Judea, with a great army. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaveth it undecided; unless it be sufficient proof of his own opinion, that he himself placeth Sesostris next to Orus; following the Scholiastes Apollonii. But further answer may be made to shew that they were not one. For as Justin witnesseth, Sesostris, otherwise Vexoris, made war on people far removed, abstaining from his neighbours. Sesac came up purposely against Jerusalem. Sesostris, as Diodorus witnesseth, had but 24000 horse: Sesac had 60000: Sesostris had 8020 chariots, Sesac but 1200. Sesostris made his expedition for no private purpose, but to get a great name: Sesac, as most agree, had no other purpose than to succour Jeroboam, and give him countenance in his new reign, whom he had favoured even against Solomon: therefore Sesostris must needs have reigned whilst Israel abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzheimius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menis, was next to Orus: because those historians affirm that he reigned next after the gods; it moveth me nothing. For Osiris did succeed those 15 gods, namely, the 12 greater and 3 lesser: himself also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menas. Which name, as also Minæus, and Menis, were titles of dignity: tho' mistaken by some as proper names. Krentzheimius doth very probably gather, that Menas was Mercurius Ter-maximus: the Hebrew word Meni signifying an arithmetician: which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Osiris: who was a great conqueror, philosopher, and benefactor to mankind, by giving good laws, and teaching profitable arts. In prowess and great undertakings Sesostris was no whit inferiour to Osiris. For he sought victory not for gain, but for honour only: and being well contented, that many nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselves to his will and royal disposition, leaving them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soon upon his return he was endangered by a great treason, the house, in which he was, being by his own brother purposely fired: which nevertheless he is said to have escaped, and to have reigned in all thirty-three years: after which time he chose rather to die than to live: because he fell blind. Both Herodotus and Diodorus affirm, that Sesostris left a son, whose name was Pheron or Pheronios; who afterwards took the name of Sesostris: but was nothing like to his father in glory: for he shortly fell blind. The cause of his blindness Herodotus attributes to his assaulting the river Nilus with a javelin: which tale Diodorus having likewise heard, yet reports as a fable, saying, that perhaps he took the disease naturally from his father. How long this man reigned it is no where expressed.

led: yet forasmuch 'as Orus the second (otherwise Busiris) who succeeded him, began 14 years after that this Sesostris had been king, it must needs be that this reigned 14 years at least. That Busiris began not until these 14 years at least were expired, the very account of time from the first of Busiris, to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, plainly shews, being almost generally agreed upon, to have been 75 years. That none came between Sesostris the second, and Busiris or Orus the second, it stands only upon probabilities: which are these. After Sesostris had reigned somewhile, he fell blind: after certain years he recovered his sight, as is said: which may have been true, but is more like to have been a fable: surely the manner of his recovery, as it is set down, is very fabulous: namely, that by looking upon a woman, or washing his eyes with her water, who had only known her own husband, he got his sight again. As the time of his reign, before his blindness, and when he was well again (if ever he were) may have taken up a good part of 14 years: so his works, which were great, do much more strongly argue, that his reign was not very short. His works, are largely set down by Herodotus and Diodorus: a part of which may seem to have been the finishing of that which his father had begun, about the channels and sluices of Nilus: whom I think he rather frightened (as his father had done) with spades and shovels, than with darts and javelins: and by his diligent oversight of that work, was like enough to lose both his eye-sight and his people's love: whom his father had very busily employ'd in excessive labour about it.

SECT. VII.

Of Busiris the first oppressor of the Israelites: and of his successor queen Thermutis that took up Moses out of the water.

AND herein (if I may presume to conjecture) Busiris, who was afterwards king, is like to have dealt with him, as Jeroboam did with the son of Solomon. For that Busiris himself was much addicted to magnificent works, it well appeared, by the drudgery wherewith he wearied the children of Israel in his buildings: if therefore he were employ'd by the great Sesostris, as Jeroboam was by Solomon, in the oversight of those businesses, he had good opportunity to work his greatness with the king by industry: and afterwards with the people by incensing them against their new king: as Jeroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one prince's hands, they will not at another's: unless he have either an equal spirit, or a surer foundation. If moreover he sought to derive all the pain and labour of publick works from the Egyptians, to the Israelites: he surely did that which to his own people was very plausible, who (as appears in Exodus i.) were nothing slack in fulfilling the king's cruelty. Now that Orus the 2d, or Busiris, was the king that first oppressed Israel, and made the edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted 10 months: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned writers, who also think that hereupon grew the fable of Busiris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exod. i. that the king, who knew not Joseph, was a king of a new family. That Busiris was of a new family, Reinecius doth shew: who also thinks him author of the bloody edict. Nevertheless true it is, that Busiris, according to all mens computation, began his reign 5 years after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the law was made, and much more that the persecution began: which Bunting thinks to have lasted 87 years, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let us therefore consider, besides the blindness of Sesostris the second, how great the power of the regents or viceroys in Egypt was: and how great confidence the kings did put in them: seeing Joseph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Egypt, and all the Egyptians for bread; giving at the same time the best of the land to his own father and brethren, for nothing: seeing also that when the Egyptians cried out upon Pharaoh for bread, Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Joseph: what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger born, lately fetch'd out of prison, a king well able to have governed himself, would give such trust, and sovereign authority: it is not unlikely that a blind prince should do it to a man of especial reputation. For God often prospers, not only the good (such as Joseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore perhaps the king did (as many have done) resign his kingdom to him, tho' his reign was not accounted to have begun, till the death of Sesostris. But whether Busiris did usurp the kingdom, or protection of the land by violence: or whether the blind king resigned it, keeping the title: or whether Busiris were only regent, whilst the king liv'd, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himself: it might well be said that Pharaoh's daughter took up Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel: seeing he both at that time was king in effect, and shortly after king in deed and title both. It were not absurd for us to say, that the blind king Sesostris the 2d oppress'd Israel: but forasmuch as it may seem that the wicked tyrant shewed his evil nature even when he first arose, I think it more likely, that Busiris did it, using at first the power of a king, and shortly after the title. Thus of the 122 years which passed between the beginning of Sesostris's reign, and the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47 being spent: the 75 which remain, are to be accounted to Busiris or Orus the 2d, and his children. Busiris himself reigned 30 years, according to Eusebius: whom very many judicious authors herein approve. After him his daughter, who took Moses out of the water, is said, by all that I have read, to have reigned 12 years: her name was Thermutis Phareis, or Mutbis, according to Cedrenus: Eusebius calls her Acencris: and out of Artabanus's history, Meris: Josephus calls her both Acenchere and Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario saith, that she was honoured afterwards of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis, the daughter of Amenoph, the son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made, and much spoken: for the scriptures call her not Pharaoh's son's daughter, but Pharaoh's daughter. Amenophis indeed is placed next before Busiris, or Orus the second, by Eusebius, and others: but whether he were a king, or only a regent, I cannot conjecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the ancient historians name the son of Sesostris, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis: and his daughter by the Egyptians called rather the niece or grandchild, than the daughter of Pharaoh, because of the glory of Sesostris, and the disreputation of his son. If so, and if that Busiris or Orus the 2d marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our conjecture strengthened, and then was she both daughter, grandchild, and wife unto Pharaoh: and surviving him, queen of the land, twelve years. But if she were daughter of Orus the second, and sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many think, to whose conjecture I will

will not oppose mine, then may it seem, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her father died.

SECT. VIII.

Of the two brethren of queen Thermutis: and what king it was, under whom Moses was born: and who it was that perished in the Red sea.

SHE had two brethren: the one was Rathoris, or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is only named by Eusebius: but his lineage and off-spring described by Reineccius. Rathoris, after his sister's death, reigned nine years: after whom Chencres, thought to be his son, reigned ten, and then perished in the Red sea. During the reign of Chencres, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus upon Io: of which history elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Chencres (whom some call Acencheres: but all or most do stile θεῖμαχος a fighter against God) Acherres reigned eight years: and then Cherres fifteen. This descent seems from father to son. In the eleventh year of Cherres it is said by Eusebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Egypt built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not unlikely, viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid upon it, and the destruction of her king and army in the Red sea: else could it not have had two reigning in it at once; the latter of whom, or his posterity, seems to have taken all from Cherres the grandchild of Chencres. For whereas Armais is said to have reigned four years after Cherres, and Armesis one after Armais, these two kings are by Eusebius and others accounted as one, and his reign said to have been five years. His name is called Armeus, otherwise Danaus; and his pedigree thus described by Reineccius in Historia Julia.

Telegonus.

Epaphus.

Libya, who had

Agenor, Belus and Busiris.

Egyptus or Rameffes, who gave name to the country, having expelled his brother Danaus, reigned, and begat Lynceus, married to Hypermetra.

Danaus or Armeus, expelled by his brother Egyptus, after he had reigned five years, became king of Argos in Greece: was father to Hypermetra.

How it might come to pass that the nephews sons of Epaphus should have occupied the kingdom after Cherres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himself is reported by Eusebius to have been born in the time of Chencres. But soasmuch as the history of Epaphus's birth, is diversly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Danaus and Egyptus, otherwise called Armeus and Rameffes, was equally distant from Busiris or Orus the second, with Cherres the grandchild of Chencres. And that the posterity of Telegonus did marry very young, it appears by the history of these two brethren, Danaus and Egyptus: of whom the former had 50 daughters, the latter 50 sons: perhaps, or rather questionless, by divers women: yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: howsoever it were, the general consent of writers is, that Armeus or Danaus did succeed Cherres: and, according to Eusebius and good authors approving him, reigned five years. Rameffes followed, who reigned sixty-eight years. This Rameffes or Egyptus is that Armesefmiamum or Armesefmiamus, under whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that follows Mercator, Moses was born; and the cruel edict made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reign seems to me the chief, if not the only ground of Mercator's opinion. For whereas the Lord said to Moses, Go, return to Egypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Exod. iv. 19. Mercator hereupon conceives, that it was one and the same king under whom Moses was born, and under whom he slew the Egyptian at the 40th year of his age; and fled into the wilderness, and there abode for fear: all which circumstances could agree with none but this Rameffes who reigned so long: wherefore desirous rather to hold a true paradox, than a common error, he placeth one Alisfragmuthosis (whose name is found in the list of Egyptian kings, but the time uncertain wherein he reigned) in an age 112 or 113 years more ancient than others left him in: and so continuing the catalogue of his successors from Themosis (whom Eusebius calls Amasis) downwards with no other variation of the length of each man's reign, than is the difference between Manetho and Eusebius, he finds Moses born under Armesefmiamum, and Israel delivered in the days of his son Amenophis. The very name of Alisfragmuthosis seems to him with little alteration to sound like Pharatares, of which name one was thought to have flourished either as a king, or a wise man, about the time of Isaac. For, saith he, from Alisfragmuthosis to Phragmuthosis, Pharmuthosis or Pharatares, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and industry: and one to whom the world is bound for his many notable works; yet my assent herein is withheld from him, by these reasons. First, I see all other writers agree, that Chencres was the king who was drowned in the Red sea. Secondly, The place, Exod. iv. all are dead, &c. may better be understood of Busiris and all his children, than of one king alone. Thirdly, St. Cyril, in his first book against Julian the apostate, saith, that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120 years old, Rameffes, which was this Armesefmiamum, being then king of Egypt. After Rameffes, Amenophis reigned nineteen years, who is thought by Mercator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the king that perished in the Red sea: of which our opinion being already laid open, I think it most expedient to refer the kings ensuing to their own times (which a chronological table shall lay open) and here to speak of that great deliverance of Israel out of Egypt: which, for many great considerations depending thereupon, we may not lightly overpass.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

SECT. I.

Of the time of Moses's birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

TRUE it is that the history it self is generally and well known; yet concerning the time of Moses's birth, who was the excellent and famous instrument of this and other great works of the Highest, the different opinions are very near as many, as the men that have written of that argument.

Lud.

Lud. Vives, in his annotations upon St. Augustine, citeth very many of their conjectures: as that of Porphyry out of Sanchoniato, that Moses lived in the time of Semiramis: but if he did mean the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for besides that the same is contrary to all stories divine and human; while that Semiramis lived, she commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof absolutely: neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while she ruled, in rerum natura.

A second opinion he remembreth of Appion, taken from Ptolemy a priest of the Mendes, who saith that Moses was born while Inachus did rule the Argives, and Ameſis in Egypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greek history, the first book: that Moses was born while Apis the third king ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Assyrius, who, tho' he cites some authorities that Moses lived after the Trojan war, is himself of opinion, that Moses was far more ancient, proving it by many arguments.

Fifthly, He setteth down the testimony of Numenius the philosopher, who took Museus and Moses to be one: confirming the same out of Artapanus, who confesseth that Moses was called Museus, by the Grecians; and who farther delivereth, that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Egypt: the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothes. Eusebius also affirmeth, that Eupolemus in his first book De bono, Moses vir Deo conjunctissimus is called Museus Judeorum. Eusebius, in his chronology, finds that Moses was born while Amenophis ruled Egypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharaoh, which lived at Moses's birth, Thumosis or Thmosis: the same perchance which Appion the grammarian will have to be Amosis, and elsewhere Amenophis the father of Sethosis: to whom Lyſimachus and Cornelius Tacitus gave the name of Bocchoris. To me it seems most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Spherus or Iphorius, governed Aſſyria; Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Criafus the Argives; that then (Sesoſtris the second ruling in Egypt) Moses was born. For if we believe St. Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops's time, that Moses led Israel out of Egypt: ^b Eduxit Moses ex Egypto populum Dei novissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensium regis: Moses, saith he, led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrops's time, king of the Athenians. In this sort therefore, is the time of Moses's birth, and of his departure out of Egypt best proved. St. Augustine affirms (as before remembred) that Moses was born, : Saphrus governing Aſſyria: and that he left Egypt about the end of Cecrops's time. Now Saphrus ruled twenty years; his successor Mamelus thirty years; Sparetus after him forty years: in whose fourth year Cecrops began to govern in Attica: Aſcatades followed Sparetus, and held the empire forty-one: So as Moses being born while Saphrus ruled Aſſyria; Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Criafus, Argos (for these three kings lived at once at his birth, saith St. Augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Egypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth year of the Aſſyrian Saphrus: for take one year remaining of twenty (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which add the thirty years of Mamelus, and the forty years of Sparetus, these make seventy-one, with which there were wasted three years of Cecrops's fifty years; then take nine years out of the reign of Aſcatades, who was Sparetus's successor, those nine years added to seventy-one make eighty, at which age Moses left Egypt: and add these nine years to the three years of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remain but four years of Cecrops's fifty: and so it falleth right with St. Augustine's words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops's time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Egypt.

Now the time, in which the Hebrews were oppress'd in Egypt, seemeth to have had beginning some eight or nine years before the birth of Moses, and fifty-four years, or rather more, after Joseph; between whose death and the birth of Moses there were consumed sixty-four years: some of which time, and eighty years after, they lived in great servitude and misery. For as it is written in Exodus i. They set task-masters over them, to keep them under with burdens; and they built the cities, Pithom and Ramases, &c. And by cruelty they caused the children of Israel to serve; and made them weary of their lives, by sore labour in clay and brick, and in all work of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which, laid upon them by a mastering power and a strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisdom of God appointed: even from fifty-four years, or not much more after the death of Joseph, who left the world when it had lasted 2370 years, to the eightieth year of Moses, and until he wrought his miracles in the field of Zoan, which he performed in the world's age 2514 towards the end thereof, according to Codoman, or after our account 2513. And because those things which we deliver of Egypt, may the better be understood, I think it necessary to speak a few words of the principal places therein named, in this discourse.

SECT. II.

Of divers cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this story, or elsewhere in the scripture.

THIS city which the Hebrews call Zoan, was built seven years after Hebron. Ezekiel calleth it Taphnes; and so doth Jeremy; the Septuagint, Tanis; Josephus, Protaidis, after the name of an Egyptian queen; Antonius gives it the name of Thanis; Hegeſippus, Thamna; and William Tyrius, Tapius. It adjoineth to the land of Gosen, and is the same wherein Jeremy the prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Egyptian and Jewish idolatry.

Zoan or Taphnes was in Moses's time the metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not unlikely to be the same city where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Artapanus affirmeth, that Abraham did read astronomy in Heliopolis, or On, to Pharates king of Egypt. Alexander Polyhistor out of Eupolemus, hath it otherwise, saying, that Abraham instructed the Egyptian priests, and not the king; both which authorities Eusebius citeth. The Septuagint and the Vulgar edition, for Zoan write Heliopolis; Pagninus, Vatablus, Junius, and our English, call it On; and Ptolemy, Onium. There are two cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, towards the south; the other somewhat lower on the easter-most branch of Nilus, falling into the sea at Pelusium. And it may be that Heliopolis to the south of the river Trojan, was the same which Vatablus and our English call Aven. Of the latter it is, that the scriptures take certain knowledge: the same which Pomponius Mela and Pliny call Solis oppidum; Tyrius in the Holy War, Malbec; the Arabians, Rabalboth; and Simeon Seiki, Fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Putiphar priest, or prince, whose daughter Joseph married. In the territory adjoining Jacob inhabited, while he lived in Egypt. In the confines of this city, Onias, the high priest of the Jews, built a temple, dedicated to the Eternal God; not much inferiour to that of Jerusalem (Ptol. my Philopater then governing in Egypt) which stood in the time of Vespasian, 333 years after the foundation by Onias, whom Josephus falsely reporteth herein to have fulfilled a prophecy of Isaiab c. 19. In die illa erit altare Domini in medio terræ Ægypti; In that day shall the altar of the Lord be in the midst of the land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes at that time of the building tyrannizing over the Jews, gave the occasion for the erecting of this temple in Egypt. Lastly, There it was, that our Saviour Christ Jesus remained, while Joseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: near which, saith Brochard, the fountain is still found, called Jesus-well, whose streams do afterward water the gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Egypt. And hereof see more in Brochard, in his description of Egypt.

There is also the city of Noph, remembered by Isaiab and Ezekiel; the same which Hosea the prophet calleth Moph: which latter name it took from a mountain adjoining so called; which mountain Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great city which was called Memphis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is known to the Arabians by the name of Mazar. The Chaldeans name it Alchabyr; and Tudalensis, Mizraim.

Pelusium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our English write Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna, is not the same with Damata, as Gul. Tyrius witnesseth. In the time of Baldwin III. Pelusium was called Belbeis: Belbeis, saith Tyrius, quæ olim dicta est Pelusium; Belbeis, that in times past was called Pelusium.

The city of No, the Septuagint call Diospolis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Jerome converts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Bubastus (for so Jerome and Zeigler do write it) is the same which the Hebrews call Pibseth.

To make the story the more perceivable, I have added a description of the land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited, with those cities and places so often remembered in the scripture: as of Taphnes or Zoan, Heliopolis or Bethsemes, Balsephon, Succoth and the rest; together with Moses's passage thro' the desarts of Arabia the stony. For all story, without the knowledge of the places wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure, so it no way enricheth the knowledge and understanding of the reader; neither doth any thing serve to retain what we read in our memories, so well as these pictures and descriptions do. In which respect I am driven to digress in many places, and to interpose some such discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent; taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man Arias Montanus; who, in his preface to the story of the Holy Land, hath these words: Si enim absque locorum observatione res gestæ narrentur, aut sine topographiæ cognitione historiæ legantur, adeo confusa atque perturbata erunt omnia, ut ex iis nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit; If narration, saith he, be made of those things which are performed, without the observation of the places wherein they were done, or if histories be read without topographical knowledge, all things will appear so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby understand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficulty.

SECT. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young children in Egypt: and of Moses's preservation, and education.

BUT to return to the story it self. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and slavery which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: insomuch as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented poverty, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perilous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the devil resolved to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrews, as soon as they should be born. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thura, women the most famous and expert amongst them; Quæ præerant, saith Comestor, multitudini obstetricum; who had command given them over all midwives; by whom (as it seemeth) he gave order to all the rest for the execution of his edict. For to have called all the midwives of Egypt together, had been a strange parliament. Now whether these two before named, were of the Hebrews, or of the Egyptians, it is diversly disputed. St. Augustine calls them Hebrews, because it is written Exodus i. 16. The king of Egypt commanded the midwives of the Hebrew women, &c. But Josephus, Abulensis, and Peterius believe them to be Egyptians. Whosoever they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that secret murder, to the end the world might witness both the wickedness of the Egyptians, and the just cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and revenge: Pharaoh finding these women filled with piety, and the fear of God, commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publicly, or howsoever, to destroy all the male Hebrew children born within his dominions.

Now besides the doubts which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrews, the greatest part of whom he might have assured, by affording them the justice which every king oweth to his vassals, and the rest he might have employed or sent away at his pleasure, Josephus giveth another cause of his rage against them; namely, That it was prophetically delivered him by an Egyptian priest, that among the Hebrews there should be born a child, who growing to man's estate, should become a plague and terror to his whole nation. To prevent which (and presuming that he could resist the ordinance of God, by a mean, contrary to the laws of heaven and of nature) he stretched out his bloody and merciless hand to the execution of his former intent. The same prevention Herod long after practis'd, when fearing the spiritual kingdom of Christ, as if it should have been temporal, he caused all the male children at that time born to be slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kind of foreknowledge of the future success, it may be gathered by these his own words, in Exodus v. 10. Come, let us work wisely with them, lest they multiply; and it come to pass, that if there be war, they join themselves also unto our enemies, and fight against us, and get them out of the land. But we see, and time hath told it us, from the beginning, how God derideth the wisdom of the worldly men, when, forgetting the Lord of all power, they rely on the inventions of their own most feeble, and altogether darkened understanding. For even by the hands of the dearly beloved daughter of this tyrant, was that great prophet and minister of God's marvellous works taken out of Nilus, being thereinto turned off, in an ark of reeds, a sucking and powerless infant. And this princess having beheld the child's form and beauty, tho' but yet in the blouth, so pierced her compassion, as she did not only preserve it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should be esteemed as her own, and with equal care to the son of a king nourished. And for memory that it was her deed, she called the child Moses, as it were extractus or ereptus, taken out, to wit, out of the water; or after Josephus and Glycas, Moy, a voice expressing water, and bis, as much as to say, that which is drawn out of water, or thence taken. ^a*Clemens Alexandrinus* was of opinion, that Moses was circumcised, before he was put into the ark of reeds, and that Amram his father, had named him Joachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care and at the charge of Pharaoh's daughter; and by men of the most understanding taught and instructed: Quem regio more educavit, præfēlis ei sapientibus Ægyptiorum magistris, à quibus erudiretur, saith Basil; Unto whom she gave princely education, appointing over him wise masters of the Egyptians for his instructors. Thereby (saith Josephus and ^b*Philo*) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians; which also the Martyr Stephen in the seventh of the Acts confirmeth. And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. Which wisdom or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Sixtus Senensis hath gathered, we have added, between the death of Moses and the reign of Joshua.

S E C T. IV.

Of Moses's flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certain ancient historians of his war in Ethiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo's judgment of his pastoral life: and that of Pererius of the books of Genesis and Job.

WHEN Moses was grown to man's estate, Josephus and Eusebius, out of Artapanus, tell us of ten years war that he made against the Ethiopians: of the besieging of Saba, afterwards by Cambyfes called Meroe; and how he recovered that city by the favour of Tharbis, a daughter of Ethiopia, whom he took to wife. So hath Comestor a pretty tale of Moses. How after the end of that war, Tharbis resisting his return into Egypt, Moses, most skillful in Astronomy, caused two images to be engraven in two precious stones: whereof the one increased memory, the other caused forgetfulness. These he set in two rings, whereof he gave the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his wife Tharbis, reserving the other of memory for himself: which ring of forgetfulness, after she had a while worn, she began to neglect the love she bare her husband: and so Moses without danger returned into Egypt. But leaving these fancies to the authors of them: it is true, that about the 40th year of Moses's age, when he beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrews, moved by compassion in respect of his brother, and stirred up by disdain against the other, in the contention he slew the Egyptian. Soon after which act, finding a disposition in some of his own nation to accuse him, for whose defence he had thus greatly endangered his own life: by the ordinance and advice of God, whose chosen servant he was, he fled into Arabia Petraea, the next bordering country to Egypt; where wandering all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place unknown unto him, as among a nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times were the irreconcilable enemies of the Hebrews: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly means) to make the watering of a few sheep, and the assisting the daughters of Raguel the Midianite, an occasion whereby to provide him a wife of one of those, and a father-in-law, that fed him, and sustained him in a country nearest Egypt, fittest to return from; necessary to be known, because interjacent between Egypt and Judea, thro' which he was to lead the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion, which God presented, best served. And lastly, where the glory of the world shined least, amidst mountainous deserts, there the glory of God, which shineth most, covered him over, and appeared unto him, not finding him as a king's son, or an adopted child of great Pharaoh's daughter, but as a meek and humble shepherd, sitting at a mountain foot; a keeper and commander of those poor beasts only.

In that part of Arabia, near Madian, he consumed 40 years. And tho' (as Philo in the story of Moses's life observeth) he did not neglect the care of those flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that pastoral knowledge; yet in that solitary desert he enjoy'd himself: and being separated from the pretis of the world, and the troublesome affairs thereof, he gave himself to contemplation, and to make perfect in himself all those knowledges, whereof his younger years had gathered the grounds and principles: the same author also judging, that his pastoral life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the principality, which he afterwards obtained. Est enim (saith Philo) ars pastoralis, quasi præludium ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, gregis mansuetissimi. Quemadmodum bellicosa ingenia præexercent se in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod postea in militia & bello perfectura sunt; brutis præbentibus materiam exercitii, tam belli quam pacis tempore. At vero præfēlura mansueti pecoris habet quiddam simile cum regno in subditis; ideoque reges cognominantur pastores populorum, non contumeliæ sed honoris gratia; The art of keeping sheep is, as it were, an introductory exercise unto a kingdom, namely, the rule over men, the most gentle flock: even as warlike natures do beforehand exercise themselves in hunting, practising on wild beasts those things, which after they will accomplish in warfare: those brute beasts affording matter, wherein to train themselves, both in time of war and of peace. But the government of gentle cattle, hath a kind of resemblance unto a kingly rule over subjects; therefore, kings are stiled shepherds of the people, not in way of reproach, but for their honour.

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the book of Job, as Pererius supposeth, I cannot judge of it, because it is thought, that Job was at that time living. Neither dare I subscribe to Pererius's opinion, that Moses, while he lived in that part of Arabia, wrote the books of Genesis; altho' I cannot deny the reason of Pererius's conjecture, that by the example of Job's patience he might strengthen the oppressed Hebrews: and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, put them in assurance of their delivery from the Egyptian slavery, and of the land of rest, and plenty promised.

Of his calling back into Egypt by the angel of God, and the marvels and wonders which he performed, thereby to persuade Pharaoh, that he was the messenger of the most High, the particulars are written in the first 14 chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needless. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught by God, by what name he should make him known, and by whom he was sent; he received from God so much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and ever-being nature. Out of which he delivered him in the first part of his answer, a name to be considered of by the wisest: and in his second, to be understood by all. For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it self, but the eternal: which truly is; which is above all; which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed every moment: their substance wasteth, and is repaired by nutriment; never continuing at one stay, nor being the same so long, as while one may say, Now. Likewise, whatsoever is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same in every shortest piece of time suffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one state. Unus est Dei & sola natura, quæ vere est: id enim quod subsistit non habet aliunde, sed suum est. Cætera quæ creata sunt, etiamsi videntur esse, non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & potest rursum non esse, quod non fuit; It is the one and only nature of God, which truly is: for he hath his being of himself, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, altho' they seem to be, yet they are not; for sometimes they were not: and that which hath not been, may again want being. And with this, in respect of the divine nature, the saying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Tota rerum natura umbra est, aut inanis, aut fallax; The whole nature of things is but a shadow, either empty or deceitful: in comparison of whom, saith Isaiah xl. 17. All nations are as nothing, less than nothing, and mere vanity.

Of the ten plagues wherewith the Egyptians were stricken, the first was by changing the rivers into blood: God punishing them by those waters, into which their forefathers had thrown, and in which they had drowned, the innocent children of the Hebrews. To which this place of Revel. xvi. 5. may be fitly applied. And I heard the angel of the waters say, Lord, thou art just, which art, and which wast: and holy, because thou hast judged these things; for they shed the blood of thy saints and prophets, and therefore hast thou given them blood to drink.

The rest of the plagues by frogs, lice, flies, or stinging wasps; by the death of their cattle; by leprous scabs; by hail and fire; by grasshoppers; by darkness; after which Pharaoh forbade Moses his presence: moved the hardened heart of the unbelieving king no longer than the pain and peril lasted, till such time as his own first-born, and the first born of all his nation perished. He then, while he feared his own life (a time wherein we remember God perforce) stood upon no condition: whereas before, he first yielded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women and children, reserving their bestial; but he was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not only depart with all their own, but with a part of the silver, gold and jewels of his own people: of which (the fear being past) he suddenly repented him, as his pursuit after them proved. For when every one of the Hebrews had (according to direction from Moses received) slain a lamb, without spot or blemish, for the passover (a sacrament of the most clean and unspotted Saviour) and with the blood thereof coloured the post and lintern of the doors; the angel of God in the dead of the night smote every first-born of Egypt, from the son of the king, to that of the beggar and slave: the children of the Israelites excepted. At which terrible judgment of God, Pharaoh being more than ever amazed, yielded, as before is said, to their departure. The Egyptians, saith Epiphanius, did in after-times imitate this colouring with blood, which the Israelites used after the passover; ascribing an exceeding virtue to the red colour: and therefore they did not only mark their sheep and cattle, but their trees bearing fruit, to preserve them from lightning and other harms.

SECT. V.

Of Pharaoh's pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red sea, so far as Succoth.

NOW, when the people were removed, and on their way (his heart being hardened by God) he bethought him as well of the honour lost, as of the shame remaining after so many calamities and plagues, in suffering them to depart with the spoils of his people, and in despight of himself. And having before this time great companies of soldiers in readiness, he consulted with himself, what way the Israelites were like to take. He knew that the shortest and fairest passage was thro' the country of the Philistines. But because these people were very strong, and a warlike nation, and in all probability of his allies, he suspected that Moses meant to find some other out-let, to wit, thro' the desert of Etham; and there, because the country was exceeding mountainous, and of hard access, and that Moses was pestered with multitudes of women, children, and cattle, he thought it impossible for the Israelites to escape him that way. In the mean while having gathered together all the chariots of Egypt, and 600 of his own, and captains over them; he determined to set upon them in the plains of Gosen, which way soever they turned themselves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those chariots, armed with broad and sharp hooks on both sides, in fashion like the mower's scythe. Which kind of fight in chariots, but not hooked, the Britains used against the Romans, while they made the war for the conquest of this land. Of this army of Pharaoh, Josephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000 horse, and 20000 foot; which were it true, then it cannot be doubted, but that Pharaoh intended long before to assail the Hebrews at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as he had prepared an army to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, he doubted two things; either that the Hebrews might join themselves to his enemies within the land; or being so multiplied, as they were, might leave his service, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieved him withal, enforce'd him at this time to give an assent to their departure: perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise, and Josephus partial in this affair, yet by the words of the text Exod. xiv. 7. it appeareth, that he gathered all the chariots of Egypt, which could not be done in haste. For Moses made but three days march, ere Pharaoh was at his heels; and yet the last day he went on sixteen miles: which, in so hot a country, and to drive their cattle and sheep with them, pestered with a world of women and children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerful enemy at hand. Now, as Moses well knew, that he went out with a mighty hand, and that God guided his understanding in all his enterprizes: so he lay not still in the ditch crying for help, but using the understanding which God had given him, he left nothing unperformed, becoming a wise man, and a valiant and skilful conductor ; as by all his actions and counsels from this day to his death well appeared.

When Moses perceived that Pharaoh was enraged against him, and commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence : after that he had warned Israel of the passover, he appointed a general assembly or rendezvous of all the Hebrews at Ramases, in the territory of Gosen, a city standing indifferent to receive from all parts of the country the dispersed Hebrews ; and gave commandment, that every family should bring with them such store as they had of dough and paste, not staying to make it into bread ; knowing then that Pharaoh was on foot, and on his way towards them. Which done, and having considered the great strength of Pharaoh's horlemen and chariots, of which kind of defence Moses was utterly unprovided (tho', as it is written, the Israelites went up armed) he marched from Ramases eastward towards the desarts of Etham, and encamped at Succoth ; which he performed on the 15th day of the month Abib. Which month from that time forward, they were commanded to account as the first month of the year. Whether in former times they had been accustomed to begin their year in some other month, following the manner of the Egyptians, and were now recalled by Moses to the rule of their forefathers, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that they had, and retained, another beginning of their politick year, which was not now abrogated, but rather, by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in use. Wherefore in referring things done, or happening among them, unto the beginning, midst or ending of the year ; that distinction of the sacred, and the politick year is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of days in every month, and the whole form of their year, like enough it is, that Moses himself in forty years space, did sufficiently instruct the priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was given in trust : but that any rule of framing their kalendar was made publick, before the captivity of Babylon, I do not find. Now because time and motion begin together, it will not, I think, be any great breach of order, to shew here at their first setting forth, what was the form of the Hebrew year : with the difference between them and other nations, in ordering the account of time.

SECT. VI.

Of the solary and lunary years : and how they are reconciled : with the form of the Hebrew year, and their manner of intercalation.

The Hebrew months are thus named.

The first month, Nisan , or Abib .	1. March.
The second, Iar , or Tiar , Zio , or Zin .	2. April.
The third, Sivan , or Sinan , or Siban .	3. May.
The fourth, Tamuz .	4. June.
The fifth, Ab .	5. July.
The sixth, Ebul .	6. August.
The seventh, Tysri , or Ethavin or Ethanim .	7. September.
The eighth, Marchesuan , or Mechasuan , or Bul , or with ^d Josephus , Marfonane .	8. October.
The ninth, Chisleu or Casten .	9. November.
The tenth, Tebeth , or Thobeth .	10. December.
The eleventh, Sebeth or Sabatb .	11. January.
The twelfth, Adar , and Pe Adar .	12. February.

VE Adar was an intercalary month, added, some years, unto the other twelve, to make the solar and lunary year agree ; which (besides the general inconvenience that would otherwise have risen, by casting the months of summer into the winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrews, because of the ^e divine precept. For God appointed especial feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a month of the year, and withal on a set day, both of the moon and of the month ; as, the feast of the first-fruits, the new moons, and the like : which could not have been so kept, if either the day of the moon had fallen in some other part of the month, or the month it self been found far distant from his place in the season of the year.

Other nations, the better to observe their solemnities in the due time, and to ascertain all reckonings and remembrances (which is the principal commodity of time, that is the measure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their years unequal, by adding sometimes, and sometimes abating one or more days, as the error committed in foregoing years required. The error grew at first by not knowing what number of days made up a compleat year. For tho' by the continual course of the sun, causing summer and winter duly to succeed each other, it is plain enough even to the most savage of all people, when a year hath passed over them ; yet the necessity of ordinary occurrences, that are to be numbred by a shorter tally, makes this long measure of whole years insufficient for the smaller sort of more daily affairs. Therefore men observed the monthly conspicuous resolution of the moon, by which they divided the year into 12 parts, subdividing the month into ^f 29 days and nights, and those again into their quarters and hours. But as the marks of time are sensible and easily discerned : so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the understanding. Twelve revolutions of the moon, containing less time by 11 days or thereabouts, than the yearly course of the sun, thro' the zodiac, in the space of 16 years, every month was found in the quite contrary part of the year to that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to add some days to the year, making it to consist of 12 months, and as many days more, as they thought would make the courses of the sun and moon to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the sun determine his yearly revolution by any set number of whole days ; neither did the moon change always at one hour ; but the very minutes and lesser fractions were to be observed by him, that would seek to reduce their motions (which motions also were not still alike) into any certain rule. Here lay much wisdom and deep art, which could not soon be brought to perfection. Yet as making an estimate at random, the Athenians held the year to contain 360 days, wherein most of the Greeks concurred with them. That 360 days filled up the Grecian year (besides many collateral proofs) it is manifest by that which ^g Pliny directly affirmeth, telling of the statues, erected in honour of Demetrius Phalereus, which were (saith he) 360, whilst as yet the year exceeded not that number of days. By this account neither did any certain age of the moon begin or end their months ; neither could their months continue many years, in their own places : but must needs be shifted by little and little, from winter to summer, and from summer to winter, as the days forgotten to be inserted into the almanack by men, but not forgotten by the superiour bodies in their courses, should occupy their own rooms in their due turns. Now, because the solemnity of the Olympian games was to be held at the full moon, and withal on the fifteenth day of the month Heccatombæon (which answereth in a manner to our June) they were careful to take order, that this month might ever begin with the new moon; which they effected by adding some two days to the last month of every year: those games being held once in four years. This intercalation sufficed not to make the matter even; which caused them sometimes to omit one day in the fourth year, which was the second of the month Bædromian; agreeing nearly with our August, sometimes not to omit it, or, which is all one, to insert another for it in their fourth lunar year, accounting by the moon, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their month of June would every year have grown colder and colder, had they not sought to keep all upright, by intercalating in each other's Olympiad, that is, each eighth year one whole month, which they called the second Pofideon, or December; which was the device of Harpalus, who also taught them to make one month of 29 days, another of 30, and so successively thro' the whole year. Thus with much labour they kept their year as near as they could, unto the high way of the planets; but these marks which they observed, were found at length to be deceitful guides. For it was not possible so to fashion this eighth year's intercalation, that it should not deceive them in 11 hours and 18 minutes at the least, or some ways in 34 hours and 10 minutes, or 36 and 41 minutes; which differences would in few ages have bred much confusion. The first that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth year's intercalation, devised a Cycle of 19 years, where the moon having 235 times run out her circuit, met with the sun in the same place, and on the same day of the year, as in the 19th year before past she had done. This invention of Meton was entertained with great applause, and passing from Greece to Rome, was there inserted into the kalendar in golden letters, being called the golden number; which name it retaineth unto this day. Hereby were avoided the great and uncertain intercalations that formerly had been used; for by the intercalation of seven months in the 19 years, all was so even, that no sensible difference could be found. Yet that error, which in one year could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new moons anticipating in one Cycle, seven hours, and some minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus devised a new Cycle containing four of Meton's, that is to say, 76 years; and afterwards Hipparchus, a noble Astrologer, framed another, containing four of Calippus's periods, each of them finding some error in the former observations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the kalendar was that which Julius Cæsar made, who, by advice of the best Mathematicians then to be found, examining the courses of those heavenly bodies, reduced the year unto the form which is now in use with us, containing 365 days and six hours, which hours, in four years make up one whole day, that is intercalated every fourth year, the 24th of February. The correction of the Julian year by pope Gregory XIII. Anno Domini 1582, is not as yet entertained by general consent; it was indeed but as a note added unto the work of Cæsar; yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was observed, that the sun, which at the time of the Nicene council, Anno Dom. 324, entered the equinoctial on the 21st day of March, was in the year 1582, ten days sooner found in that time, pope Gregory struck out of the kalendar ten days, following the fourth of October, so that instead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which means the moveable feasts depending on the sun's entrance into Aries, were again celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene council they had been. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the council of Trent ordained, that from thenceforward in every hundredth year, the leap-day should be omitted, excepting still the fourth hundredth; because the sun doth not in his yearly course take up full six hours above the 365 days, but faileth so many minutes, as in 400 years make about three whole days.

^a The territory of Gosen was afterwards called Ramases, after the name of this city, as appeareth in Gen 47. and Numb 33.
^b Exod 13. ^c Exod 23. 16. and c 34. 22. ^d Ant c 4. ^e Deut 16. ^f 30, and 29. ^g Plin l 34 c 6.

But the Cycle of 19 years, which the Hebrews used, was such as neither did need any nice curiosity of hours, minutes, and other lesser fractions to help it; neither did in summing up the days of the whole year, neglect the days of the moon, confounding one moon with another. For with them it fell out so, that always the kalends or first day of the month was at the new moon, and because that day was festival, they were very careful as well to observe the short year after the moon, passing thro' all the 12 signs in one month, as that longer of the sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First therefore, they gave to Nisan their first month, which is about our March or April, 30 days; to Iar their second month 29 days; and so successively 30 to one, 29 to another. Hereby it came to pass, that every two months of theirs contained somewhat evenly two revolutions of the moon, allowing 29 days, 12 hours, and odd minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous or epact days, which made up seven months in 19 years; to six of which seven were commonly given 30 days; to one of them 29 days, or otherwise as was found requisite. Their common year (as appeareth by the several days of each month) contained 354 days, which fail of the year; wherein the sun finisheth his course, 11 whole days, with some fractions of time. But these days, and other broken pieces, howsoever they were neglected in one year, yet in the Cycle of 19 years were so disposed of by convenient intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the sun and moon were found on the same day of the year, month and week, yea commonly on the same hour of the day, where they had been at the beginning of it 19 years before.

Divers have diversly set down the form of the Hebrew year, with the manner of their intercalations. Sigonius tells us, that every second year they did add a month of 22 days; every fourth year a month of 23, in the regard of 11 days and a half wanting in 12 moons to fulfil a year of the sun. But herein Sigonius was very much deceived. For the moon doth never finish her course in 22 or 23 days: and therefore to have added so many days to the end of the year, had been the way to change the fashion of all the months in the years following, which could not have begun as they ought, with the new moon. Genebrand saith, that every third year, or second year, as need required, they did intercalate one month, adding it at the year's end unto the other 12. This I believe to have been true; but in which of the years the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) methinks they do not probably deliver, who keep all far from evenness until the very last of the 19 years. For (to omit such as err grossly) some there are who say, that after three years, when besides the days spent in 36 courses of the moon, 33 days are left remaining, that is, 11 days of each year; then did the Hebrews add a month of 30 days; keeping three days as it were in plussage unto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixth year; at which time, besides the intercalary month, remained six days, namely, three surmounting that month, and the epact of three years, besides the three formerly reserved. Thus they go on to the 18th year; at which time they have 18 days in hand: all which with the epact of the 19th year, make up a month of 29 days, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle makes all even.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirm nor deny; yet surely it must needs have bred a great confusion, if in the 18th year every month were removed from his own place by the distance of 48 days, that is, half a quarter of the year and more; which inconvenience by such a reckoning was unavoidable. Wherefore I prefer the common opinion, which preventeth such dislocation of the months, by setting down a more convenient way of intercalation in the 8th year. For the six days remaining after the two former intercalations made in the 3d and 6th years, added unto the 22 days, arising out of the epacts of the 7th and 8th years, do fitly serve to make up a month, with the borrowing of one day or two from the year following; and this borrowing of two days is so far from causing any disorder, that indeed it helps to make the years ensuing vary the less from the proper season of every month. This may suffice to be spoken of the Hebrew months and years, by which they guided their accounts.

SECT. VIII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red sea: and of the divers ways leading out of Egypt.

FROM Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the desert of Etham, to recover the mountain foot, by the edge of that wilderness, though he intended nothing less than to go out of that way, of all other the nearest. But being assured of the multitude of horsemen and armed chariots, that followed him, he kept himself from being compassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he rested but one night, and then he reflected back from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the south; the distance between it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbore to enter Arabia being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceed from three respects; the first two natural; the third divine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and having received intelligence of the way which Moses took, persuaded himself, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of above a million, if not two millions of souls (for as it is written Exodus the 12th, Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them^a) could not possibly pass over those desert and high mountains with so great multitudes of women, children, and cattle, but that at the very entrance of that fastness he should have overtaken them, and destroy'd the greatest numbers of them. For these his own words, They are entangled in the land, the wilderness hath shut them in, do shew his hopes and intents; which Moses by turning another way did frustrate. Secondly, Moses, by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towards the east side of the land of Gosen, or Rameses: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reason of the roughness of the way; and howsoever, yet while the Hebrews kept the mountain foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the over-bearing violence both of the horse and chariots. Thirdly, Moses's confidence in the all-powerful God was such, by whose spirit, only wise, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leave the glory of his deliverance and victory to Almighty God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000 men, to cast the success upon his own understanding, wise conduct, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the valley of Pibacheroth, 16 miles distant; and sat down between two ledges of mountains adjoining to the Red sea; to wit, the mountains of Etham on the north, and Baalzephon towards the south: the same which Orosius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a temple dedicated to Baal. And as Phagius noteth, the word so compounded, is as much to say, as Dominus speculæ sive custodiæ, Lord of the watch tower. For the Egyptians believed, or at least made their slaves believe, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this idol would both arrest them, and force them to return to their lords and masters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turns. Aegyptii Dis sacundi; the Egyptians were fruitful in gods, saith St. Jerome. But Moses, who incamped at the foot of this mountain with a million of souls, or, as others conceive, with two millions, found this lord of the watch tower asleep, or out of countenance.

Now these two passages leading out of Egypt into Arabia upon the firm land Moses refused, as well that of Pelusium and Casiotis, the fairest and shortest of all other, in respect of Judea, as the other by Etham; from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembered, and took the way by the valley of Pibacheroth, between the mountains, which made a straight entrance towards the sea. After whom Pharaoh made so great speed with his horsemen and chariots, as he gave the Hebrews no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but got sight of them, and they of him, even at the very brink and wash of the sea: insomuch as the Hebrews being terrified with Pharaoh's sudden approach, began to despair, and to mutiny, at that time when it behoved them most to have taken courage for their own defence; laying it to Moses's charge, that themselves foresaw those perils in which they were wrapped. And fear, ^dwhich, saith the book of Wisdom, is the betraying of those succours which reason offereth, made them both despair in God's former promises, and to be forgetful of their own strength and multitudes.

SECT. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red sea: and of the Red sea it self.

BUT Moses, who feared nothing but God himself, persuaded them to be confident in his goodness, who hath never abandoned those, that assuredly trust in him; using this comfortable and resolved speech: Fear not, &c. for the Egyptians, whom you have seen this day, ye shall never see them again. The Lord shall fight for you. After which Moses called on God for succour, received encouragement, and commanded to go on, in these words: Wherefore criest thou unto me? speak unto the

^a It is probable that all those Egyptians and others brought by the Hebrews to the knowledge of the true God, followed Moses at his departure. ^b Climax is rather so called in respect of a passage up and down, than that it is any proper name. ^c Exod. 13. 17. ^d Wisd. 17. 11. ^e Exod. 14. 13. 14. ^f Exod. 14. 16.

dren of Israel that they go forward; and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thine hand upon the sea, and divide it, and let the children of Israel go on dry ground through the midst of the sea. Moses obeying the voice of God, in the dark of the night finding the sands uncovered, pass'd on towards the other side and coast of Arabia: two parts of the night being spent ere he entered the ford, which it pleased God by a forcible eastern wind, and by Moses's rod, to prepare.

Pharaoh followed him even at the heels, finding the same dry ground which Moses trod on. Therefore as it is written, The angel of God which went before the host of Israel, removed, and went behind them: also the pillar of the cloud went from before them, and stood behind them; which is, that it pleased God therein either by his immediate power, or by the ministry of his angel, to interpose his defence between the Hebrews and their enemies; to the end that the Egyptians might hereby be blinded, in such sort as they could not pursue Israel with any harmful speed. But in the morning watch Moses seized the other bank of Arabia side: and Pharaoh (as the dawn of day began to illighten the obscure air) finding a beginning of the seas return, halted himself towards his own coast: But Moses stretched forth his hand, and the sea returned to his force; that is, the sea moved by the power of God, ran back towards the land with irresistible fury and swiftness, and overwhelmed the whole army of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For it is written, that God took off their chariot-wheels, that is, when the waters began to cover the sands, the Egyptians being stricken with fear of death, ran one athwart another, and missing the path by which they had pass'd on after the Hebrews, their wheels stuck fast in the mud and quick-sands, and could not be drawn out: the sea coming against them with supernatural violence.

Lyranus upon Exodus xiv. and others, following the opinions or old traditions of the Hebrews, conceived, that after Moses had by the power of God divided the Red sea, and that the children of Israel were fearful to enter it, Aminadab, prince or leader of the tribe of Juda, first made the adventure, and that therefore was that tribe ever after honoured above the rest, according to the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 8. Thy fathers sons shall bow down unto thee. But Jerome upon the 11th of I Hosea condemns this opinion. And tho' it be true, that Juda had the first place in all their marches in the desert, and, as we now call it, led the vanguard (whereupon it may be inferred, that he also led the way through the Red sea) yet that Moses himself was the conductor of Israel at that time, it is generally received. For, as it is written in the lxxviii Psalms, Thou didst lead thy people like sheep by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

The Hebrews have also another fancy, that the Red sea was divided into 12 parts, and that every tribe pass'd over in a path apart, because it is written in the cxxxvii Psalms, according the Vulgar, Divisti mare rubrum in divisiones; He divided the Red sea in divisions. Also that the bottom of the sea became as a green field or pasture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulensis, and Genebrard, favouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not 12 pillars nor 12 armies of the Egyptians. It is written Psalms lxxvii. 16. Thy way is in the sea; not thy ways; and in the last of the book of Wisdom, ver. 7. In the Red sea there was a way.

Now this sea, through which Moses pass'd, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Chencres, perished in the 16th year of his reign, is commonly known by the name of the Red sea; tho' the same differ nothing at all in natural colour from other waters. But as Philostratus in his 3d book noteth; and our selves know by experience, it is of a blueish colour, as other seas are. It entreth at a narrow strait between Arabia the happy and Ethiopia, of the land of the Abyssins: the mouth of the indraught from the cape, which Ptolemy calleth Possodium, to the other land of Ethiopia, hath not above six leagues in breadth: and the same also filled every where with islands, but afterwards it extendeth it self 58 leagues from coast to coast: and it runneth up between Arabia the happy, and Arabia Petraea, on one side, and Ethiopia and Egypt on the other, as far as Sues, the uttermost end and indraught of that sea: where the Turk now keepeth his fleet of gallies. The cosmographers commonly give it the name of the Arabian gulf: but the north part towards Sues, and where Moses pass'd, is called Heropolites of the city Hero, sometime Troy: and of later times Sues. Pliny calls it Cambisu, by which name it was known, saith he, before it was called Hero, many years. The Arabians call this sea towards the north, Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it Æleniticum: king Juba Læniticum: others more properly Elaniticum, of the port and city Elana: which the Septuagint call Elath: Ptolemy Elana: Pliny Læna: Josephus Ilana, and Marius Niger Aila: there is also Ilalab in Affyria, to which Salmanassar carried the Israelites captive, 2 Kings viii. 11. which Ilalab in Affyria, the Septuagint call Elia: and in the 1st of Chron. the 5th Ala. But as for this Red sea, or the parts thereof, thus diversly named, the Moors and Arabians (vassals to the Turks) know it by no other appellation, than the gulf of Meca, after the name of Mahomet's town Mecca. The Greeks write it the sea Erythræum: of a king called Erythras, or Erythræus: and because Erythros in the Greek signifieth red, hence it is, that, being denominated of this Erythræus, the son of Perseus and Andromeda, yet it took the name of the Red sea, as Quintus Curtius conjectureth: which Arianus and Strabo confirm. But it seemeth to me by the view of a discovery of that sea in the year 1544, performed by St. Stephen Gama, viceroy of the east India, for the king of Portugal, that this sea was so called from a reflection of redness, both from the banks, cliffs, and sands of many islands, and part of the continent bordering it. For I find by the report of Castro, a principal commander under Gama (which discourse I gave Mr. Richard Hakluyt to publish) that there is an island called Dalacqua, sometimes Leques, containing in length 25 leagues, and 12 in breadth, the earth, sands, and cliffs of which island, being of a reddish colour, serve for a foil to the waters about it; and make it seem altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Castro reporteth, that from 24 degrees of septentrional latitude, to 27 (which make in length of coast 180 miles, lying as it doth northerly and southerly) all the cliffs and banks are of red earth, or stone, which by reflection of the sun-beams, give a kind of reddish luster to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottom of this sea towards the shore, great abundance of red stones, on which the great store of coral grows, which is carried into most parts of Europe, and elsewhere. There are also on the islands of this sea many red trees, saith Strabo, and those growing under water, may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of redness by the shadows of these stones, sands, earth, and cliffs, I suppose that it first took the name of the Red sea, because in so many places it seemeth to be such: which Johannes Barros, in his second decade, eighth book, and first chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this sea from Elana, or Ezion Gaber adjoining, now Toro, called by the ancient cosmographers Sinus Elaniticus, which washeth the banks of Madian or Midian, is for 16 or 17 leagues together, along northward towards Sues, some three leagues or nine English miles over, and from this port of Toro, to Sues, and the end of this sea, it is in length about 28 leagues, of which the first 26 have 9 miles breadth as aforesaid, and afterwards the lands both from Egypt and Arabia, thrust themselves into the sea, and straiten it so fast, as for 6 miles together it is not above 3 miles over; from thence upward the land on Egypt side, falleth away, and makes a kind of bay or cove for some 10 miles together, after which the land grows upon the sea again, and so binds it into the very end thereof, at 4 miles breadth, or thereabouts, in which tract it was that Moses pass'd it over, tho' others would have it to be over against Elana or Toro; but without judgment: for from Ramases to Pibacheroth and Baalzephon, there is not above 30 miles interjacent, or 35 miles at most, which Moses pass'd over in three days: and between the land of Egypt opposite to Elana or Toro, the distance is above 80 miles. For Ramases to which city Moses came (being the metropolis of Gosen) when he left Pharaoh at Zoan, and took his last leave, standeth in 30 degrees 5 minutes of septentrional latitude: and Migdol, or the valley of Pibacheroth, at the foot of the mountain Climax, or Baalzephon, in 29 and a half, which made a difference of 35 English miles: the way lying in effect north and south.

S E C T. IX.

That the passage through the Red sea was miraculous, and not at a low ebb.

THE Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other heathen writers, who in hatred of the Hebrews, have objected that Moses pass'd over the Red sea at a low ebb, upon a great spring-tide, and that Pharaoh conducted more by fury than discretion, pursued him so far, as before he could recover the coast of Egypt, he was overtaken by the flood, and therein perished, did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For not to borrow strength from that part of the scriptures, which makes it plain, that the waters were divided, and that God wrought this miracle by an easterly wind, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authority to men that believe not therein persuadeth nothing) I say, that by the same natural reason unto which they fasten themselves, it is made manifest, that had there been no other working power from above, or assistance given from God himself to Moses, and the children of Israel, than ordinary and casual, then could not Pharaoh and all his army have perished in that pursuit.

For wheresoever there is any ebbing of the sea in any gulf, or indraught, there do the waters fall away from the land: and run downward towards the ocean: leaving all that part towards the land as far as the sea can ebb, or fall off, to be dry land. Now Moses entering the sea at Migdol under Baalzephon (if he had taken the advantage and opportunity of the tide) must have left all that end of the Red sea towards Sues, on his left hand, dry and uncovered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water, 10 or 12 miles farther into the sea than Sues, and between it and where Moses pass'd; who en-ter'd the same so far below it, and towards the body of the same sea. It followeth then, that if all that part of the sleeve or strait, had been by the ebb of a spring-tide discovered, when Pharaoh found the flood increasing, he needed not to have returned by the same way toward Egypt side, but might have gone on his return before the tide, on his right hand: and so taken ground at the end of that sea, at Sues itself, or elsewhere. But the scriptures do truly witness the contrary, that is, That the sea did not fall away from the land, as naturally it doth; but that Moses pass'd on between two seas, and that the waters were divided. Otherwise, Pharaoh by any return of waters could not have perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great army's destruction, prove the cause to have been a power above nature, and the miraculous work of God himself. Again, those words of the scriptures, that God caused the sea to run back by a strong east-wind, do rather prove the miracle, than that thereby was caused an ebb more than ordinary: for that sea doth not lie east and west, but, in effect, north and south. And it must have been a west and north-west wind; that must have driven those waters away thro' their proper channels, and to the south-east into the sea. But the east-wind blew athwart the sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell back towards the south and main body thereof: the other part remained towards Sues, and the north: which being unknown to Pharaoh; while he was check'd by that sea, which used in all times before to ebb away, the flood press'd him and overwhelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Josephus avoweth, that Moses was not only of excellent judgment generally, but also so great a captain, as he overthrew the Ethiopians in many battles, being employed by Pharaoh, and won divers cities seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemn him of this grossness, and distraction: that rather than he would have endured the hardness of a mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honour which he would there win upon Pharaoh) he would have trusted to the advantage of an ebbing water. For he knew not the contrary, but that Pharaoh might have found him, and press'd him, as well when it flowed as when it ebb'd, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharaoh's approach, cried out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their safety: and when Moses prayed unto God for help, he was answered by God: Wherefore cryest thou unto me? speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward, and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the sea, and divide it: which proves that there was not at the time of Pharaoh's approach any ebb at all; but that God did disperse and cut thro' the weight of waters, by a strong east-wind, whereby the sands discovered themselves between the sea on the left hand towards Sues, from whence the waters moved not, and the sea which was towards the south on the right hand, So that the waters were a wall unto them on the right hand and on the left hand, Exod. xiv. 22. that is, the waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could only follow them in the same path; not that the waters stood upright as walls do, as some of the schoolmen have fancied. For had Pharaoh and the Egyptians perceived any such buildings in the sea, they would soon have quitted the chace and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of judgment, that can think, that Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who then excelled all nations in the observations of heavenly motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes, and and refluxes of the sea, in his own country, on his own coast, and in his own most traded and frequented ports and havens, and wherein his people having had so many hundreds of years experience of the tides, he could not be caught, as he was, thro' ignorance, nor by any foreknown or natural accident, but by God's powerful hand only; which then falleth most heavily on all men, when looking thro' no other spectacle but their own prosperity, they least discern it coming, and least fear it. Lastly, if the army of the Egyptians had been overtaken by the ordinary return of the flood, before they could recover their own coast; their bodies drowned would have been carried with the flood which runneth up to Sues, and to the end of that sea, and not have been cast ashore on that coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, upon the sea-bank over-against Baalzephon, on Arabia side: where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies; and not at the end of the Red sea, to which place the ordinary flood would have carried them: which flood doth not any-where cross the channel, and run athwart it, as it must have done from Egypt side to Arabia, to have cast the Egyptians bodies there; but it keeps the natural course towards the end of that sea: and to which their carcases should have been carried, if the work had not been supernatural and miraculous. Apollonius in the lives of the fathers affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which stay'd in the country, and did not follow Pharaoh in the pursuit of Israel, did ever after honour those beasts, birds, plants, or other creatures, about which they were busied at the time of Pharaoh's destruction: as he that was then labouring in his garden made a god of that plant or root, about which he was occupied: and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of Gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be given elsewhere. Orosius, in his first book and tenth chapter against the Pagans, tells us, that in his time, who lived some 400 years after Christ, the prints of Pharaoh's chariot wheels were to be seen at a low water on the Egyptian sands: and tho' they were some time defaced by wind and weather, yet soon after they appeared again. But hereof I leave every man to his own belief.

CHAP. IV.

Of the journeying of the Israelites from the Red sea, to the place where the law was given them: with a discourse of laws.

SECT. I.

A transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching chronology: with a continuance of the story, until the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

BUT to go on with the story of Israel, in this sort I collect the times. ^a Moses was born in the year of the world 2434. Sapbrus then governing Affyria; Orthopolis, Sycionia, or Peloponnesus; Criafus, the Argives; Orus, Egypt; and Deucalion, Theffaly. He fled into Midian, when he had lived 40 years, in the year of the world 2474, and two years after was Caleb born. He returned by the commandment and ordinance of God into Egypt, and wrought his miracles in the fields of Zoan, in the year 2514, in the last month of that year. On the 14th day of the first Hebrew month Abib, or the 15th of that month, beginning the day (as they) at sun-setting, in the year of the world 2514, was the celebration of the passover: and in the dead of the night of the same day were all the ^b first-born slain thro' Egypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrews inhabited not. The ^c 15th day of the first month of the Hebrews called Abib, being about the beginning of the year of the world 2514, Moses with the children of Israel removed from the general assembly at Ramases, and marched to Succoth.

And departing thence they made their third station at ^d Etham: and journeying from Etham they incamped in the valley of Pibacheroth, or Migdol, under the mountain ^e Baalzephon; and in the same night after midnight, they passed the Red sea: Pharaoh and his army perishing in their return, about the first dawn of the day. Moses having recovered the banks of Arabia, gave thanks unto God for the delivery of Israel; and making no stay on that coast, entred the desarts of Arabia Petraea, called Sur, but finding no water in that passage, he incamped at ^f Marah, in the desert of Etham, which in Exodus xv. 22. is also called Sur, twenty-five miles from the sea: where the children of Israel, press'd with extreme thirst, murmured against ^g Moses a second time; first at Pharaoh's approach in Pibacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the branches of a tree, growing near a lake of bitter water, and casting the same therein, made the same sweet: a plain type and figure of our Saviour; who upon the tree of the cross changed the bitterness of everlasting death, into the sweetness of eternal life. Pliny remembers these bitter fountains in his sixth book and 29th chapter. From whence to Delta in Egypt, Sesostris first, Darius after him, and lastly Ptolemy the second, began to cut an artificial river, thereby by boats and small shipping to trade and navigate the Red sea, from the great cities upon Nilus. From Marah he removed to ^h Elim, the sixth mansion, a march of eight miles: where finding twelve fountains of sweet water, and seventy palm-trees, he rested divers days.

Whether this Elim were the name of a town or city in Moses's time, I cannot affirm. And yet the scarcity of waters in that region was such, as Elim, which had twelve fountains, could hardly be left unpeopled. William archbishop of Tyre, in his history of the holy war, found at Elim the ruins of a great and ancient city. And at such time as Baldwin the first pass'd that way into Egypt, ⁱ Ingressus, saith he, Elim, Civitatem antiquissimam populo Israelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quam cum pervenisset, loci illius incolæ, regis adventu præcognito, naviculam ingredientibus in mare vicinum se contulerunt; Entering Elim a very ancient city, well known sometime to the people of Israel; whither when he came, the inhabitants, forewarned of the king's approach, took boat, and shifted themselves into the sea, lying near them. From Elim he returned again towards the south, and sat down by the banks of the Red sea: the seventh mansion. For it seemeth that he had knowledge of Amalek, who prepared to resist his passage thro' that part of Arabia. And Moses, who had not as yet trained those of the Hebrews, appointed to bear arms; nor assured the minds of the rest, who encountering with the least misery, were more apt to return to their quiet slavery, than either to endure the wants and perils which every-where accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to undertake or sustain so dangerous an enemy: he therefore made stay at this mansion, until the fifteenth of the second month called Zim, or Ijar; and made the eighth mansion in the desert of Zin; where the children of Israel mutinied against Moses the third time, having want of food. In the sixteenth chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retreat from Elim to the Red sea, but in the collection of every several encamping, in the thirty-third of Numbers it is set down.

Here it pleased God to send so many flights of quails, as all the country about their incamping was covered with them. The morning following it also rained manna, being the sixteenth of their month, which served them instead of bread. For now was the store consumed which the people carried with them out of Egypt. And tho' they had great numbers of cattle and sheep among them, yet it seemeth that they durst not feed themselves with many of those: but reserved them both for the milk to relieve the children withal, and for bread to store themselves when they came to the land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two removes of twenty miles; the one to Daphca, the other to Alus, distant from Raphidim six miles. Here being again press'd with want of water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themselves to be led and beaten after the manner of beasts, than to suffer a casual and sometimes necessary want, and to undergo the hazards and travels which every manly mind seeketh after, for the love of God and their own freedoms. But Moses, with the same rod which he divided the sea withal, in the sight of the elders of Israel, brought waters out of the rock, wherewith the whole multitude were satisfied.

SECT. II.

Of the Amalekites, Midianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battle with the Amalekites, and Jethro's coming: who being a Kenite, was priest of Midian.

AND while Moses incamped in this place, the Amalekites, who had knowledge of his approach, and guessed that he meant to lead the children of Israel thro' their country (which being barren of it self, would be utterly wasted by so great a multitude of people and cattle) thought it most for their advantage to set upon them at Raphidim; where the want of water, and all other things needful for the life of man, ineebled them. On the other side Moses perceiving their resolutions, gave charge to Joshua, to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrews, to encounter Amalek. Between whom and Israel, the victory remained doubtful, for the most part of the day: the Hebrews and Amalekites contending with equal hopes and repulses for many hours. And had not the strength of Moses's prayers to God been of far greater force, and more prevalent, than all resistance and attempt made by the bodies of men, that valiant and warlike nation had greatly endangered the whole enterprise. For those bodies which are unacquainted with scarcity of food, and those minds whom a servile education hath dulled, being beaten, and despaired in their first attempts, will hardly, or never be brought again to hazard themselves.

After this victory Jethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses's wife, and his two sons, which either Jethro forbore to conduct, or Moses to receive, till he had by this overthrow of Amalek the better assured himself of that part of Arabia. For it is written Exodus xviii. 1. When Jethro the priest of Midian, Moses's father-in-law, heard all that God had done for Moses, &c. of which the last deed, to wit, the overthrow of Amalek, gave Jethro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his son-in-law Moses, at Sinai; where, amongst other things, he advised Moses to appoint judges, and other officers, over Israel; being himself unable to give order in all causes and controversies, among so many thousands of people full of discontentment and private controversy.

This Jethro, altho' he dwelt amongst the Midianites, yet he was by nation a Kenite, as in Judges iv. 11, 17. it is manifest; where it is written, Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the son of Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his tents until the plain of Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest he should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountains of Sin Kadesh, and the Amalekites dwelt in the plains, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites; Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the rock. And that Saul spared this nation, he giveth for cause, that they shewed mercy to all the children of Israel, when they came up from Egypt. For these Kenites were a nation of the Midianites, and the Midianites were of the issues of Midian, one of the six sons which Abraham begat on Keturah: and might also take that name of Kenites from Keturah, of whom they descended by the mother, who as it seemeth kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they received from their parent Abraham. For Moses, when he fled out of Egypt into Midian, and married the daughter of Jethro, would not (had he found them idolaters) have made Jethro's daughter the mother of his children. And altho' the Kenites are named amongst those nations, which God promised, that the seed of Abraham should root out, and inherit their lands; yet it cannot be meant by these, who are descended from Abraham himself: but by some other nation bearing the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in Genesis xv. 19. these Kenites or Chusites are listed with the Hittites and Perezites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites and Jebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites descended from Abraham, had separated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as is before remembred, Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites, that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh or Kadesb. Again, Moses nameth that nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham's other sons were born: which he did (referring my self to better judgment) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Midianites, parted by Moses into five tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and heathens; as those of Midian by the river Zared afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Midianites near the banks of the Red sea, where Moses married his wife Zipporah, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the overthrow of Amalek, seem likewise not to have been corrupted. For the Midianites with the Kenites assisted Israel, and guided them in the desarts. But the Midianites in Moab, and to the north of the metropolis of Arabia, called Petrea, were by Israel rooted out, when those adjoining to the Red sea were not touched.

And tho' it may be doubted, whether those of Midian, of whom Jethro was priest, and the other cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not have sent 12000 Israelites, as far back as the Red sea, from the plains of Moab, to have destroy'd that Midian, where his wife's kindred inhabited: seeing himself coming with 600000 able men, was encountred by Amalek in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable desarts, wherein himself and Israel had wandred 40 years.

That Jethro or Jothor, Raguel or Revel, and Hobab, were but one person, the scriptures teach us. For the Vulgar and Septuagint, which call him Raguel; and our English, Revel; Exod. ii. 18. calls him Jethro, or Jothor, Exod. iii. 1. iv. 18. xviii. 1. and vi. 9, 10, 12. and in Numbers x. 29. Hobab. Others take Jethro and Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

SECT. III.

Of the time when the law was given: with divers commendations of the invention of laws.

THE rest of the months of this year 2515, were spent in the desert of Sinai, near the mountain of Sinai or Horeb, the 12th mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai or Horeb were distinct mountains: Jerome, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many scriptures. For in Exod. iii. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exod. xxiv. 16. it is written Sinai. In Psalms cvi. 19. Horeb: in Exod. xix. 11. Sinai. And so it is called Galatians iv. 24. and again, Deut. iv. 10, 15. and Deut. v. 2. Horeb. And so it is in the 1st of Kings viii. 6. and the 2d of Chron. v. 10. and in Malachy iv. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus xlviii. 7. they are named as one. Which bearest (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the judgment of the vengeance. Somewhat they are disjoined at the top by the report of Peter Belonius: who in the year 1588, pass'd out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de l'umet of France, and travelled to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by far the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very fair spring of water into the valley adjoining: where he found two monasteries of christian Marronites, containing some 100 religious persons of divers nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, and excellent wine. These (saith the same author) give entertainment to all strangers, which pass that way.

Now, that there was some such torrent of water near Sinai in Moses's time, it is very probable: First, because he encamped thereabout almost a year, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: Secondly, because it is written Exod. xxxii. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden calf to powder, which Aaron set up in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drink thereof.

On this mountain, the law by the angel of God was given to Moses, where he staid a whole year, waiting some 10 or 12 days: for he removed not till the 20th day of the 2d month of the 2d year; and he arrived about the 45th day after the egression: the law being given the 50th day.

At this mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the xxixth chapter of Exodus, to the end of that book; all in Leviticus; and all in Numbers to the xth chapter. Whereof (because there is no story nor other passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speak somewhat of the law, and the kinds and use thereof: whereby, if the reader find the story any way disjoined, he may turn over a few leaves, and, omitting this, find the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any common-wealth, without the rule, level, and square of laws: so it pleased God to give thereby unto Moses the powerfulest mean (his miraculous grace excepted) to govern that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For as the north-star is the most fixed director of the sea-man to his desired port: so is the law of God the guide and conductor of all in general, to the haven of eternal life: the law of nature, from God's eternal law deduced, the rule of all his creatures: the law human, depending on both these, the guard of kings, magistrates, and virtuous men; yea, the very spirit, and the very sinews of every estate in the world, by which they live and move: the law, to wit, a just law, being resembled to an heart without affliction, to an eye without lust, and to a mind without passion; a treasurer, which keepeth for every man what he hath, and distributeth to every man what he ought to have.

This benefit the ancients, tho' barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those, which were taken for the first makers of laws, were honoured as gods, or as the sons of gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posterity for men of no less virtue, and no less liberally beneficial to their countries, than the greatest and most prosperous conquerors that ever governed them. The Israelites, the Lacedemonians, and the Athenians, received their laws from one: as the Israelites from Moses; the Lacedemonians from Lycurgus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romans sometimes from their first kings, from their Decemviri, from their senators, from their lawyers, and from the people themselves: others from the prince, nobility, and people; as in England, France, and in other christian monarchies and estates.

SECT. IV.

Of the name and meaning of the words, law and right.

THE word lex, or law, is not always taken alike, but is diversly, and in an indifferent sense used. For if we consider it at large, it may be understood for any rule prescribing a necessary mean, order, and method, for the attaining of an end. And so the rules of grammar, and other arts, are called laws. Or it is taken for any private ordinance of superiours to inferiours: for the commandments of tyrants, which they cause to be observed by force, for their decrees do also usurp that title, according to the general acceptation of the word law: of which Isaiab, Ho unto them that decree wicked decrees, and write grievous things. Likewise, the word is used for the tumultuary resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call laws, tho' evil and unjust. Alia lex est, que tumultuarie posita est; It is an ill law that is made tumultuously. So as all ordinances, either good or evil, are called by the name of laws.

The word law is also taken for the moral habit of our mind, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it self, as to their pattern and platform. And thus the law of the flesh, which the divines call legem somitis, is to be understood. For every law is a kind of pattern of that which is done according unto it: in which sense as ^a elsewhere, this moral habit or disposition of the heart is called the frame or segmentum of the heart: so in St. Paul to the Romans it is called a law. But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the law of my mind, and leading me captive unto the law of sin. Again, the nature and inclinations of all creatures are sometimes called ^b laws, so far as they agree with the reason of the law eternal; as the law of a lion, to be fierce or valiant.

Also private contracts among merchants and other tradesmen, do often put on the name of laws. But law commonly and properly is taken, for a right rule, prescribing a necessary mean, for the good of a common-wealth, or civil community. The rest, to wit, the commandments of tyrants, &c. which have not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquæ, are by Thomas called violentie magis quam leges, rather compulsions than laws: And whatsoever is not just, St. Augustine doth not allow for laws, howsoever established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, quæ nec cura dicenda, nec putanda sunt; the unjust constitutions of men, which are neither to be termed or thought laws. For saith Aristotle, ^c Legalia iusta sunt factiva, & conservativa felicitatis; Just laws are the workers and preservers of happiness: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: yea, to life everlasting, according to the scriptures. For the end of the law, saith ^d Plato, is God and his worship: Finis legis Deus & cultus ejus. Lex, or the law, is so called by the Latins, a legendo, or a ligando, of reading or binding: Leges quia lætæ & ad populum lætæ, saith Varro; for after laws were written and published, all men might read them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other etymology, a ligando, is no less agreeable with the nature of a law: whence in the scripture it is called also a yoke, and a band: as ^e confregerunt jugum, diruperunt vincula; They have broken the yoke, they have broken the bands. And in the second Psalms, ^f Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & projiciamus a nobis funes ipsorum; Let us break their bands in sunder, and cast away their cords from us.

The covenant it is called, because of the conditional promises of God: and because of God's people's voluntary submission of themselves unto it: for which word the Septuagint, and the epistle to the Hebrews, use the word διαθήκη, a testament or last will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectual for our salvation, but in respect of the death of the testator; for without the death of the testator, the testament is of no force: as Heb. ix. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrews call the law Thorah of teaching, because every man is thereby taught his duty, both to God and men. The Greeks call it Nomos of distributing, because it distributeth to every man his own due; the power of the law is the power of God: justice being an attribute proper unto God himself. Imperium legis imperium Dei est; The reign of the law is the reign of God.

Law in general is thus defined by the philosophers: Lex est vite regula, præcipiens quæ sunt sequenda, & quæ fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to shun: or Lex est omnium divinarum & humanarum rerum regina; Law is the queen or princess of things both human and divine. But this description is grounded upon the opinion of inevitable fate. Law is the very wisdom of nature: the reason and understanding of the prudent: and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called Index sui & curvi, the demonstration of it self and of the crooked: so is the law, the judge and measure of right and wrong.

M. Hooker calls the law a directive rule to goodness of operation: and tho' law as touching the substance and essence, consist in understanding: Concludit tamen actum voluntatis, yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word jus is also diversly taken, as sometimes for the matter of the law, and for common right: sometimes for the law it self: as jus civile, or jus gentium. ^g Isidore distinguisheth the two general words jus and fas: whereof jus, saith he, hath reference to men, fas to God. Fas lex divina, jus lex humana. To go over another man's field, is permitted, by God's law, not by man's; and therefore in a thing out of controversy, Virgil used both these words: as Fas & jura sinunt, God and men permit.

The word jus or right, is derived or taken from the old substantive noun jussus, a bidding or commandment: or perhaps from the Greek zeus, which is the name of Jupiter, or of the Latin genitive case Jovis; because as the scripture speaks, ^h the judgment is God's. For it is certain, that jus-jurandum came from jovis-jurandum (for so we find it written in Nonius out of the ancient, in which sense the scripture calls it juramentum Jehovæ) so also we may say, that jus came of Jovis, quia Jovis est: because as God is the author, and pattern, and maintainer of right, so also in his ⁱ vicegerents the magistrates, he is the pronouncer and executor of right. Of this jus the just are denominated, justus a jure, and justitia a jussu; the right gives name to the righteous: and justice takes her name from the just.

SECT. V.

Of the definition of laws, and of the law eternal.

BUT because laws are manifold, and that every kind hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to divide and distinguish them. I mean those sorts of laws, from whence all other particulars are drawn: leaving the individuals of human laws to their infinite and horrible confusion.

^a Gen. 6. 5. & 8. 2. ^b So Virgil, continuo has leges æternæque fœdera certis imposuit natura locis; nohere alio it is to be noted, that he joins leges and fœdera together: as in the scripture the law is oftentimes called the covenant ^c Arist. Ethic. 5. 1. ^d Plato in Dial. 1. de Leg. ^e Jer. 5. 5. ^f Psalm. 2. ^g Isid. Etym. ^h Deut. 1. 17. 2 Chron. 19. 6. ⁱ Exod. 22. 11. 1 Kings 2. 43.

The law eternal is thus defined by Thomas :

^a Lex aeterna est aeternus divinae sapientiae conceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso praecognitarum; The eternal law is the eternal concept of God's wisdom, as it is referred to the government of things foreknown by himself. Or ^b Lex aeterna est summa atque aeterna ratio divinae sapientiae : quatenus res omnes ad destinatos fines ita dirigit, ut illis juxta conditionem ipsarum modum aliquem necessitatis adferat; It is the high and eternal reason of divine sapience : as it directeth all things in such sort to their proper ends, imposing a kind of necessity according to their several natures, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: that as the same divine understanding directs all these to their proper ends ; so it is called providence: but as it imposeth a necessity according to the natures of all things which it directs, so is it called a law.

Of this eternal law Cicero took knowledge, when, in his book of laws, he wrote in this manner : Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & a delicto avocans : quae non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est : sed tum cum orta est. Orta autem simul est cum mente divina : quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta ad jubendum & ad vetandum, ratio est recta summi Jovis; That perfect reason and nature of things incouraging or impelling to rightful actions, and calling us back from evil, did not (saith he) then begin to be a law when it was written : but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with divine understanding, and therefore a true law and a fit princeps to command and forbid, is the right reason of the most high God. This eternal law (if we consider it in God, or as God) is always one and the same ; the nature of God being most simple : but as it is referred to divers objects, so the reason of man finds it diverse and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessary, as the motions of the heavens, stability of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent; another law to men, another to other creatures, having life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternal law all things are directed, as by the counsel and providence of God: from this law all laws are derived, as from the rule universal : and thereto referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

^c The eternal, and the divine law, differ only in consideration; the eternal directing more largely, as well every creature to their proper and natural ends, as it doth man to his supernatural: but the divine law to a supernatural end only: the natural law is thence derived, but an effect of the eternal, as it were a stream from this fountain.

The law human or temporal is also thence drawn, in that it hath the form of right reason: from which if it differ, it is then impositio iniqua, a wicked imposition, and only borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternal law all things are subjected, as well angels and men, as all other creatures, or things created ; whether necessary or contingent, natural or moral, and human. For the law eternal runneth through all the universal, and therefore it is the law also of things which are simple, natural and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creator and Director : as, ^d Praise him all ye his angels : praise him sun and moon, all bright stars : heavens of heavens; for he hath established them for ever and ever. He hath made an ordinance which shall not pass : praise ye the Lord from the earth ye dragons and all depths : fire and hail, snow and vapours, stormy winds, which execute his word : mountains and hill : fruitful trees and all cedars : beasts, and all cattel, &c. Now as the reasonable creatures are by this eternal law bound, by the glory and felicity proposed unto them (beatitude being both the attractive, and the end) so all other natural things and creatures, have in themselves, and in their own natures, an obedience formal to it, without any proper intention, known cause, or end proposed. For beasts are led by sense, and natural instinct: things without life by their created form, or formal appetites, as that which is heavy to fall downward : things light to mount upward, &c. and fire to heat whatsoever is apposed. This kind of working the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature: others to fate ; a difference used in terms only ; it being no other than God's general providence : for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia : so are all things which appear in themselves thence derived : there-under subjected : thence-from by his eternal law and providence directed, even from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heaven and in earth.

The Schoolmen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these laws : and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternal law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who have thencefrom, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetite, to conduct them : so is the object and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to St. Augustine, ^e Lex aeterna est, quae justum est ut omnia sint ordinatissima; The law eternal is that, whereby it is just, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

Lastly, It is disputed, whether the eternal law be immutable, yea or no? but the resolution is, that it changeth not ; for which St. Augustine useth a sufficient argument in his first book of Free-Will, the sixth chapter. For the law of Moses, which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last until the time of the Pedagogy of God's people, or introduction to Christ should be expired ; which time of expiration some think our Saviour noted to be come, when on the cross he said, ^a Consummatum est. But I rather think these words of our Saviour to have no other signification, than that now the prophecy of their giving him vinegar to drink was fulfilled. For so St. John expounds it, when he saith, ver. 28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, Ut consummaretur scriptura, That the scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: tho' I deny not, but at the same time also the date of the law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremonial, and of so much of the judicial, as appertaineth peculiarly to the Jews, and agreeth not with the law of the new testament and gospel of Christ. For the immutable law of God, tho' prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it self; but the things prescribed, change according to this eternal ordinance, of which the Wisdom of Solomon, And being one she can do all things, and remaining in herself reneweth all.

Of the law of nature.

OF the law of nature, as it is taken in general, I find no definition among the schoolmen: only as it is considered in man, it is called, The impression of divine light, and a participation of the eternal law in the reasonable creature; ^b Lex naturalis est impressio divini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis æternæ in rationali creatura. Ulpian defines the natural law to be the same which nature hath taught all living creatures; Jus naturale est quod natura omnia animalia docuit: and he afterwards addeth, Jus istud non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium quæ terra marique nascuntur, avium quoque commune est; The law of nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all living creatures, as well to birds, as to those which the land and sea produceth. But this definition is not general, but of the natural law in things of life.

The law of nature in general, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formal quality, which God in his eternal providence hath given and imprinted in the nature of every creature, animate and inanimate. And as it is divinum lumen in men, enlightning our formal reason; so is it more than sense in beasts; and more than vegetation in plants. For it is not sense alone in beasts, which teacheth them at first sight, and without experience or instruction, to fly from the enemies of their lives: seeing that bulls and horses appear unto the sense more fearful and terrible, than the least kind of dogs: and yet the hare and deer feed by the one, and fly from the other, yea, tho' by them never seen before, and that as soon as they fall from their dams. Neither is it sense which hath taught other beasts to provide for winter, birds to build their nests, high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the birds of India to make their nests on the smallest twigs which hang over rivers, and not on any other part of the tree, or elsewhere, to save their eggs and young ones from the monkeys, and other beasts, whose weight such a twig will not bear: and which would fear to fall into the water. The instances of this kind are exceeding many which may be given. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that some trees, as the female of the Palmito, will not bear any fruit, except the male grow in sight. But this they do by that law, which the infinite and unsearchable wisdom of God had in all eternity provided for them, and for every nature created. In man this law is double, corrupt and incorrupt; corrupt, where the reason of man hath made it self subject, and a vassal to passions, and affections brutal: and incorrupt, where time and custom hath bred in men a new nature, which also, as is aforesaid, is a kind of law. For it was not by the law of nature incorrupt, which ^d St. Augustine calleth the law of reason, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft, and that other nations were by law constrained to become idolaters; that by the laws of ^e Lycurgus it was permitted to men to use one another's wife, and to the women to choosethem others besides their husbands, to beget them with child: which law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

The ^f Scythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawful to bury with them the best beloved wives: as also they have many other customs remembered by G. Valentia, against nature and right reason.

And I know not from what authority it is, that these laws some men avow to be natural: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithless among the faithless: to provide for our selves by another man's destruction: that injury is not done to him that is willing: to destroy those whom we fear, and the like. For taking the definition of natural laws, either out of ^g St. Augustine or Aquinas (the one calling it the impression of divine light; the other, the dictate or sentence of practic reason) the same can teach us, or incline us to no other thing, than to the exercise of justice and uprightness: and not to offer or perform any thing towards others, save that which we would be content should be offered or performed towards our selves. For such is the law of nature to the mind, as the eye is to the body; and that which according to ^h David sheweth us good, that is, the observation of those things which lead us thereby to our last end; which is eternal life: tho' of themselves not sufficient without faith and grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of nature, where the corruption is not taken for the law, is, as aforesaid, the impression of God's divine light in men, and a participation of the law increated and eternal. For without any law written, the right reason and understanding, which God hath given us, are abilities within our selves, sufficient to give us knowledge of the good and evil, which by our gratitude to God, and distribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchase for our selves. ⁱ For when the Gentiles (saith St. Paul) which have not the law, do by nature those things contained in the law: they having not the law, are a law unto themselves. Now, to love God by whom we are, and to do the same right unto all men, which we desire should be done unto us, is an effect of the purest reason: in whose highest turrets, the quiet of conscience hath made her resting place, and habitation; In arce altissima rationis quies habitat. Therefore, the Gentiles (saith St. Paul) ^k which shew the effects of the law written in their hearts, have their consciences for a witness of those effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a law unto himself (while he hopeth to abuse the world by the advantage of hypocrisy) worketh nothing else, but the betraying of his own soul, by crafty unrighteousness, purchasing eternal perdition. For it helpeth us not to hide our corrupt hearts from the world's eye, seeing from him who is an infinite eye, we cannot hide them: some garlands we may gather in this may-game of the world, Sed flos ille, dum loquimur, arefcit; Those flowers wither while we discourse of their colours, or are gathering them. That we should therefore inhabit and dwell within our selves, and become fearful witnesses of our secretest evils, did that reverend philosopher Pythagoras teach in this golden precept: Nil turpe committas, neque coram aliis, neque tecum, maxime omnium verere teipsum; Commit nothing foul or dishonest, faith he, neither to be known to others, nor to thine own heart, but above all men reverence thine own conscience. And this may be a precept of nature and right reason: by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodies, are inclined to those operations, which are answerable to their own form; as fire to give heat. Now, as the reasonable mind is the form of man, so is he aptly moved to those things which his proper form presenteth unto him: to wit, to that which right reason offereth; and the acts of right reason, are the acts of virtue: and in the breach of the rules of this reason, is man least excusable, as being a reasonable creature. For all else, both sensitive, growing, and inanimate, obey the law which God imposed on them at their first creation.

The earth performeth her office, according to the law of God in nature; for it bringeth forth the bud of the herb which seedeth seed, &c. and the beast which liveth thereon. He gave a law to the seas, and commanded them to keep their bounds: which they obey. ^bHe made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the thunders. He caused the sun to move, and to give light, and to serve for signs and for seasons. Were these as rebellious as man, for whose sake they were created, or did they once break the law of their natures and forms; the whole world would then perish, and all return to the first Chaos, darkness and confusion.

By this natural law, or law of human reason, did Cain perceive his own wickedness, and offence, in the murder of Abel: for he not only feared the displeasure of God, but the revenge of men: it being written in his reason, that whatsoever he performed towards others, the same by others might be done unto him again. And that this judgment of well and evil doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternal law, before the law written: Moses in the person of God witnesseth, Gen. iv. If thou do well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou do not well, sin lieth at thy door.

The schoolmen are large also in this question of the natural law, the same being opened amply by Reinerius, Antoninus, and Valentia. But it is not to my purpose to write a volume of this subject.

But this law which Thomas Aquinas calleth An act of reason taken properly, and not a habit, as it is an evident natural judgment of practick reason: they divide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration (as that good is to be followed, and evil eschewed;) and demonstrable, which is evidently proved, out of higher and more universal propositions. Again, as it answereth the natural appetite, prescribing things to be desired as good, or to be avoided as evil (as of the first, to desire to live, and to satisfy hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew pains, sorrow, and death;) in this consideration they divide it, according to the divers kinds of appetites that are in us. For in every man there are three sorts of appetites, which answer the three degrees of natural law. The first is to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the desire both to live, and to preserve our being and life, also the desire of issue, with care to provide for them: for the father after his death lives in his children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemonstrable laws of nature, for the most part. For it needs no proof, that all creatures should desire to be, to live, and to be defended, and to live in their issue, when they cannot in themselves. And as man is a being, Ens or Res; so he doth desire good and shun evil. For it is common to all things, to desire things agreeable to their own natures, which is, to desire their own good. And so is good defined by Aristotle, to be that which all desire. Which definition Basil upon the xlvth Psalme approveth: Recte quidem bonum definierunt, quod omnia expetunt; Rightly have some men defined good or goodness, to be that which all things desire.

The second kind of appetite is of those things which appertain to us, as we have sense. Whence, by the law of nature, we desire the delights of every sense; but with such moderation, as may neither glut us with satiety, nor hurt us with excess. For as sense it self is for the preservation of life and being: so is it meet, even by the law of nature, that the sensitive appetite should not carry us to the destruction, either of our life or being. And altho' (seeing both these kinds of appetites are in beasts) we may well say, that nature hath given divers laws unto them: in which sense the civilians define natural right, or jus naturale, to be the same which nature hath taught all living creatures; yet the schoolmen admit not, that the instincts of beasts can be properly called a law, but only a jus, or right, which is the matter and aim of every law. For so they distinguish it, where Ulpian affirmeth, that jus naturale is that, which nature hath taught all living creatures. In this place, faith Valentia, jus is not to be taken for a law, but for the matter of the law. And yet where Ulpian also distinguisheth the right belonging to living creatures in general, from the right belonging to men; calling the one jus nature, the other jus gentium: the divines understand the law of nature more largely, that is, for all evident dictates, precepts, or bidlings of divine reason, both in beasts and men; and restrain the law of nations to a kind of human right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertain properly to man, as he is a living creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our neighbour, as for our selves; and the laws of this appetite are the commandments of our religion.

Now altho' there are many other branches and divisions of this law of nature answering the division of matter, which it prescribeth, and as manifold, as the moral actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth: yet is the law of nature but one law, according to Aquinas: first, because it hath one fountain or root in the natural or motive faculty, which is but one, stirring up to good, and declining the contrary: secondly, Because all is contained in that general natural precept, that good is to be followed and ill avoided: and thirdly, Because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last end.

That this law of nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifest: and chiefly man, because he is endued with reason; in whom as reason groweth, so this band of observing the law of nature increaseth; "Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod scriptum est, adveniente mandato, peccatum revixit"

^a Gen. i. ^b Job. 28. ^c Tho. q. 94. Art. 2. ^d Ethic. I. c. 1. ^e Basil.

When reason grew to perfection, then it came to pass, which was written by St. Paul, when the commandment came, sin revived. Neither is it a small warrant for this law of nature, when those which break the same, are said by St. Paul, "To be delivered over unto a reprobate sense (or mind) to do those things which are not convenient : and again, "that their consciences bear witness and their thoughts accuse them. For tho' this law of nature stretch not to every particular; as to command fasting and the like, yet it commandeth in general all good, and whatsoever is agreeable to right and reason. And therefore, said Damascene, "Homines facti sunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam est ; Men, saith he, are made evil, by declining unto that which is contrary to nature : and St. Augustine, Omne vitium naturæ nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam est ; Every vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary unto it.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of nature so streight, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For whereas by this law all men are born lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to unequal merit : by taking from the evil, and giving to the good : and by permitting and commanding that all men shall enjoy the fruits of their labours to themselves : according to the rules of justice and equity.

And tho' the law of nature command, that all things be restored which are left in trust, yet in some causes, this her law she suffereth to be broken : as to deny a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was sober. But the universal principles can no more be changed, than the decrees of God are alterable : who according to "St. Paul, abideth faithful, and cannot deny himself.

Of the written law of God.

AFTER the eternal and natural, the law positive or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kinds ; divine and human. Again, the divine positive law is double ; the old and new : the old was given unto Moses in mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the world had stood 2513 whole years, and in the 67th day of this year, when as Ascatades or Ascades governed the Assyrians ; Merathus, the Sycionians ; Triopus, the Argives ; Cecrops, Attica, and Acheres, Egypt : to wit, after the promise to Abraham 430 years. And this, it seems, was the first written law which the world received. For the very word Nomos signifying a law, was not then, nor long after, invented by the Grecians ; no not in Homer's time, who lived after the fall of Troy 80 years at least : and Troy it self was cast down 335 years after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This law it pleased God to engrave in stone, that it might remain a lasting book of his express'd will in the Church ; and that the priests and people might have whereof to meditate, till the coming of Christ : and that so these children of Israel, tho' bred among an idolatrous people in Egypt, might be without excuse : the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason known to us why this law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their lives long, the elders of families might easily without any written law instruct their own children : and yet as they increased, so doubtless they had, besides the law of nature, many precepts from God, before the law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the law of nature did not define all kinds of good and evil ; nor condemn every sin in particular : nor sufficiently terrify the consciences of offenders : nor so expound divine worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gave every day less authority than other to the natural law ; in these respects it was necessary, that the law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men : which before they might, but would not read in their own consciences. The schoolmen, and the fathers before them, inlarge the causes and necessity why the law was written, whereof these are the chiefest.

The first, for restraining of sin, directly grounded upon this place of David ; The law of the Lord is undefiled, converting souls : the testimonies of the Lord are faithful, giving wisdom to children. For the human law, saith St. Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment ; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit : but the divine law written, forbiddeth every evil, and therefore by David it is called undefiled.

Secondly, It serveth for the direction of our minds. For the laws of men can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internal motions, or of our disposition and will : and yet it is required, that we be no less clean in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words converting our souls, added by David : wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the cabalists. Actiones hominum nullæ essent, nisi prius in mente dicerentur ; The actions of men, say they, would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the mind.

Thirdly, It leadeth us to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diversity of opinion, and difference of peculiar laws among sundry nations, we cannot be assured of ; but the law of God bindeth all men, and is without error : and therefore also said David ; That the testimony of the law of God is faithful : giving wisdom to children.

S E C T. VIII.

Of the unwritten law of God, given to the patriarchs by tradition.

NOW, that in all this long tract of time, between the creation and the written law, the world and people of God were left altogether to the law of reason and nature, it doth not appear. For the patriarchs of the first age received many precepts from God himself, and whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was observed by Seth, who instructed Enos : from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Yea many particular commandments afterwards written, were formerly imposed and delivered over by tradition ; which kind of teaching the Jews afterwards called Cabala, or Receptio ; Precepts received from the mouth of their priests and elders : to which the Jews after the law written, added the interpretation of secret mysteries, reserved in the bosoms of their priests, and unlawful to be uttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any ; as being indeed the divine law revealed to the patriarchs, and from them delivered to the posterity, when as yet it was unwritten. The commandments which God gave unto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all beasts, according to their natures ; to whose perfection of understanding they were sufficiently known. For finding the reason of his own name Adam or Adamah, earth, or red clay, he gave other names significant, not only to beasts, but to his children and nephews, which afterwards his issues imitated ; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the church, or rather, one given in recompence for Abel that was slain : and Enosh signifieth man or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to live by the labour thereof : God also gave him the choice of all fruits, but the forbidden ; and in Adam also was marriage first instituted : all men thence-after being commanded to cohabit with their wives, rather than with their father and mother.

That murder and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the law written, and before the flood it self, is manifest. God himself making it appear, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankind by the general flood. For God said unto Noah, An end of all flesh is come before me : for the earth is filled with cruelty through them : and behold I will destroy them^a from the earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be unknown to all that perished : God's mercy and justice interposing between the untaught and revenge.

This commandment God repeated to Noah, after the waters were dried up from the earth. Who-so sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed : for in the image of God hath he made man.

Also the law of honouring and reverencing our parents, was observed among the faithful, and the contrary punished by the father's curse : as, Cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren. Again, we find that the unnatural sin of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree ; as with fire from heaven. The sin of adultery and ravishment, was before the law no less detested than the rest, as appeareth by that revenge, taken for Dina's forcing : and by the judgment which Juda gave against Tamar, That she should be burnt : and by the repentance of Pharaoh and Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the woman which thou hast taken : for she is a man's wife. To these we may add the ordinance of sacrifice, of distinction of clean beasts, of circumcision, of the brother to raise up seed to his brother, that left a widow childless, and divers other constitutions, partly moral, and partly ceremonial, which being delivered before the written law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Divine law imposed, of which the law of Moses containeth that which is called the Old Testament, may be said, not only to have been written in the hearts of men, before it was engraven in stone, but also in substance, to have been given in precept to the patriarchs. For as St. Paul witnesseth of himself, I knew not sin, but by the law : so the law ever naturally preceded, and went before offences, tho' written after offences committed.

It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kind of unwritten law ; the angels intuitively ; men by reason ; beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse ; plants by their vegetative powers ; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or preception.

SECT. IX.

Of the moral, judicial, and ceremonial law, with a note prefixed, How the scripture speaketh not always in one sense, when it nameth the law of Moses.

NOW as the word [law] in general, as is aforesaid, hath divers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and restrain : so this law, called the law of Moses in particular, is taken by St. Paul diversly ; as sometimes for all the Old Testament, as, Now we know whatsoever the law saith, it saith to them which are under the law.

When it is opposed, or differenced from the prophets and Psalms, it is there taken for the five books of Moses. For so St. Luke hath distinguished them ; as, All must be fulfilled which are written of me in the law, in the prophets, and in the psalms.

When it is opposed to the gospel, then it is taken for the law moral, ceremonial, and judicial ; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is justified by faith without the works of the law.

When it is opposed to grace, it signifieth the declaration of God's wrath, and our guilt of condemnation ; or the extremity of the law, and summum jus : as, For ye are not under the law, but under grace.

When it is opposed to the truth, namely, where the ceremonies or signs are taken for the things signified ; as the sacrifice for Christ, and the like : then it signifieth but shadows and figures ; as The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.

Lastly, When it is opposed to the time of Christ's coming, it signifieth the whole policy of the Jews commonweal ; as, Before faith came, we were kept under the law, &c. or the law of the order and institution of the Aaronical priesthood ; as, All the prophets, and the law, or the priests, prophesied unto John. And if the priesthood be changed, the law also, to wit, of the priesthood, must needs be changed.

The word [law] is sometimes also taken by the figure Metonymia, for interest, authority, and empire, or for constraining force ; as, The law of the Spirit of life, the law or the force of sin and death, the enforcements of concupiscence, &c.

But the written law of Moses, or the law of the Old Testament, of which we now speak, is thus defined : The law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding holiness and justice, promising eternal life conditionally, that is, to the observers of the law, and threatening death to those which break the law in the least. For, according to St. James, Who-soever keepeth the whole, and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition of the schoolmen, in which both the old and new law are comprehended, is thus given, Lex divina est divinum decretum, hominibus prescribens modum necessarium ut apte pervenire possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quæ est ultimus humanæ vitæ finis ; The divine law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing unto men a necessary mean, whereby they may aptly attain supernatural beatitude, which is the last end of man's life.

^a The common reading is cum terra : but God did not destroy the earth, and why may not this preposition in this place have the same force which it hath, according to Junius, Gen. 4. 1. Item 44. 4. and Deut. 34. 1. Especially, seeing these words are but a repetition of that which is said, verse 7. Delebo hominem de superficie terræ. ^b Gen. 9. 6. ^c Gen. 9. 25. ^d Gen. 34. 25. ^e Gen. 34. 24. ^f Rom. 3. 19. ^g Luke 24. 44. ^h Rom. 3. 28. ⁱ Rom. 6. 4. ^k Gal. 3. 18. ^l John 1. 17. ^m Gal. 3. 23. ⁿ Luke 16. 6. ^o Heb. 7. 12. and 10. 1. ^p Rom. 8. 2. and 7. 23. ^q James 2. 10.

The law of Moses hath three parts : moral, ceremonial, and judicial. The moral part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that evil to be avoided, in particular ; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to be done ; as do this, for I am the Lord ; whereas the law of nature commands it but in general. Again, the moral law entreateth of virtue and goodness ; the ceremonial of divine service, and of holiness (for external worship, and the order of hallowing ourselves unto God, is called ceremony ;) and the judicial teacheth the particular government, fit for the commonwealth of the Jews, and prescribeth orders for justice and equity. And therefore was it said of St. Paul, Rom. vii. 12. The commandment is just, holy and good : just, or justice, being referred to the judicial ; holy or holiness, to the ceremonial ; good, or honest, to the moral. The judicial part is touching the government of the commonwealth of the Jews, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons.

The ceremonial is divided into four parts, according to the four kinds of things, of which it speaketh, to wit, sacrifice, holy things, sacraments, and observances. To sacrifices belong beasts, and the fruits of the earth ; to holy things the tabernacle, temple, vessels, altars, and the like ; to sacraments, circumcision, the passover and such like. For the observances, they consisted either in prohibition of certain meats, as not to eat the blood and fat of beasts : or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifyings, anointings, and attire, as not to wear mixt garments of linen and woollen ; as also it prohibiteth other unnatural and improper commixtions, as, Thou shalt not yoke together in a plough an ox and an ass, or cast mingled seed in one field. It also exhorteth natural compassion, and forbiddeth cruelty even to beasts, birds and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For so some refer these precepts ; Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest, nor beat down the first buds of the tree, nor muzzle the labouring ox, and the like, to the ceremonial law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respects, the same power which it had before the coming of Christ. For the moral liveth still, and is not abrogated or taken away : saving in the ability of justifying or condemning ; for therein are we commanded to love and worship God, and to use charity one towards another ; which for ever shall be required at our hands. Therein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done : which power of directing by special rules and precepts of life it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both testaments to be observed ; tho' principally for the fear of God in the one, and for the love of God in the other.

The ceremonial also liveth in the things which it fore-signified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body itself is represented to us. Besides, it still liveth, in that it giveth both instruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giveth direction to the Church for some ceremonies and types of holy signification, which are still expedient ; tho' in a far fewer number than before Christ's coming, and in a far less degree of necessity.

Lastly, The judicial liveth in substance, and concerning the end and the natural and universal equity thereof.

But the moral faileth in the point of justification, the ceremonial, as touching the use and external observation (because Christ himself is come, of whom the ceremonies were signs and shadows) and the judicial is taken away, as far forth as it was peculiar to the Jews commonweal and policy.

SECT. X.

A proposal of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the five first.

AS for that which remaineth in the general consideration of the divine written law, it may in effect be reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the law.
2. The majesty of the law-giver.
3. The property and peculiarity of the people receiving it.
4. The conveniency of the time in which it was given.
5. The efficacy and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.
7. The end and use of the law.
8. The sense and understanding of the law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the law is sufficiently proved by St. Paul in these words, Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment is holy, and just, and good : which three attributes are referred, as aforesaid, to the moral, ceremonial, and judicial.

2. The majesty of the law-giver is approved in all his creatures : who, as he hath given all things their lives, and beings, so he only gave the law, who could only give the end and reward promised, to wit, the salvation of mankind : but he gave it not to Moses immediately, but by the ministry of angels, as it is said. And the law was ordained by angels, in the hand of a Mediator : and in the Acts, He gave the law by the ordinance of angels.

3. The propriety and peculiarity of the people, receiving this law, is in three respects. First, In that they were prepared : Secondly, In that they were a nation apart and severed : Thirdly, In that they were the children of the promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other nations were idolaters. A nation apart and severed they were, because of God's choice and election. Children of the promise they were, for the promise was made by God unto Abraham, and his seed : not unto his seeds, as to Esau and Jacob, but to his seed, as to Jacob, or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made : he saith not to the seeds, as speaking of many, but to thy seed, as of one, which is Christ.

4. The conveniency of the time, in which it was given, is noted by St. Augustine : that it was about the middle time, between the law of nature and grace : the law of nature continued from Adam to Moses : the law written in the commandments, received by Moses in the world's year 2514, continued to the baptism of John ; from which time began the law of grace, which shall continue to the world's end. Other reasons for the conveniency are formerly given.

5. The fifth consideration is of the efficacy of this law, the same being a disposition to, or sign of, our justification : but not by itself sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousness in moral precepts. For through the passion of Christ were sins forgiven, who taketh away the sins of the world: and therefore St. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law ^a beggarly and weak; beggarly, as containing no grace, weak; as not able to forgive and justify. The ^b blood of goats and bulls, and the ashes of an heifer could only cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christ's blood, which doth cleanse the inward soul. ^c For if the law could justify, then Christ died in vain.

^b Gal. 3. 6.

SECT. XI.

Of the sixth point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the old and new testament.

THE old and new testament differ in name, and in the mean and way proposed for attaining to salvation; as the old by works, the new by grace: but in the thing it self, or object and remote end, they agree: which is, man's happiness and salvation.

The old testament, or law, or letter, or the witness of God's will, was called the old, because it preceded the new testament; which is an explication of the old: from which the new taketh witness. Yet the new of more excellency, in that it doth more lively express, and openly and directly delineate the ways of our redemption. It is also called the old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: ^d In that he saith the new testament, he hath abrogated the old. For the old law, tho' greatly extolled by the prophets, and delivered with wonderful miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perishable: but the new was given in a promise of an everlasting kingdom, and therefore called in the Apocalypse, a testament and gospel for ever during.

The old testament is called a law, because the first and chief part is the law of Moses, of which the prophets and Psalms are commentaries, explicating that law.

The new testament is called the gospel, because the first and chief part thereof is the glad tidings of our redemption: the other books, as the epistles or letters of the apostles, and the acts or story of the apostles, are plentiful interpreters thereof: the word Euangelion signifying a joyful, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homer used it) the reward given to the messenger, bringing joyful news. It is also sometimes taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing success, as by Xenophon. In the scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tidings in general, as in Isaiah lii. 7. concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellency it is restrained to signify that most joyful message of salvation, as in Luke ii. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the history of ^e Christ: and so we understand the four gospels.

Lastly, For the preaching and divulging the doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. ix. 14. and 2 Cor. viii. 18.

The agreement of both testaments (taken, I think, as they are divided in volumes) is by Daneus comprised in these four.

In their author.

In the substance of the covenant, or things promised.

In the foundation, to wit, Christ.

In the effects, that is, in righteousness and justification.

In the author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one testament and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was ever one church, so was there one covenant, one adoption, and one doctrine. As the old law doth point at Christ, so doth the new law teach Christ: the old proposing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one and the same end, even the salvation of our souls: which, according to St. Peter, is the end of our faith. For altho' it be said, that Moses did promise by observing the law an earthly kingdom, a land flowing with milk and hony, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the fathers of those spiritual blessings by Christ; for by the earthly he raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the fathers, notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselves strangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Jerusalem: According to this place of Heb. xi. 13. All these died in faith, and received not the promises, but saw them afar off, and believed them: confessing that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. To which purpose also St. Augustine; ^f Omnino pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes per promissa terrena æterna promitti; Few (saith he) do understand the old law: not attending that by things earthly eternal are promised. And St. Jerome, ^g Noluit Deus pascere Judeos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibusque, ut Judæi somniant; God would not feed the Jews as beasts with corporal gifts and riches, as themselves dream. And this may be gathered out of God's own words, Ego sum Deus tuus, & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God; for the words, I will be your God, prove that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gave them this promise; but in respect of the future: to wit, the safety of their souls. For as God created both body and soul, so hath he of his goodness not left the better part uncared for, which liveth ever.

The agreement between the old and new testament in substance, infers also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the law, laid both by the apostles and prophets: in whom all the promises of God in the old and new, are assured: the fathers having eaten the same spiritual food, which we eat in our sacraments.

The agreement in effects is, in that the knowledge of our sin and misery, which is taught us by the law, maketh way, and, as it were, serveth in subordination to the gospel, the proper effects whereof are mercy and salvation: to which the law serving as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sin and misery, God sheweth his mercy and salvation) may be said to agree with the gospel in the effects. For otherwise, if we sever the law from subordination to the gospel, the effects are very different: the one sheweth the way of righteousness by works, the other by faith; the law woundeth, the gospel healeth: the law terrifieth, the gospel allureth: Moses accuseth, Christ defendeth: Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth: the old restraineth the hand, the new the mind. ^h Data est lex quæ non sanaret (saith St. Augustine) sed quæ ægrogantes probaret; The law was given not to help, but to discover sickness: and St. Chrysostom, Data est lex, ut se homo inveniret; non ut morbus sanaretur, sed ut medicus quæreretur; The law was given that man might find and know his own imperfection: not that his disease was thereby holpen; but that he might then seek out the physician. For Christ came to save the world, which the law had condemned. And as ⁱ Moses was but a servant, and Christ a son, so the greatest benefit was reserved to be brought, as by the worthiest person, saith Cyril: for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

S E C T. XII.

Of the rest of the points proposed.

THE seventh consideration is of the end and use of the law: which is to bring us to Christ: for finding no righteousness in our own works, we must seek it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and utmost end: the next and proper end of the law, is to prescribe righteousness, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God.  Cursed is he which continueth not in all the things of this law.*

The second end of the law, is to render us inexcusable before God: who knowing so perfect a law, do not keep it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or half obedience: but both inward and outward righteousness, and performance of duty to God and men.

The third and chief end of the law is, as hath been said, to send us to Christ, and his Grace, being in our selves condemned and lost. For the law was delivered with thunder, and with a most violent and fearful tempest, threatening eternal death.

The fourth end of the law was to design, and preserve, the place of the church and true people of God; and to hold them in one discipline and awe, till the coming of Christ: after whom the church was to be dispersed over the whole world.

These be the ends of the moral law. The end and use of the ceremonial law, is to confirm the truth of Christ, and the new testament. The use of the judicial, to teach us natural equity and right, whereto we must conform our selves.

The sense and understanding of the law is double, literal and spiritual: by the literal, we are taught the worship and service of God: by the spiritual, the figures and mystical fore-speakings of Christ.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the law, the same had being until the passion of Christ: before which time, and while Christ taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true sacrifice was offered upon the altar of the cross, then the Jewish sacrifices and ceremonies, which were types and figures of Christ (Christ being the body of those shadows) ceased to bind the consciences any longer: the mystery of our redemption being now by Christ and in him finished. In token whereof the veil of the temple rent asunder; noting that the ceremonial veils and shadows were now to be removed, not that the moral law of the commandments was hereby abolished, or weakened at all: otherwise than that it had not power to condemn according to the Jewish doctrine, as aforesaid. For the observing of the law was by Christ himself severely commanded: our love towards God being thereby to be witnessed. And herein David so much rejoiced, as he preferred the observation of the law, before all that the world could yield. In via testimoniorum tuorum delectatus sum, sicut in omnibus divitiis; I have been delighted in thy law as in all manner of riches: and again, The law of thy mouth is good for me above thousands of gold and silver. This is the love of God (saith St. John i. 5.) that we keep his commandment. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himself in Deuteronomy witnesseth,  This commandment* (saith he) which I command thee this day is not bid from thee, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven that thou shouldest say who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it us, and cause us to hear it that we may do it? neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say, who shall go over the sea for us, and bring it us?

&c. but the word is very near unto thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart for to do it. Behold (saith Moses) I have set before thee this day life and death, good and evil, in that I command thee this day to love the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his commandments, and his ordinances, and his laws, that thou mayst live, &c. Neither is it said in vain in St. Matthew ix. 17. Si vis ad vitam ingredi, serva mandata; If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments: and in St. John xii. 50. Scio quia mandatum ejus vita eterna est; I know that his commandment is life everlasting. And if this be the charity of God, or of men towards God, as St. John hath taught, to wit, that we keep his commandments: certainly he is but a liar, that professeth to love God, and neglecteth to observe the word of his will, with all his power. And tho' I confess it is not in man's ability, without the special grace of God, to fulfil the law (Christ only as man excepted) yet if we rightly consider the merciful care which God had of his people in those his commandments, we shall find in our selves, how we borrow liberty, and rather let slip our affections, and voluntarily loosen them, from the chains of obedience, to which the word of God and divine reason hath fastened them, than that we are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our mind (greedy of liberty) proposeth to it self. For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments, and his commandments are not grievous, 1 John iii. 12. and if we examine every precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the ballance of our consciences; it is not hard for any man to judge, by what easy persuasions, we steal away from our own power, as unwilling to use it against our pleasing desires.

Of the several commandments of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the commandments, but by our default.

FOR by the first we are commanded to acknowledge, serve, and love one God. Now, whereby are we inticed to the breach of this precept? seeing every reasonable man may conceive and know, that infinite power cannot be divided into many infinities: and that it is of necessity that by this Almighty unity, all things have been caused, and are continued. And if brute beasts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his providence he hath also provided for every of them,  which giveth to beast their food, &c.* there is no doubt but that they would also serve and love him only.

The second precept is the forbidding of idolatry, and worship of images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the invention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true:  Omnia mala exempla bonis initiis orta sunt;* All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keep the memory of men famous for their virtue: until (saith Lactantius) the devil crept into them, and (having blotted out the first intent) working in weak and ignorant souls, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serve himself thereby. For what reasonable man, if he be not forsaken of God, will call on those blind, deaf, and dumb, and dead stocks, more worthless than the most worthless of those, that having life and reason, implore their help, which have neither: yea, of more vile prize and baser, than the basest of beasts, who have sense and estimation? for what do we thereby (saith the Wisdom of Solomon) ^a but call to the weak for help, pray to the dead for life, require aid of him that hath no experience, assistance in our journies of him that cannot go, and success in our affairs of him that hath no power? And whether the idolater, or the block, to which he prayeth, be more senseless, David maketh a doubt. ^b For (saith he) they that make them are like unto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them.

The breach of the third commandment is neither persuaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit: the two greatest inchanters of mortal men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible disdain of God, unless the hate of good men, and God's curse, be accounted an advantage. For as our corruptest nature gives us nothing towards it, so can it satisfy no one appetite, except everlasting sorrow, and hell dwell in our desire. And therefore this strange custom hath the devil brought up among men, without all subtlety of argument, or cunning persuasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornful advantage over us. For slaughter satisfieth hatred, theft gives satisfaction to need, adultery to lust, oppression to covetousness: but this contemptuous offence of blasphemy, and the irreverent abuse of God's name, as it giveth no help to any of our worldly affections, so the most savage nations of the world do not use it.

The fourth commandment, to keep the sabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burthen, nor inconvenience. For it giveth rest to the labourer, and consolation to their masters. And that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law: as in Exod. xxiii. 12. And in the seventh day thou shalt rest, that thine ox and thine ass may rest, and the son of thy maid, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The first of the second table to honour our parents, with whom we are one and the same, is a gratitude which nature it self hath taught us towards them, who after God gave us life and being, have begotten us, and born us, cherished us in our weak and helpless infancy, and bestowed on us the harvest and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore in the temporal and judicial ordinances, cursing of parents, or the offering them violence, was made death.

The next is, that thou shalt not murder, that is, thou shalt not do the acts following the affections of hatred. For the law of God, and after it our own laws, and in effect the law of all nations, have made difference between slaughter casual, and furious. Affectio enim tua (saith Bracon) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the work such as it is. And certainly whosoever cannot forbear to commit murder, hath neither the grace of God, nor any use of his own will.

The third of the second table, commands us from adultery. Now, if the preservation of ^c virginity have been possible, for thousands of men and women, who in all ages have mastered their fleshly desires, and have returned chaste to the grave: it cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the dishonour and injury, which we offer to others by such a violation, seeing marriage is permitted by the laws of God, and men, to all that affect it. And there is no man living, whom the desire of beauty and form hath so constrained, but he might with ease forbear the prosecution of this ill: did not himself give suck to this infant, and nourish warmth till it grow to strong heat, heat till it turn to fire, and fire to flame.

The fourth of the second table, is, that we shall not steal. And if that kind of violent robbery had been used in Moses's time, which many ruffians practise now-a-days in England, and; to the dishonour of our nation, more in England than in any region of the world among Christians, out of doubt he would have censured them by death, and not by restitution, tho' quadruple. For I speak not of the poor and miserable souls; whom hunger and extreme necessity inforceth, but of those detested thieves, who, to maintain themselves lord-like, assault, rob, and wound the merchant, artificer, and labouring-man, or break by violence into other men's houses, and spend in bravery, drunkenness, and upon harlots, in one day, what other men sometimes have laboured for all their lives; impoverishing whole families, and taking the bread and food from the mouths of their children. And that this commandment might easily be observed, it would soon appear, if princes would resolve but for a few years to pardon none. For it is the hope of life, and the argument of sparing the first offence, that encourageth these hell-hounds. And if every man presume to be pardoned once, there is no state or commonwealth, but these men would in a short time impoverish or destroy it.

The fifth commandment of this second table, is, the prohibition of false witness: from which if men could not forbear, all surety of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witness, and a false accuser, especially in matters criminal, that the law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falsehood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten commandments forbiddeth us to covet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wives for concupiscence, or their goods for desire of gain. And this precept seemeth the hardest for men to observe; so esteemed by reason of our frail affections: and yet if we judge hereof rightly, it may be doubted whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies and vain thoughts. For altho' it be not easy to master all our sudden passions, yet we may restrain and hinder their growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, and seek for grace. How the word coveting reacheth to all those, it is to be considered. For Concupiscentia, according to some, est effrenatus habendi appetitus; An unbridled, or unrestrained appetite of having: And as touching such an appetite, we cannot excuse our selves by any our natural frailty, or unadvised error; but, as I suppose, the word concupiscence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and unbridled evil intent, or for some urging inclination thereunto. All the question is of the later sort: which is, Actus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione quæ est principium proprium actus boni aut vitiosi; Such passions or inclinations are imperfect acts, that is, not deliberated upon by reason, which is the proper principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, it may seem, that so long as we resist such motions, they harm us not: as they say, Quamdiu refragamur, nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eas dominari permittimus; As long as we give no assent unto them, it is thought by some that they hurt us not: and that then only they hurt when we suffer them to bear sway. But these men, as it seems, make nothing forbidden in this tenth precept, but what have been forbidden in the other: for in every commandment, not only the outward act, but also the inward assent unto evil, tho' it break not out into act, is forbidden: therefore, that we may know the difference between this commandment and the rest, the diinction of desires is to be held: that some are with assent, and unbridled; others bridled, and without assent. For so even the moral philosopher can tell us, that the continent man hath evil desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as on the other side, the incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrary passions. The evil desires, when they are accompanied with assent, are in every commandment forbidden, together with the outward act: and therefore if we will have any thing proper to this commandment, we must needs say, that the evil desires of the continent man (that is, even those which we resist and bridle) are here forbidden. For tho' he that bridleth his evil desires, be much better than he that yieldeth unto them: yet such a man, even according to the heathen philosopher, is not worthy the name of a virtuous man. For Aristotle himself makes continentia, not to be virtue, but only a degree unto it: confessing, that tho' the continent man do well in bridling his evil affections; yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to have them at all. Neither is it much more, that true divinity delivereth touching this matter. For, as he saith, that in the continent man the having of these evil desires, tho' he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a virtuous man: so we, that the having of them is a sin. Only in this we excell him here: that we are able out of divinity to give the true reason of this doctrine: which is, that every one sinneth, that doth not love God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the evil desires of the continent man, that is, of him that bridleth them, must needs be sin: seeing such desires, tho' bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make us know, that by our faithful endeavours to keep his commandments, we witness our love towards himself: we may not safely give liberty to our vanities, by casting back upon God (who is justice it self) that he hath given us precepts altogether beyond our power, and commandments impossible for us to keep. For, as he is accursed (saith St. Jerome) that avows that the law is in all things possible to be observed: so he hath made this addition: Maledictus qui dicit impossibilia Deum præcepisse; Accursed is he that saith that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not thro' our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command us to keep the law: so is our weakness also in the scriptures laid before us; and therefore it is thus safely to be understood, that we should without evasion, or without betraying of our selves, do our faithful endeavours to observe them: which if we do unfeignedly, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man just, David witnesseth; ^a Enter not into judgment with thy servant, for in thy sight no flesh that liveth shall be justified. And in 1 Kings viii. 46. There is no man that sinneth not: and again, ^b Who can say I have made my heart clean? But seeing there is no sin grievous without deliberation; let every man's conscience judge him, whether he give way willingly, or restrain himself in all that he can; yea, or no: for when a king gives to his subject a commandment upon pain of loss of his love, to perform some service: if the subject neglecting the same, seek to satisfy his sovereign with shilting excuses, out of doubt such a prince will take himself to be derided therein.

If there were not any religion nor judgment to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.

AND if we consider advisedly, and soberly, of the moral law, or ten commandments, which God by the hand of Moses gave unto his people, it will appear that such was his merciful providence in the choice of them, as were there neither pain nor profit adjoined to the observing, or not observing of them; were there no divine power at all, nor any religion among men; yet if we did not for our own sakes strive to observe these laws, all society of men, and all endeavours, all happiness and contentment in this life would be taken away, and every state and common-wealth in the world fall to the ground and dissolve. Therefore, these laws were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended; that every man might enjoy the fruits of his own travel; that right might be done to all men from all men; that by justice, order, and peace, we might live the lives of reasonable men, and not of beasts; of free-men, and not of slaves; of civil men, and not of savages. And hereof making our human reason only judge, let us see the inconveniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these laws.

As first, What would the issue be if we acknowledged many Gods? Would not a far greater hatred, war, and blood-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremony, and diversity of interpretation, hath already brought into the world, even among those nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit mankind to pray to idols, and images of gold, metal, dead stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the loss of time, and an impossibility to receive thencefrom, either help or comfort?

The breach of the third commandment bringeth therewith this disadvantage and ill to man, that whosoever taketh the name of God in vain, shall not at any time benefit himself by calling God to witness for him, when he may justly use his holy name.

The observing the sabbath holy, giveth rest to men and beasts, and nature her self requireth intermission of labour.

If we despise our parents, who have given us being, we thereby teach our own children to scorn and neglect us, when our aged years require comfort and help at their hands.

If murder were not forbidden, and severely punished, the race of mankind would be extinguished: and whosoever would take the liberty to destroy others, giveth liberty to others to destroy himself.

If adultery were lawful and permitted, no man could say unto himself, this is my son: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posterity, no endeavour by virtue and undertaking to raise families; murders and poisonings between man and wife, would be daily committed, and every man subject to most filthy and unclean diseases.

If stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all mankind would shortly after perish, or live as the savages, by roots and acorns. For no man labour-eth but to enjoy the fruits thereof. And such is the mischief of robbery, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed restitution four-fold, policy of state and necessity hath made it death.

^b Prov. 20. 9.

To permit false witnesses, is to take all mens lives and estates from them by corruption: the wicked would swear against the virtuous: the waster against the wealthy: the idle beggar and loiterer, against the careful and painful labourer: all trial of right were taken away, and justice thereby banished out of the world.

The coveting of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of mind with an inward vexation: for while we covet what appertains to others, we neglect our own: our appetites are therein fed with vain and fruitless hopes, so long as we do but covet; and if we do attain to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wives or goods of our neighbours, we can look for no other, but that ourselves shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be deprived of our own.

Wherein then appeareth the burden of God's commandments, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the general and particular good of all living? Surely, for our own good, and not in respect of himself, did the most merciful and provident God ordain them; without the observation of which, the virtues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the blessings given us in this life, would be unto us altogether unprofitable and of no use. For we should remain but in the state of brute beasts, if not in a far more unhappy condition.

S E C T. XV.

Of human law, written and unwritten.

HUMAN law, of which now it followeth to speak, is first divided into two, viz. Written, and unwritten. The unwritten consists of usage, approved by time: which Isidore calls Mores: and he defines Mores to be Consuetudines vetustate probate, to be customs approved by antiquity or unwritten laws. Now custom differeth from use, as the cause from the effect: in that custom is by use and continuance established into a law: but yet there, where the law is defective, saith Isidore.

And of customs there are two general natures, containing innumerable particulars, the first are written customs, received and exercised by nations, as the customs of Burgundy and Normandy: the ancient general custom of England, and the customs of Castile, and other provinces.

The second are these petty customs, used in particular places, cities, hundreds, and manors. The general or national customs are some written, others unwritten.

The particular of petty customs are seldom written, but witnessed by testimony of the inhabitants. The customs of the dutchy of Cornwall comprehending also the Stannery of Devon, as touching Tin, and Tin causes, are written in Devon, but not in Cornwall. But howsoever use and time hath made these customs as laws, yet ought every custom to be rationabilis, as well as prescripta.

^a Non firmatur tractu temporis quod de jure ab initio non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith Ulpian) ^b Quod ab initio vitiosum est, non potest tractu temporis convalescere; Course of time amends not that which was naught from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessary in all laws of custom; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law divine and natural; the other, that the cause and reason be strong, proving a right birth, and necessary continuance: it being manifest, that every custom, which is against the law, had its beginning from evil deeds, and therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customs of this nature were but tolerated for a time, by the law-makers, tho' they have been since continued, because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their ancestors were thereto moved. For non sufficit simplex toleratio. And it is in this sort overruled in the law; Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius qui novam legem, & novam constitutionem statuere potest, qui solus princeps est; The people cannot bring in a new custom against law, save by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is only the prince.

Human law generally taken, to wit, human law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doom of practic reason: by which human actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the law a common precept, the advisement of wisemen, and the restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calls the law a constitution written, agreeing with religion, fittest for government and common profit: and more largely, Omne id quod ratione consistit; All that stands with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely it is thus defined: ^c Human law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the law natural and eternal: made by the rational discourse of those that exercise publick authority: prescribing necessary observances to the subject. That every law ought to be a righteous decree, St. Augustine teacheth, saying: Mibi lex esse non videtur, quæ justa non fuerit; It seems to be no law at all to me, which is not just: and just it cannot be, except it agree with the law natural and eternal. For there is no law just and legitimate (saith St. Augustine) which the law-makers have not derived from the eternal; ^d Nihil justum atque legitimum est, quod non ab æterna lege sibi homines derivaverint.

Secondly, It ought to be constituted by discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the law natural, to wit, the natural, indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration, from whence the law human is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, That it ought to be made by an authorized magistracy, it cannot be doubted, be the government, of what kind soever. For it falleth otherwise under the title of those decrees called Violentie, or Iniquæ Constitutiones; Violences, or Wicked Constitutions.

Of human law there are four properties, especially answering these four conditions in the former definition. First, As it is drawn out of the law of nature: so every particular of the human law may be resolved into some principle or rule of the natural.

Secondly, It is to be considered as it is referred unto, and doth respect the common good.

Thirdly, It is to be made by publick authority.

Fourthly, Concerning the matter of the law, it prescribeth, and directeth, all human actions. And so is the law as large and diverse, as all human actions are diverse, which may fall under it. For according to Thomas, ^e Alia lex Julia de adulteriis, alia Cornelia de sicariis; The law of Julian against adultery is one, the Cornelian against ruffians, is another. Now the human law, generally taken, is, in respect of the first of these considerations, divided into the law of nations, and the civil.

The law of nations is taken less or more properly; less properly for every law which is not of it self, but from other higher principles deduced : and so it seemeth that Ulpian understands it : for he defineth jus gentium, or the law of nations, to be that which is only common amongst men, as religion, and the worship of God : which is not in the very nature of this law of nations : but from the principles of the scriptures, and other divine revelations. But the law of nations properly taken, is that dictate, or sentence, which is drawn from a very probable, tho' not from an evident principle, yet so probable that all nations do assent unto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadors be granted between enemies, &c. which national law, according to divers acceptations, and divers considerations had of the human law, may be sometimes taken for a species of the natural, sometimes of the human.

Jus Civile, or the civil law, is not the same in all common-wealths, but in divers estates it is also diverse and peculiar, and this law is not so immediately derived from the law of nature, as the law of nations is : for it is partly deduced out of such principles, as all nations do not agree in, or easily assent unto ; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are diverse, and do not fit all estates. Hereof Ulpian, Jus civile, neque in totum à naturali & gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei servit : itaque cum aliquid addimus vel detrahimus juri communi, jus proprium, id est civile, efficitur ; The civil law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the law of nature and nations, nor yet in all points obey it : therefore, when we add ought to, or take from the law that is common, we make a law proper, that is, the civil law.

The law now commonly called the civil law, had its birth in Rome : and was first written by the Decemviri 303 years after the foundation of the city. It was compounded as well out of the Athenian, and other Grecian laws, as out of the ancient Roman customs and laws regal. The regal laws were devised by the first kings, and called leges regie, or Papyrianæ, because they were gathered by Papyrus, Tarquin then reigning. For tho' so many of the former laws as maintained kingly authority were abolished, with the name : yet those of Servius Tullius, for commerce and contracts, and all that appertained to religion, and common utility, were continued, and were a part of the laws of the twelve tables. To these laws of the twelve tables were added (as the times gave occasion) those made by the senate, called Senatus-consulta : those of the common people, called Plebi-scita : those of the lawyers called responsa prudentum : and the edicts of the annual magistrate : which edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Julian, and presented to Adrian the emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetual laws : and the volume styled, Edictum perpetuum : as those and the like collections of Justinian afterwards were.

The difference anciently between laws and edicts, which the French call Reglements, consisted in this, that laws are the constitutions made or confirmed by sovereign authority (be the sovereignty in the people, in a few, or in one) and are vitual general and permanent : but an edict (which is but jussum magistratus, unless by authority it be made a law) hath end with the officer, who made the same, saith Varro. Qui plurimum edicto tribunt, legem annuam esse dicunt ; They who ascribe the most unto an edict, say that it is a law for one year. Tho' Isidore doth also express by the word constitutiones or edicts, those ordinances called Acts of prerogatives : as Constitutio vel edictum est, quod rex, vel Imperator, constituit, vel edicit ; An ordinance or edict is that which a king or emperour doth ordain or proclaim.

Lastly, The human law is divided into the secular, and into the ecclesiastical, or canon. The secular commanding temporal good, to wit, the peace and tranquillity of the commonwealth : the ecclesiastical the spiritual good, and right government of the ecclesiastical commonwealth, or church : Ilud naturæ legem, hoc divinam spectat ; That respecteth the law of nature, this the law of God. And so may jus civile be taken two ways : first, As distinguished from the law of nations, as in the first division : secondly, As it is the same with the secular, and diverse from the ecclesiastical. But this division of the schoolmen is obscure : for altho' the civil be the same with the secular, as the civil is a law ; yet the secular is more general, and comprehendeth both the civil and all other laws not ecclesiastical. For of secular laws, in use among christian princes, and in christian commonwealths, there are three kinds ; the civil which hath every-where a voice, and is in all Christian estates (England excepted) most powerful ; the laws of England called common, and the laws of custom or provincial. In Spain besides the law civil, they have the customs of Castile, and other provinces. In France besides the civil, the customs of Burgundy, Blois, Berry, Nivernois, and Lodunois, &c. Tous lieux situes & assis en Lodunois, seront gouvernez selon les costumes du dit Pays ; All places lying within the precincts of Lodunois, shall be governed according to the customs of that place. There are also in France the customs of Normandy, and these of two kinds, general and local ; and all purged and reformed by divers acts of the three estates. The charters of confirmation of these ancient customs, before and since their reformation, have these words : Nos autem registrum prædictum, usus laudabiles, & consuetudines antiquas, &c. laudamus, approbamus, & auctoritate regia confirmamus ; The register aforesaid, laudable use, and ancient customs, we praise, approve, and by our kingly authority confirm. The common law of England is also compounded of the ancient customs of the same, and of certain maxims by those customs of the realm approved. Upon which customs also are grounded those courts of Record, of the Chancery, King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small courts.

These ancient customs of England have been approved by the kings thereof, from age to age : as that custom by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, disseised, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the law of the land, was confirmed by the statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient custom of England, that the eldest son should inherit without partition : in Germany, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland it is the custom for all lands (that have not been resigned into the king's hands) that the eldest of the house shall enjoy the inheritance during his own life : and so the second and third eldest (if there be so many brothers) before the heir in lineal descent : this is called the custom of Tanistry. For example, If a lord of land have four sons, and the eldest of those four have also a son, the three brothers of the eldest son shall, after the death of their brother, enjoy their father's lands before the grandchild : the custom being grounded upon the reason of necessity. For the Irish in former times having always lived in a subdivided civil war, not only the greatest against the greatest, but every baron and gentleman one against another, were inforc'd to leave successors of age and ability to defend their own territories. Now as in Normandy, Burgundy, and other provinces of France, there are certain peculiar, and petty customs, besides the great and general custom of the land; so are there in England, and in every part thereof. But the greatest bulk of our laws, as I take it, are the acts of parliament: laws propounded and approved by the three estates of the realm, and confirmed by the king, to the obedience of which all men are therefore bound, because they are acts of choice, and self-desire. ^a Leges nulla alia causa nos tenent quam quod judicio populi receptæ sunt; The laws do therefore bind the subjects, because they are received by the judgment of the subject. ^b Tum demum humanæ leges habent vim suam, cum fuerint non modo institutæ, sed etiam firmatæ approbatione communitatis; It is then that human laws have their strength, when they shall not only be devised, but by the approbation of the people confirmed.

Isidore fastneth these properties to every Christian law, that the same be honest, that it be possible, that it be according to nature, and according to the custom of the country; also for the time and place convenient, profitable, and manifest, and without respect of private profit, that it be written for the general good. He also gives four effects of the law, which Modestinus comprehends in two: to wit, obligation and instigation: the former binds us by fear, to avoid vice: the latter encourageth with hope, to follow virtue. For, according to Cicero, Legem oportet esse vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemque virtutum; It behoveth the law to be a mender of vices, and a commender of virtues. The part obligatory or binding us to the observation of things commanded or forbidden, is an effect common to all laws: and it is two-fold, the one constraineth us by fear of our consciences, the other by fear of external punishment. These two effects the law performeth, by the exercise of those two powers, to wit, Coactive and Directive.

The second of these two effects remembered by Modestinus, is instigation, or encouragement to virtue, as Aristotle makes it the end of the law, to make men virtuous. For laws being such as they ought to be, do, both by prescribing and forbidding, urge us to well-doing: laying before us the good and the evil, by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmative commanding good, and power negative forbidding evil, are those into which the law is divided, as touching the matter: and in which David comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof: saying, ^c Declina à malo & fac bonum; Decline from evil, and do good.

SECT. XVI.

That only the prince is exempt from human laws, and in what sort.

NOW whether the power of the human law be without exception of any person, it is doubtfully disputed among those that have written of this subject, as well divines as lawyers; and namely, whether sovereign princes be compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the law, as aforesaid, the one Directive, the other Coactive: to the power Directive, they ought to be subject, but not to that which constraineth. For as touching violence or punishment, no man is bound to give a prejudicial judgment against himself: and if equals have not any power over each other, much less have inferiours over their superiours, from whom they receive their authority and strength.

And speaking of the supreme power of laws, simply then is the prince so much above the laws, as the soul and body united, is above a dead and senseless carcase. For the king is truly called, Jus vivum & lex animata; An animate and living law. But this is true, that by giving authority to laws, princes both add greatness to themselves, and conserve it, and therefore was it said of Bracton out of Justinian. Merito debet rex tribuere legi, quod lex attribuit ei: nam lex facit ut ipse sit rex; Rightfully ought the king to attribute that to the law, which the law first attributeth to the king; for it is the law that doth make kings.

But whereas ^d Bracton ascribeth this power to the human law, he is therein mistaken. For kings are made by God, and laws divine: and by human laws only declared to be kings. As for the places remembered by the divines and lawyers, which infer a kind of obligation of princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of virtuous princes, who are to give an account of their actions to God only.

^e Tibi soli peccavi, saith David; Against thee only have I sinned: therefore the prince cannot be said to be subject to the law. Princeps non subicitur legi: for seeing, according to the schoolmen, the law human is but Quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis gubernativæ: non videtur posse ejus obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humanæ non pertinet: sed vis potestatis humanæ non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo neque lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia activa, est principium transmutandi aliud: Seeing human law (say they) is but a kind of organ or instrument of the power that governeth, it seems that it cannot extend it self to bind any one whom no human power can controul, or lay hold of: but the governour himself, in whom the governing power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himself, or by his own power be controuled. And therefore the law which is made by such a power, cannot bind the law-maker himself: for every active ability is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which itself resides. And seeing princes have power to deliver others from the obligation of the law. ^f Ergo etiam potest ipsemet princeps sive legislator sua se voluntate prohibito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a prince or law-maker at his own will and pleasure deliver himself from the bond of the law. Therefore in the rules of the law it is thus concluded. Subditi tenentur leges observare necessitate coactionis, princeps vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communis; The subjects are bound to fulfil the law by necessity of compulsion, but the prince only by his own will, and regard of the common good.

Now concerning the politic laws, given by Moses to the nation of the Israelites whether they ought to be a precedent, from which no civil institutions of other people should presume to digress, I will not presume to determine, but leave it as a question for such men to decide, whose professions give them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirm, that we ought not to seem wiser than God himself, who hath told us, that there are no laws so righteous as those which it pleased him to give to his elect people to be governed by. True it is, that all nations have their several qualities, wherein they differ, even from their next borderers, no less than in their peculiar languages, which disagreeable conditions to govern aptly one and the same law very hardly were able. The Roman civil laws did indeed contain in order, a great part of the then known world, without any notable inconvenience, after such time as once it was received and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yielded much unto the natural customs of the sundry people, which it governed. For whether it be thro' a long continued persuasion; or (as astrologers more willingly grant) some influence of the heavens; or peradventure some temper of the soil and climate, affording matter of provocation to vice (as plenty made the Sybarites luxurious: want and opportunity to steal, makes the Arabians to be thieves) very hard it were to forbid by law, an offence so common, with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from just and honest. By such rigour was the kingdom of Congo unhappily diverted from the Christian religion, which it willingly at the first embraced, but after with great fury rejected, because plurality of wives was denied unto them, I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously than seasonably. In such cases, methinks, it were not amiss to consider, that the High God himself permitted some things to the Israelites, rather in regard of their natural disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant unto the ancient rules of the first perfection. So, where even the general nature of man doth condemn (as many things it doth) for wicked and unjust; there may the law given by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the evil, which forceth man, as near as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custom hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habit, with so long and so publick approbation, that the virtue opposing it, would seem as uncouth, as it were to walk naked in England, or to wear the English fashion of apparel in Turky: there may a wise and upright law-giver, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses's law required; even as the good king Hzechiah did, in a matter merely ecclesiastical, and therefore the less capable of dispensation, praying for the people; "The good Lord be merciful unto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seek the Lord, the God of his fathers, tho' he be not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary: which prayer the Lord heard and granted."

To this effect it is well observed by Dr. Willet, that the moral judicials of Moses do partly bind, and partly are let free. They do not hold affirmatively that we are tied to the same severity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatively they do hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adjudged, where sentence of death is not given by Moses: Christian magistrates ruling under Christ the Prince of peace, that is, of clemency and mercy, may abate of the severity of Moses's law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot add unto it to make the burden more heavy: for to shew more rigour than Moses, becometh not the gospel.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath been the subject of many learned discourses, neither will I take upon me to speak any thing definitively in a case which dependeth still in some controversy among worthy divines. Thus much (as in honour of the judicial law, or rather of him that gave it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath always been very plausible. And surely, howsoever they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a general and only law; yet shall we hardly find any other ground, whereon the conscience of a judge may rest, with equal satisfaction, in making interpretation, or giving sentence upon doubts, arising out of any law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that judge could have been witness, of whom Fortescue, that notable bulwark of our laws, doth speak, complaining of a judgment given against a gentlewoman at Salisbury, who being accused by her own man, without any other proof, for murdering her husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the man who accused her, within a year after being convicted for the same offence, confessed that his mistress was altogether innocent of that cruel fact, whose terrible death he then (tho' over-late) grievously lamented: but this judge, saith the same author, 'Sæpius ipse mihi fassus est, quod nunquam in vita sua animum ejus de hoc facto ipse purgaret'; He himself often confessed unto me, that he should never, during his life, be able to clear his conscience of that fact. Wherefore that acknowledgment which other sciences yield unto the metaphysicks, that from thence are drawn propositions, able to prove the principles of sciences, which out of the sciences themselves cannot be proved, may justly be granted by all other politick Institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more justly, by how much the subject of the metaphysicks, which is, Ens quatenus Ens, Being as it is being, is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium, The being of beings, the only good, the fountain of truth, whose fear is the beginning of wisdom. To which purpose well saith St. Augustine, Conditor legum temporalium si vir bonus est & sapiens, illam ipsam consulit eternam, de qua nulli animæ judicare datum est; The author of temporal laws, if he be good and wise, doth therein consult the law eternal, to determine of which there is no power given to any soul. And as well prince Edward, in Fortescue's discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quam posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better or another foundation, than the Lord hath laid.

C H A P. V.

The story of the Israelites from the receiving of the law, to the death of Moses.

S E C T. I.

Of the numbering and disposing of the host of Israel, for their marches through the wilderness: with a note of the reverence given to the worship of God, in this ordering of their troops.

WHEN Moses had received the law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the tabernacle of the ark and sanctuary; he mustered all the tribes and families of Israel: and having seen what numbers of men, fit to bear arms, were found in every tribe, from 20 years of age upwards; he appointed unto them, by direction from the Lord, such princes and leaders, as in worth and reputation were in every tribe most eminent. The number of the whole army was 603550 able men for the wars, besides women and children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Egypt. This great army was divided by Moses into four gross and mighty battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole tribes.

^a 2 Chron. 30. 18, 19.

^c Cap. 5. 3.

The first of these containing 186400 able men, consisted of three regiments, which may well, in respect of their numbers, be called armies; as containing the three whole tribes of Judah, Issachar, and Zabulon. In the tribe of Judah were 74600 fighting men, led by Naasson: in Issachar 54400 led by Netbaneel: in Zabulon 57400 led by Eliab. All these marched under the standard of the tribe of Judah, who held the van-guard, and was the first that moved and marched, being lodged and quartered at their general incamping on the east-side of the army; which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second battalion, or army, called in the scriptures the host of Reuben, had joined unto it Simeon and Gad, in number 151,450. All which marched under the standard of Reuben. In the tribe of Reuben were 46500 under Elizur: in Simeon 59300 under Shelumiel: in Gad 45650 under Elisaph. These had the second place, and incamped on the south-side of the tabernacle.

The third army marched under the standard of Ephraim, to whom were joined the regiments of Manasseh and Benjamin; who joined together, made in number 108100 able men. These marched in the third place, incamping on the west quarter of the tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500 under Elisbama: Manasseh 32200 under Gamaliel: Benjamin 35400 under Abidam.

The fourth and last army, or squadron, of the general army, containing 157600 able men, marched under the standard of Dan; to whom were joined the two tribes of Nephtali and Asher. And these had the re-re-ward, and moved last, incamping on the north-side. Dan had 62700 under Abiezzer: Asher 41500 under Pagiel: Nephtali 53400 under Ahira.

Besides these princes of the several tribes, there were ordained captains over thousands, over hundreds, over fifties, and over tens; as it may appear by that mutiny and insurrection against Moses, Numbers xvi. 1, 2. For there arose up against Moses 250 captains of the Assembly, famous in the congregation, and men of renown: of which number were Korab, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principal mutineers, with those 250 captains that followed them, were not any of the twelve princes of the tribes, or general colonels before spoken of, as by their names Numb. i. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gave to his children, took place not only in the division of the land of Promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but even in sorting them under their several standards in the wilderness it was observed. For Judah had the precedency and the greatest army, which also was wholly compounded of the sons of Leah, Jacob's wife. Reuben having lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simeon, who had undergone his father's curse; and with Gad, the son of his mother's hand-maid. Joseph, who in temporal blessings had the prerogative of the first-born a double portion, was accounted as two tribes, and divided into two regiments: the younger (according to Jacob's prophecy) taking place before the elder. He was assisted by Benjamin, his best beloved brother, the other son of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest son of Jacob's concubines, was given the leading of the fourth army, according to Jacob's prophecy. He had with him under his standard none of the children of Leah, or Rachel, but only the sons of the hand-maids.

In the middle of these four armies, was the tabernacle, or portable temple of the congregation carried, surrounded by the Levites. Near unto which, as the heathens and pagans could not approach, by reason of these four powerful armies, which guarded the same: so was it death for any of the children of Israel to come near it, who were not of the Levites, to whom the charge was committed. So sacred was the movable temple of God, and with such reverence guarded and transported, as 22000 persons were dedicated to the service and attendance thereof: of which 8580 had the peculiar charge, according to their several offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the armies of the people observed the former order in their incampings: so did the Levites quarter themselves, as in an inner square, on every side of the tabernacle; the Gershurites on the west, within the army and standard of Ephraim, over whom Elisaph commanded, in number 7500. The family of Cobath on the south side, guided by Elizaphan, within the army of Reuben, and between him and the tabernacle, in number 8600. The third company were of the family of Merari, over whom Zuriel commanded, in number 6200, and these were lodged on the north side within the army of Dan; on the east side, and next within those tribes and forces which Judah led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the first and immediate commanders, both of the ceremonies, and of the people; under whom, as the chief of all the other Levitical families, was Eleazar the son of Aaron, his successor in the high priesthood.

This was the order of the army of Israel, and of their incamping and marching: the tabernacle of God being always set in the middle and center thereof. The reverend care, which Moses the prophet and chosen servant of God, had in all that belonged even to the outward and least parts of the tabernacle, ark and sanctuary, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeal borne towards God himself. The industry used in the framing thereof, and every, and the least part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the provisions; the dutiful observance in the laying up and preserving the holy vessels; the solemn removing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the provident defence of the same, which all ages have in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this superfluous age, by those of the family, by the Anabaptist, Brownist, and other sectaries, as all cost and care bestowed and had of the church, wherein God is to be served and worshipped, is accounted a kind of popery, and as proceeding from an idolatrous disposition: insomuch as time would soon bring to pass (if it were not refilled) that God would be turned out of churches into barns, and from thence again into the fields and mountains, and under the hedges; and the offices of the ministry (robbed of all dignity and respect) be as contemptible as these places; all order, discipline, and church-government, left to newness of opinion, and mens fancies: yea, and soon after, as many kinds of religions would spring up, as there are parish-churches within England: every contentious and ignorant person cloathing his fancy with the spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Revelation; insomuch as when the truth, which is but one, shall appear to the simple multitude, no less variable than contrary to itself, the faith of men will soon after die away by degrees, and all religion be held in scorn and contempt. Which distraction gave a great prince of Germany cause of this answer to those that persuaded him to become a Lutheran,

Si me adjungo vobis, tunc condemnor ab aliis; si me aliis adjungo, a vobis condemnor; quid fugiam video, sed quid sequar non habeo; If I adjoin myself to you, I am condemned by others; if I join with others, I am condemned by you; what I should avoid I see, but I know not what I should follow.

The offerings of the twelve princes: the passover of the second year: the departing of Jethro.

NOW when Moses had taken order for all things necessary, provided for the service of God, written the laws, numbred his army, and divided them into the battles and troops before remembered, and appointed them leaders of all sorts: the twelve princes or commanders of the tribes, brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, six covered chariots, and twelve oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the tabernacle, with all that belonged thereunto, the sanctuary excepted; which for reverence was carried upon the shoulders of the sons of Korah, to whom the charge was committed; and the chariots in which were conveyed the other parts of the tabernacle and vessels thereto belonging, were delivered to the Levites for that service, namely to the sons of Gershan and Merari.

Besides these chariots, each of these commanders, princes, or heads of tribes, offered unto God, and for his service in the temple, a charger of fine silver, weighing 130^b sheckles: a silver bowl of 70 sheckles: after the sheckle of the sanctuary: and an incense cup of gold of ten sheckles; which they performed at the same time when the altar was dedicated unto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards their conquest: besides the beasts which they offered for sacrifice, according to the law ceremonial, the weight of all the twelve silver chargers, and twelve silver bowls, amounted unto 2400 sheckles of silver: and the weight of gold in the incense cups, to 120 sheckles of gold: which makes of sheckles of silver 1200, every sheckle of gold valuing ten of silver; so that the whole of gold and silver which they offered at this time, was about 420 l. Ster. This done, Moses, as in all the rest by the spirit of God conducted, gave order for the celebrating of the passover: which they performed on the 14th day of the second month of the second year: and on the 20th day of the same the cloud was lifted up from above the tabernacle, as a sign of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this invocation to God, Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered, and let them that hate thee, fly before thee. Then all the people of Israel removed from their encamping at the foot of the mountain Sinai, towards Paran; the army or great squadron of Juda, led by Naafon, taking the vanguard, followed by Nethaneel and Eliab, leaders of the tribes of Issachar and Zabulon: after whom the rest marched as in the figure express'd. And because the passage thro' so many deserts and mountains was exceeding difficult: Moses leaving nothing unforesight which might serve for the advancement of his enterprize, he instantly entreated his father-in-law, whom in Numbers x. he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their journey towards Canaan: promising him such part and profit of the enterprize, as God should bestow on them: for this man as he was of great understanding and judgment (as appeared by the counsel he gave to Moses for the appointing of judges over the people) so was he a perfect guide in all those parts, himself inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian or Madian: and (as it seemeth) a man of great years and experience, for he was then the priest or prince of Madian, when Moses fled first out of Egypt, and married his daughter: which was 42 years before this request made. And tho' Moses himself had lived forty years in these parts of Arabia, thro' which he was now to travel: yet the better to assure his passage, and so great a multitude of souls, which could not be so few as a million, it was necessary to use many guides and many conductors. To this request of Moses it may seem by the places, Exod. xviii. 27. and Numb. x. 30. that Jethro, otherwise called Hobab, yielded not: for it is evident, that he went back from Moses into his own country. But because it appeareth by other places of scripture, that the posterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Israelites: it is most likely that this his return to his own country was rather to fetch away his family, and to take his leave of his own country, by setting things in order, than to abide there.

S E C T. III.

The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cause of their returning back to the Red sea.

AFTER this dismissal of Hobab, Israel began to march towards the deserts of Paran: and after three days wandring, they sat down at the sepulchres of lust, afterward called Tabera, or Incenso: by reason that God consumed with fire those mutineers and murmurers, which rose up in this remove, which happened about the 23d day of the same month. And from this 23d day of the second month, of the second year, they rested, and fed themselves with quails (which it pleased God by a sea-wind to cast upon them) to the 24th day of the third month, to wit, all the month of Sinan or June; whereof surfeiting, they died great numbers: from whence in the following month, called Thamus, answering to our July, they went on to Hazereth: where Miriam the sister of Moses was stricken with the leprosy, which continued upon her seven days, after whose recovery Israel removed toward the border of Idumea: and encamped at Rithma, near Kades Barnea, from whence Moses sent the twelve discoverers into the territory of Canaan: both to inform themselves of the fertility and strength of the country: as also to take knowledge of the ways, passages, rivers, fords and mountains. For Arad king of the Canaanites surprized divers companies of the Israelites, by lying in ambush near those ways, thro' which the discoverers and searchers of the land had formerly pass'd. Now after the return of the discoverers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel; whose ingratitude and rebellion after his so many benefits, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their deliverance from the Egyptian slavery, his feeding them, and conducting them thro' that great and terrible wilderness (for so Moses calleth it) with the victory

^a Numb. 7. ^b The Hebrew gerah weigheth sixteen grains: so a gerah of silver is about three half pence Sterling: the sheckle of the sanctuary (as it is expounded Exod. 30. 13.) containeth 20 gerahs, so a sanctuary sheckle of silver is about seven pence: the common sheckle is but half so much, to wit, ten gerahs, as it is usually expounded; the Vallapandus labours to prove that the common and the sanctuary sheckle were all one. Numb. 9. 5. Numb. 10. 11. Exod. xl. 34. Numb. 9. 17. ^c Judg. 1. 16 and 4. 11. Also 1 Sam. 15. 6. and 2 Reg. 10. 15. 1 Chron. 2. 55. which he gave them against the powerful Amalekites, to be no other than the effects of his hatred, thinking that he led them on and preserved them, but to bring them, their wives and children to be slaughtered, and given for a prey and spoil to the Amorites or Canaanites. For it was reported unto them, by the searchers of the land, that the cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong towers and castles: that many of the people were giant-like (for they confess'd that they saw the sons of Anak there) who were men of fearful stature, and so far over-topped the Israelites, as they appeared to them, and to themselves, but as grasshoppers in their respect. Now as this mutiny exceeded all the rest, wherein they both accused God, and consulted to chuse them a captain (or as they call it now-a-days an Eleto) to carry them back again into Egypt: so did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguished every soul of the whole multitude (Joshua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in God's promises, persuaded the people to enter Canaan, being then near it, and at the mountain foot of Idumea, which is but narrow, laying before them the fertility thereof, and assuring them of victory. But as men, whom the passion of fear had bereaved both of reason and common sense: ^a they threatened to stone these encouragers to death, accounting them as men either desperate in themselves, or betrayers of the lives, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God resisted these wicked purposes, and interposing the fear of his bright glory between the unadvised fury of the multitude, and the innocency and constancy of his servants, preserved them thereby from their violence: threatening an entire destruction of the whole nation, by sending among them ^a ^b consuming and merciless pestilence. For this was the tenth insurrection and rebellion which they had made, since God delivered them from the slavery of the Egyptians. But ^c Moses (the mildest or meekest of all men) prayed unto God to remember his infinite mercies: alledging that this so severe a judgment, how deservedly soever inflicted, would increase the pride of the heathen nations: and give them occasion to vaunt that the God of Israel failing in power to perform his promises, suffered them to perish in these barren and fruitless desarts. Yet as God is no less just than merciful, as God is slow to anger, so is his wrath a consuming fire, the same being once kindled by the violent breath of man's ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand less heavy than hoped for, he scourged this iniquity, so by the measure of his glory (evermore jealous of neglect and derision) he suffered not the wicked to pass unpunished; reserving his compassion for the innocent; whom, because they participated not with the offences of their fathers, he was pleased to preserve, and in them to perform his promises, which have never been frustrate.

S E C T. IV.

Of their unwillingness to return: with the punishment thereof, and of divers accidents in the return.

NOW when Moses had revealed the purposes of God to the people: and made them know his heavy displeasure towards them: they began to bewail themselves, tho' over-late: the times of grace and mens repentance, having also their appointment. And then when God left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often play'd and dallied with his merciful sufferings; they would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt, and make offer to enter the land contrary again to the advice of Moses; who assured them, that God was not now among them: and that the ark of his covenant should not move, but by his direction, who could not err: and that the enemies sword, which God had hitherto bended and rebated, was now left no less sharp than death: and in the hands of the Amalekites, and Canaanites no less cruel. But as men, from whom God hath withdrawn his grace, do always follow those counsels which carry them to their own destructions: so the Hebrews, after they had forsaken the opportunity by God and their conductors offered, and might then have entred Judea before their enemies were prepared and joined; did afterwards, contrary to God's commandment, undertake the enterprize of themselves, and ran headlong and without advice into the mountains of Idumea. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being joined and attending their advantage, set on them, brake them, and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victory and pursuit, consumed them all the way of their flight even unto Hormah: the Amalekites, in revenge of their former loss, and overthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to prevent their displantation and destruction threatened. Of which powerful assembly of those two nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour kings joined together for their common safety) it pleased God to forewarn Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to return by those painful passages of the desarts, thro' which they had formerly travelled, till they had found the banks of the Red sea again: in which retreat, before they came back to pass over Jordan, there were consumed 38 years: and the whole number of the six hundredth and odd thousand, which came out of Egypt (Moses, Joshua and Caleb excepted) were dead in the wilderness, the stubborn and careless generations were wholly worn out, and the promis'd land bestow'd on their children: which were increased to 600000, and more. For besides the double fault both of refusing to enter the land upon the return of the discoverers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible idolatry of worshipping Molech, and the host of heaven. For altho' Moses doth not mention it, yet ^d Amos doth, and so doth the martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipped the sun and moon in after-times it is proved out of sundry other places.

Now after the broken companies were returned to the camp at Kades, Moses, according to the commandment received from God, departed towards the south from whence he came, to recover the shores of the Red sea. And so from Kades or Rithma he removed to Remmonparez, so called of abundance of pomegranates there found and divided among them. From thence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the frankincense there found. From ^e Libnah he cross'd the valley, and sat down at Reffa near the foot of the mountain. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the west, and encamped at Coelata: where one of the Hebrews, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses always keeping the valley, between two great ledges of mountains (those which bound the desert of Zin, and those of Pharan) cross'd the same from Ceelata, and marched eastward to the mountain of Sapber, or Sepher: this making the twentieth mansion. From thence he passed on to Harada; then to Maceloth; and then to Thabab; and so to Thara or Thare, the four and twentieth mansion. Where, while Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan and Abiram: who, for their contempt of God and his ministers, were some of them swallowed up alive, and by the earth opening her mouth devoured; others, even two hundred and fifty which offered incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from heaven; and 14700 of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest marvels and judgments of God, that hath been shewed in all the time of Moses's government, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men, who would have usurped ecclesiastical authority, were suddenly swallowed up alive into the earth with their families and goods; even while they sought to overthrow the order, discipline, and power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the high priest and magistrate, to whom God had committed the government both of his Church and commonweal of his people. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirm them, it pleased him in this place also to approve by miracle the former election of his servant Aaron, by the twelve rods given in by the heads of the twelve tribes; of which Moses received one of every head and prince of his tribe: which being all withered and dry wands, and on every rod the name of the prince of the tribe written, and Aaron's on that of Levi; it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron received by his power a vegetable spirit, and having lain in the tabernacle of the congregation before the ark one night, had on it both buds, blossoms, and ripe almonds.

From Tharab the whole army removed to Me-thra, and thence to Esmona, and thence to Mose-roth, (or Masurit after St. Jerome) and from Mose-roth to Benejacon: and so to Gadgad, which Jerome calleth Gadgada; thence to Jetabata, the thirtieth mansion; where from certain fountains of water gathered in one, Andrichomius maketh a river, which falleth into the Red sea, between Madian and Ezion-gaber.

Now altho' it be very probable, that at Ezion-gaber, where Solomon furnished his fleets for the East-Indies, there was store of fresh water; and tho' Herodotus, l. 3. maketh mention of a great river in Arabia the stony, which he calleth Corys, from whence, saith he, the inhabitants convey water in pipes of leather to other places, by which device the king of Arabia relieved the army of Cambyfes: yet is Andrichomius greatly deceived, as many times he is, in finding these springs at Gadgad, or Jetabata; being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth mansion. For it was at Punon, that those springs are spoken of, which in Deut. x. 7. is also called Jetabata, or Jotbath, a land of running waters, and which by probability fall into the river Zared, the next adjoining. And that these springs should fall into the Red sea at Ezion-gaber, or Eloth, I cannot believe, for the way thither is very long. And this I find in Belonius, that there are divers torrents of fresh water in those sandy parts of Arabia: which tho' they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunk up by the hot and thirsty sand, before they can recover the banks of the Red sea.

From Jetabata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red sea, and encamped at Hebrona; and from thence to Ezion-gaber: which city in Josephus's time had the name of Berenice; and in Jerome's, Essia. From thence keeping the sea and Eloth on his right hand, he turned towards the north, as he was by God commanded: ^a*Ezion-gaber* being the farthest place towards the south-east that Moses travelled in that passage.

It seemeth that Ezion-gaber, or Azion-gaber, Eloth and Madian, were not at this time in possession of the kings of Edom. For it is said, ^b*That the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in the mount Hor, near the coast of the land of Edom*; so as the mount Hor was at that time on the border of Idumea. And if Ezion-gaber, and the other places near the Red sea, had at this time been subject to the Idumeans, Moses would have also demanded a free passage thro' them. It is true, that in the future the Idumeans obtained these places: for it is said, ^c*And they arose out of Midian, and came to Paran, and took men with them*; which were those companies that followed young Hadad of Idumea into Egypt, when he fled from Joab. Likewise it is said of Solomon, that he made a navy of ships in Ezion-gaber besides Eloth, in the land of Edom.

SECT. V.

Of Moses's arrival at Zin Kades: and of the accidents while they abode there.

FROM Ezion-gaber he turned again towards the north, and pitched in the wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesb: or in Beroth, of the children of Jacan; where they sat down in the first month of the fortieth year after they left Egypt. For at the next mansion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth month of the fortieth year: the nine and thirtieth year taking end at Ezion-gaber. And at this city of Kades (for so it was thought to be) or near it, died ^d*Miriam*, or Mary, Moses's sister, whose sepulchre was to be seen in St. Jerome's time, as himself avoweth. From hence, ere they departed to mountain Hor, ^eall the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of water. For neither the punishments by fire from heaven; by being devoured and swallowed up by the earth; by the sudden pestilence which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing either the love or wrath of God, could prevail with this nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in every of their appetites: but instead of seeking for help and relief at God's hands, when they suffered hunger, and thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting ungratefully on Moses all their misadventures; yea, tho' they well knew, that their own fathers had left their bodies in the deserts, and that they were now entered into the fortieth year, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in sight of the land promised, they again as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God are without beginning; so his mercies being without end, he commanded ^f*Moses* to strike a rock adjoining with his rod; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattle were satisfied. Nevertheless, because God perceived a kind of dissidence both in Moses and Aaron, at this place: therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the land promised; whereto perchance their worldly desires might invite them. But it pleased him to end the travels of Aaron at the mountain Hor, being the next, and 34th station. At which mountain of Hor, Aaron was despoiled of the garments of his priesthood, and the same put on Eleazar his son, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar defended the mountain; but God received Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more seen.

Of this mountain called Hor, otherwise Mosera, as in Deut. x. 6. those Horites took name, which the Idumeans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the 27th mansion, and Mosera which they write Moseroth for difference, which was the 34th mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places: because Moses, in passing from Cadesbarne towards Eson-gaber, incamped at Mosera, after he departed from Ilesmona, and before he came to Benjaacan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came unto after he left Cades, where Miriam, Moses's sister died; the first being the 27th, and the second being the 34th mansion. But for Hor, which is called Mosera, it should have been written, Hor juxta Mosera, Hor near Mosera; for it is but one root of a mountain, divided into divers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: whercof the west part Moses calleth Mosera, and the east part Horeb. By the west part Moses incamped, as he pass'd towards the Red sea, on his left hand; by the east part, as he went back again northwards towards Moab: as in the description of Moses's passage thro' Arabia, the reader may perceive.

Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent messengers to the prince of Idumea, praying him that he might pass with the people of Israel thro' his territory into the land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the nearest way of all other from the city of Kadesh, where Moses then incamped; whereas otherwise taking his journey by the rivers of Zared, Arnon, and Jordan, he might have run into many hazards in the passage of those rivers, the far way about, and the many powerful kings, which commanded in those regions. Now the better to persuade the prince of Idumea herunto, Moses remembred him, that he was of the same race and family with Israel: calling him by the name of brother, because both the Idumites and Israelites were the sons of one father, to wit, Isaac; inferring thereby, that he had more reason to favour and respect them, than he had to assist the Canaanites; against whom Esau his ancestor had made war, and driven out the Horites (who were of their ancient races descended of Cham) out of the region of Seir, calling it by his own name Edom, or Edumea. He also making a short repetition of God's blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes and promises, assured Edom, or the king thereof, that he would no way offend his people, or waste his country; but that he would restrain his army within the bounds of the common and king's highways, paying money for whatsoever he used, yea, even for the water, which themselves or their cattle should drink. For ^b Moses was commanded by God not to provoke the children of Esau. But the king of Edumea knowing the strength of his own country, the same being near Canaan, rampard with high and sharp mountains: and withal suspecting, as a natural wise man, that 600000 strangers being once entred his country, it would rest in their wills to give him law, resolvedly ^c refused them passage, and delivered this answer to the messengers: That, ^d if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible means. And not knowing whether such a denial might satisfy or exasperate, he gathered the strength of his country together, and shewed himself prepared to defend their passage. For it is written: Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses considering, that the end of this enterprize was not the conquest of Seir or Edumea, and that the land promised was that of Canaan: like unto himself, who was of a natural understanding the greatest of any man, and the skilfullest man of war that the world had, he refused to adventure the army of Israel against a nation, which, being overcome, gave but a passage to invade others; and which by reason of the feat of their mountainous country, could not but have endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendred them less able, if not altogether powerless, to have conquered the rest.

S E C T. VI.

Of their compassing Idumea and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

HE therefore leaving the way of Idumea, turned himself towards the east, and marched towards the deserts of Moab. Which when Arad king of the Canaanites understood, and that Moses had blanced the way of Edumea; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom which Israel aimed at, he thought it safest, rather to find his enemies in his neighbour's country, than to be found by them in his own: which he might have done with a far greater hope of victory, had Moses been inforced first to have made his way by the sword thro' Idumea, and thereby, tho' victorious, greatly have lessened his numbers. But altho' it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet being resolved to make trial what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came nearer his own home, leading the strength of his nation to the edge of the desert, he set upon some part of the army; which, for the multitude, occupied a great space, and for the many herds of cattle that they drove with them, could not incamp so near together, but that some quarter or other was evermore subject to surprize. By which advantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance unexpected, he slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his predecessor, which joined his forces with the Amalekites, and gave an overthrow to those mutinous Israelites, which without direction from God by Moses would have entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it seemeth that the greatest number of that army were of the Canaanites, because in the first of Deut. 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are said to have beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the same that had a victory over Israel near Cadesbarne, or if it were his predecessor that then prevailed, this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red sea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the south part of Canaan was first to be invaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses's purpose to compass Moab, determined while he was yet in the desert to try the quarrel. And whereas it followeth in the 3d verse of the xiith chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites utterly destroy'd the Canaanites and their cities, they are much mistaken that think, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be understood, to have been done in the future, to wit, in the time of Joshua. For had Moses at that time entred Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, he would not have fallen back again into the desarts of Zin and Moab, and have fetched a wearisome and needless compass, by the rivers of Zared and Arnon.

Neither is their conjecture to be valued at any thing, which affirm, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it self, but that his territory lay without it, and near the mountain Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the south borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the south of the land of Canaan that Arad dwelt: which south part of Canaan was the north part of Edom.

Again, Horma (for so far the Israelites after their victory pursued the Canaanites) is seated in the south of Judea. There is also a city of that name in Simoon. But there is no such place to the south of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed presently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to prove, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Joshua's time, and not at the instant of Arad's assault. For had the Israelites at this time sack'd the cities of Arad, they would not the next day have complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great cities, there is also water and bread. But it was in the time of Joshua, that the Israelites took their revenge, and after they had pass'd Jordan: Joshua then governing them; who in the xiith chapter and 14th verse, nameth this Arad by the name of his city so called; and with him the king of Horma: to which place the Israelites pursued the Canaanites. And he nameth them amongst those kings, which he vanquished and put to death.

Now after this assault and surprise by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, he led the people eastward to compass Idumea and the Dead sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the plains of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a desert was terrible, began again to rebel against their leader; till God by a multitude of fiery serpents (that is, by the biting of serpents, whose venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterwards, according to his plentiful grace, cured them again by their beholding an artificial serpent, by his commandment set up.

From the mount Hor, Moses leaving the ordinary way, which lieth between the Red sea and Cœlesyria, incamped at Zalmora: and thence he removed to Phunon, where he erected the brazen serpent; making these journies by the edge of Edumea, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principal city of the Edomites. Now where it is written in Numbers xxi. 4. That from mount Hor, they departed by the way of the Red sea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant that the Israelites turned back towards the Red sea; neither did they march (according to Ponsæca) per viam, quæ habet a latere mare rubrum, by the way that sided the Red sea; but indeed they cross'd, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Trachonitis, and the countries of Moab to the Red sea, that is, to Ezion-gaber; Eloth and Midian: which way, as it lay north and south, so Israel, to shun the border of Edom, and to take the utmost east part of Moab, cross'd the common way towards the east, and then they turned again towards the north, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth; where they en-tred the territory of Moab, adjoining to the land of Suph, a country bordering on the Dead sea; and from thence to Abarim, the 38th mansion, that is, where the mountains so called take beginning, and are as yet but small mountains of hills, on the east border of Moab; from whence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the river of Zared, which riseth in the mountains of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead sea, not far from Petra the metropolis thereof, being the 39th station. And having pass'd that river, they lodged at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblatthaim, one of the cities of Moab; which Jeremy (chap. xlviii. ver. 22.) calleth the House of Diblatthaim, the same which afterwards was destroy'd among the rest by Nebuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the river of Arnon, and incamped in the mountains of Abarim: tho' in Numbers xxii. Moses doth not remember Helmondiblatthaim, but speaketh of his remove from the river of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon; calling Arnon the border of Moab, between them and the Amorites: speaking, as he found the state of the country at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, king of the Amorites: even from the predecessor of Balaac-Peor then reigning. From Diblatthaim, Moses sent messengers to Sehon king of the Amorites, to desire a passage thro' his country: which tho' he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to give a reason to the neighbour nations, of the war he undertook. And tho' Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Sehon observed the same precept, which he left to his posterity, and successors, for a law of the war, namely in Deut. xx. 10. in these words, When thou comest near unto a city to fight against it, thou shalt offer it peace, which if it do accept of and open unto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries unto thee, and serve thee; but if it refuse, &c. thou shalt smite all the males thereof with the edge of the sword. Which ordinance all commanders of armies have observed to this day, or ought to have done.

SECT. VII.

Of the book of the battles of the Lord, mentioned in this story, and of other books mentioned in scripture which are lost.

NOW concerning the war between Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to refer a great part of this story to that book, entitled, Liber bellorum Domini; The book of God's battles; and therefore passeth over many encounters, and other things memorable, with greater brevity in this place. His words after the Geneva translation are these: Wherefore it shall be spoken in the book of the battles of the Lord, what things he did in the Red sea, and in the rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar copy differeth not in sense from this: but the Greek Septuagint vary. For the Greek writes it to this effect, For thus it is said in the book: the war of the Lord bath burnt (or inflamed) Zoob, and the brooks of Arnon. Junius, for the Red sea, which is in the Genevan, and Vulgar edition, names the region of Suph, a country bordering the Dead sea towards the east, as he conjectureth. The text he readeth thus. Idcirco dici solet in recensione bellorum Jehova, contra Vahobum in regione Suph: & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis; Therefore it is spoken in repeating of the battles of Jehovah, against Vahob in the country of Suph: and against the rivers, the rivers of Arnon. In which words he understands, that amongst the wars which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memory in the mouth of most men, concerning the war of Sehon against Vabeb the king of the Moabites, and of his winning the country near Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vabeb was the immediate predecessor of Balac, who lived with Moses; though it be written that this Balac was the son of Zippor, and not of Vabeb. For it seems (as it is plain in the succession of the Edomites) that these kingdoms were elective and not successive. And as Junius in this translation understandeth no special book of the battles of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his annotations, doubt whether in this place any special book be meant; and if any; whether it be not a prediction of wars in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the book of Judges. Siracides, cap. xlv. tells us plainly, that those battles of the Lord were fought by Joshua. Who was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battles of the Lord. But seeing the histories of the Scripture elsewhere often pass over matters of great weight in few words, referring the reader to other books, written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable, that such a book as this there was; wherein the several victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other volumes, filled with divine discourse, have perished in the long race of time, or have been destroy'd by the ignorant and malicious heathen magistrate. For the books of Henoch, howsoever they have been in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembered in an epistle of Thaddæus, and cited by Origen περί ἀρχαῶν, and by Tertullian.

That work also of the patriarch Abraham, of formation, which others bellow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The books remembered by Joshua, chap. x. ver. 13. and in the 2d of Samuel, chap. i. ver. 18. called the Book of Jasher, or Juthorim, is also lost; wherein the stay of the sun and moon in the midst of the heavens is recorded, and how they stood still, till Israel had avenged themselves of their enemies: out of which also David took the precept of teaching the children of Juda, to exercise their bows against their enemies.

Some think this to be the book of eternal predestination, in which the just are written, according to Psalms xlix. 28. where it is said, Let them be put out of the book of life, neither let them be written with the righteous. Jerome thinks, that David by this book understood those of Samuel; Rabbi Solomon, that the books of the law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the just Abraham, of Isaac, Jacob, and Moses, are written; others, that it was the book of Exodus; others, as Theodoretus, that it was a commentary upon Joshua by an unknown author.

The book of Ghozai, concerning Manassah, remembered in the 2d of Chron. xxxiii. 18, 19. Of this book, also lost, Jerome conceives that the prophet Isaiab was the author.

The same mischance came as well to the story of Solomon, written by Abia Silonites, who met with Jeroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the kingdom of Israel from the son of Solomon: as to the books of Nathan the prophet, and to those of Jeedo and Seer, remembered in the 2d of Chron. ix. 29. with these have the books of She-maiab and of Iddo, remembered in the 2d of Chron. xii. 15. perished: and that of Jehu the son of Hanani, of the acts of Jehosaphat, cited in the 2d of Chron. xx. 34. Also that book of Solomon, which the Hebrews write Hascirim, of 5000 verses, of which that part called Canticum Canticorum only remaineth, 1 Kings iv. 32. and with this divers others of Solomon's works have perished, as his book of the natures of trees, plants, beasts, fishes, &c. 1 Kings iv. 33. with the rest remembered by Origen, Josephus, Jerome, Cedrenus, Cicco Asculanus, Picus Mirandula, and others.

Of these and other books many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nebuchadnezzar burnt the temple of Jerusalem. But let us return thither where we left.

SECT. VIII.

Of Moses's sparing the issue of Lot: and of the giants of those parts: and of Sehon and Og.

WHEN Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposite to the city of Nebo, leaving the city of Midian on his left hand, and attempting nothing upon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabit on the south side of Arnon, having lost all his ancient and best territory, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to provoke them to battle, God having given that land to the children of Lot; the same which was anciently possess'd by the Emims, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those giants called Anakims, or the sons of Anac.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummims. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the east of Jordan, even to the desert of Arabia, as well on the west, as on the east side of the mountains of Gilead, was inhabited by giants. And in the plantation of the land promised, the Israelites did not at any time pass those mountains to the east of Bas-fan, but left their country to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We find also, that as there were many giants both before and after the flood: so these nations, which anciently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the land it fell, had among them many families of giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the city of Arbab, which Arbab in Joshua is called the father of the Anakims; and the greatest man of the Anakims. There had also been giants in the land of the Moabites, called Emims: and their chief city was Aroer or Ar, near the river of Arnon. To the giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gave the name of Zamzummims; which were of the same ancient Canaanites: and their chief city was Rabba, afterwards Philadelphia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Viri robusti, horrendique gigantes; Strong men, and fearful giants, who inhabited other cities of Ham, or Hom, in the same province, and not far to the north of Aroer.

Now Moses having pass'd Arnon, and being incamped at Abarim; and having (as before) sent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a passage through his country, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former conquest upon Vahab the Moabite, which nation the Amorites esteemed but as strangers and usurpers (themselves being of the sons of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way; and withal prepared to encounter Moses with as much speed as he could, because Moses incamped in the country of his new conquests, to wit, the plains of Moab, the 42d and last mansion: which Moses wasted with the multitude of his people and cattle. Towards him therefore hastening himself, they encountered each other at Jabaz: where Sehon with his children and people were broken and discomfited: and the victory so pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. He also slaughtered all the women and children of the Amorites, which he found in Essebon, and all the other cities, villages, or fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Basan also were: and descended of Emoreus or Amoreus: for ^a Moses calleth the Basanites also Amorites. And altho' Israel might now have taken a ready way and passage into Judea, being at this time, and after this victory, at the banks of Jordan: yet he knew it to be perilous to leave so great a part of that nation of the Amorites on his back, as inhabited all the region of Basan or Traconitis: and therefore he led on his army to invade Og, a person of exceeding strength and stature, and the only man of mark remaining of the ancient giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60 cities walled and defended: lying between the mountain of Hermon (which mountain, saith Moses, the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir) and the river of Jordan. And it befell unto the king of Basan (who attended Moses's coming at Edrei) as it did unto Sibon: for he and his sons perished, and all his cities were taken and possessed. After this, Moses withdrawing himself back again to the mountains of Abarim, left the prosecution of that war unto Jair the son of Manasseh: who conquering the east parts of Basan, to wit, the kingdom of Argob, even unto the nations of the Gessuri and Machati, 60 walled cities: called the same after his own name Havoth Jair: of all which conquests afterwards the half tribe of Manasseh possess'd the north part as far as Edrei, but the east part that belonged to Sibon the Amorite, with the mountains of Gilead adjoining, was given to Ruben and unto Gad.

Of the troubles about the Midianites, and of Moses's death.

After these victories, and while Israel sojourn'd in the valley of Moab, the Midianites and Moabites (over both which nations it seemeth that Balaam king of the Moabites then commanded in chief) sought, according to the advice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrews to the love of their daughters, and by persuading them to honour and serve their idols, to divide them both in love and religion among themselves: thereby the better both to defend their own interest against them, as also to beat them out of Moab, and the countries adjoining. The Israelites, as they had ever been inclined, so were they now easily persuaded to these evil courses, and thereby drew on themselves the plague of pestilence, whereof there perished ^b 24000 persons: besides which punishment of God the most of the offenders among the Hebrews, were by his commandment put to the sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the son of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a prince of the Simeonites, together with Cosbi, a daughter of one of the chief of the Midianites, the plague ceased, and God's wrath was appeased. For such was the love and kindness of his all-powerfulness, respecting the ardent zeal of Phineas in prosecuting of Zimri (who being a chief among the Hebrews became an idolater) as he forgave the rest of Israel, and stay'd his hand for his sake.

In this valley it was that Moses caused the people to be numbred the third time: and there remained of able men fit to bear arms ^c 601730, of which at his last enterprise, he appointed 12000 to be chosen out, to invade the cities of Midian, who, together with the Moabites, practised with Balaam to curse Israel: and after that sought to allure them (as before remembred) from the worship of the true God, to the service of Beth-I'm: and to the rest of their barbarous idolatry. Over which companies of 12000 Moses gave the charge to Phineas, the son of Eleazar the high priest: who slew the five princes of the ^d Midianites, which were, or had lately been, the vassals of Sehon, as appeareth by ^e Joshua. These five princes of the Midianites slain by Eleazar, were at that time but the vassals of ^f Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba the dukes of Sehon, saith Joshua. He slew also all the men, male children, and women: saving such as had not yet used the company of men, but those they saved and dispers'd them among the children of Israel to serve them.

And ^g Moses having now lived 120 years, making both his own weakness of body known to the people, and his inability to travel: and also that he was forewarned of his end by the spirit of God: from whom he received a new commandment to ascend the mountains of Abarim, and thereon to render up his life: he hastned to settle the government in Joshua: whom he persuaded with most lively arguments to prosecute the conquest begun, assuring him of God's favour and assistance therein. And so having spent these his latter days after the conquest of Og and Sehon, king of the Amorites, in the repetition and exposition of the law (or an iteration of the law, according to ^h St. Augustine) using both arguments, prayers, and threats unto the people: which he often repeated unto them; thereby to confirm them in knowledge, love, fear, and service, of the all-powerful God: he ⁱ blessed the twelve tribes, that of Simeon excepted, with several and most comfortable blessings: praising the greatness and goodness of him, unto whom in his prayers he commended them: he also commanded the priests to lay up the book of the law, by the side of the ark of God: the last that he indited was that propheticall song, beginning, ^k I hearken ye heavens and I will speak, and let the earth hear the words of my mouth: and being called by God from the labours and sorrows of this life, unto that rest which never afterwards hath disquiet, he was buried in the land of ^l Moab, over against Beth-Peor: but no man knoweth of his sepulchre to this day, which happened in the year of the world 2554.

Observations out of the story of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

NOW let us a little, for instruction, look back to the occasions of sundry of the great events, which have been mentioned in this story of the life of Moses, for (excepting God's miracles, his promise, and fore-choice of this people) he wrought in all things else by the medium of mens affections, and natural appetites. And so we shall find, that the fear which Pharaoh had of the increase of the Hebrews, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next natural cause of the sorrows and loss, which befel himself, and the Egyptian nation: which numbers when he sought, by cruel and ungodly policies, to cut off and lessen, as when he commanded all the male children of the Hebrews to be slain, God (whose providence cannot be resisted, nor his purposes prevented by all the foolish and savage craft of mortal men) moved compassion in the heart of Pharaoh's own daughter, to preserve that child, which afterwards became the most wise, and of all men the most gentle and mild, the most excellently learned in all divine and human knowledge, to be the conductor and deliverer of his oppressed brethren, and the overthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his nation; even then, when he sought by the strength of his men of war, of his horse and chariots, to tread them under, and bury them in the dust. The grief which Moses conceived of the injuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrews in his own presence, moved him to take revenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his own nation, by threatening him to discover the slaughter of the Egyptian, moved him to fly into Midian: the contention between the shepherds of that place, and Jethro's daughters, made him known to their father: who not only entertained him, but married him to one of those sisters: and, in that solitary life of keeping of his father-in-law's sheep, far from the press of the world, contenting himself (tho' bred as a king's son) with the lot of a poor herdsman, God found him out in that desert, wherein he first suffered him to live many years, the better to know the ways and passages thro' which he purposed that he should conduct his people toward the land promised: and therein appearing unto him, he made him know his will and divine pleasure for his return into Egypt. The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterwards by God's direction performed in the story of Israel before remembred. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seem unto men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence: but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by; yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many years after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt; and of the men of renown in other nations, about the times of Moses and Joshua, with the sum of the history of Joshua.

SECT. I.

How the nations, with whom the Israelites were to have war, were divers ways, as it were, prepared to be their enemies.

IN like manner if we look to the quality of the nations, with whom the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to do, either in the wilderness, or afterwards: we shall find them long before-hand, by the disposing providence of God, as it were prepared for enmity: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham: and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Ismaelites) were mingled with them by mutual marriages: whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diversity in religion, were these nations, as it were, prepared to be enemies to the Israelites, and so to serve for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, we must understand, that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountains of Libanus, and Zidon on the north, by the same mountains continued as far as the springs of Arnon on the east: by the way of Egypt, and the Red sea on the south, and by the Mediterranean sea on the west: was inhabited and peopled by two nations, the one springing from the sons of Cham, the other from Sem: but those of Sem, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with one family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part were the Canaanites, the ancient lords and possessors of those territories, by process of time divided into several families and names: whereof some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamzumims, or Zuzei, Emims, Horites, and others. These (as men most valiant and able commonly do) did inhabit the utter borders and mountains of their countries: the rest were the Zidonians, Jebusites, Amorites, Hevites, Hetites, and others, who took name after the sons of Canaan, and after whom the country in general was still called.

As for the Hebrews which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another family, and strangers in that country: especially the Israelites, and this was some cause why the Canaanites did not affect them, or endure them: no more than the Philistines did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For tho' Abraham himself being a stranger was highly esteemed and honoured among them, especially by the Amorites inhabiting the west part of Jordan: yet now even they which descended from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites: as holding them strangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity: than of their old pedigree from Abraham.

True it is, that these nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred, who had linked themselves and matched with the Canaanites and others, had so far possessed themselves of the borders of those regions, as they began to be equal in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. For of Lot came those two great families of the Moabites, and Ammonites: of Esau the Idumeans: of Madian the Madianites: of Ismael, the eldest son of Abraham, came the Ismaelites, with whom are joined, as of the same nation, the Amalekites, whom tho' the more common opinion thinketh to have been a tribe of Edom, because Esau had a grandchild of that name, yet manifest reason convinceth it to have been otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to provoke the Edomites, or do them any wrong, whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and endless war decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere, Chap. viii. Sect. iii. Of ^a It also seemeth that Hus, the son of Nachor, and Buz his brother, planted themselves in the east-side of Jordan about Basan: where they find the land of Hus: in which both Job dwelt, as one of the issue of Hus the son of Nachor, and Elshu his friend, which is called a Buzate. See hereafter, Chap. 10. Sect. 7. ^b Exod. 17. 16. ^c Deut. 11. 5. ^d Deut. 11. 5.

^a*Ismael's* eldest son, Naboth, sprung the Arabians of Petrea, called Nabathæi. Now even as Abraham besought God to bless Ismael, so it pleased him both to ^bpromise and perform it. For of him those twelve princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that tract of land between Havilah upon Tygris, and Sur, which is the west part of the desert of Arabia Petrea. Yet howsoever the strength of these later named nations, which descended from Abraham, were great yet it is not unlikely but that some reason which moved them not to favour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of fear: because all princes and states do not willingly permit any stranger or powerful nation to enter their territories. Wherefore, tho' all these families before named, were not so united, in and among themselves, but that they had their jealousies of each other, and contended for dominion; yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood a-part, or united, they were taught by the care of their own preservation, to join themselves together against Israel; tho' they did it nothing so maliciously and resolvedly as the Canaanites did. For the Idumeans only denied the Hebrews a passage: which the Moabites durst not deny: because their country lay more open; and because themselves had lately been beaten out of the richest part of their dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites their country lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og, kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong by reason of the mountains which divided it from Bashan. Again, that which moved the Moabites in their own reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his confederate: was, that the Moabites might hope after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recover again their own inheritance: to wit, the valleys and plains lying between the mountains of Arabia and Jordan: but as soon as Sehon was slain, and that the king of Moab, Balaac, perceived that Moses allotted that valley to the tribes of Gad and Reuben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the daughters of Midian, as aforesaid, to allure them to idolatry. And thus at length the Moabites by special occasion were more and more stirred up to enmities against Israel. And as for divers of the rest that were descended from Abraham's kindred, we may note, how in the beginning, between the authors of their pedigrees, God permitted some enmity to be as it were prefiges of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier incensed by the memory of old grudges: and withal by some disdain from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest son of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest son of Isaac, Jacob being but a second son of a second brother, those princes which were descended of the elder houses, being natural men, might scorn to give place, much less to subject themselves to their inferiours, as they took it; and for a more aggravation, the issues of Esau, princes of Idumea, might keep in record, ^dthat their parent was bought out of his birth right by Jacob's taking his advantage, and that he was ^edeceived of his father's blessing also by him; and that ^f*Jacob* after reconciliation came not unto him, as he promised, unto Seir, or Idumea.

So also in the posterity of Ismael, it might remain as a seed, or pretence of enmity, that their forefather was by the instigation of Sarah cast out into the desert, with his mother Hagar; and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his angel to relieve them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his mother and to his wife: and Amalek was also an Horite by his mother; which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Idumeans also, or Edomites, were by their maternal line descended of the Canaanites. For ^g*Esau* took two wives of that nation: one of them was Adah the daughter of Elon the Hittite, and the other Aholibamah the grand-child of Zibeon the Hevite, lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Esau, and called after his name Edom, or Edumæa.

Lastly, It appears that all those families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in process of time corrupted, and drawn from the knowledge and worship of God, and became idolaters, infected and seduced by the conversation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wives of the Canaanites which they had married: only a few of the Kenites, and those Midianites which inhabited on the edge of the Red sea, whereof Jethro was priest, or prince, or both, worshipped the true and everliving God.

SECT. II.

Of the kings of the Canaanites and Midianites, mentioned in the ancient wars of the Israelites.

OF the kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham (or Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better pedigree) we find four named by Moses, and thirty one remembered by Joshua, tho' few of these named, otherwise than by these cities over which they commanded; to which each of them had a small territory adjoining, and no other dominion. These Canaanites in a general consideration are to be understood for all those nations descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Hevites, &c. and so here we understand this name in speaking of the kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the country of their habitation, the holy land, or the land of promise: for God hath appointed that the seven principal families should be rooted out: and that his own people should inherit their lands and cities. But if we consider of the name and nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan on the east, and by the Mediterranean sea on the west: in which narrow country, and in the choicest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their paternal name, chiefly inhabited.

The first kings of these nations, named in the scriptures, was ^h*Hamor*, or Hever, of the Hevites, whom Siméon and Levi slew, together with his son Sichem, in revenge of their sister's ravishment.

Arad was the second king which the scriptures have remembered, who had that part of Canaan towards the south, neighbouring Edom and the dead sea; the same which surprized Israel, as they encamped in the ⁱwilderness in the edge of Idumea.

The third named, was Sehon king of Essebon, who before Moses's arrival had beaten the Moabites out of the west part of Arabia Petrea, or Nabathæa, and thrust them over ^k*Arnon* into the deserts, the same whom Moses overthrew in the plains of Moab; at which time he took Essebon, and all the cities of the Amorites.

Presently after which victory, ^l*Og* was also slain by Israel, who commanded the north part of that valley between the mountains Trachoni, or Galaad, and Jordan, who was also a king of the ^m*Amorites*.

^a Exod. 17. 16. ^b Gen. 17. ^c Numb. 21. 24. ^d Gen. 25. ^e Gen. 27. ^f Gen. 33. 14. ^g Gen. 36. ^h Gen. 34. ⁱ Numb. 21. 1. ^k Numb. 21. 21. ^l Josh. 9. ^m Joseph. Ant. lib. 4. c. 5. ⁿ Numb. 21. 35.

The fifth was Adonizedek, king of the Jebusites, and of Jerusalem, with whom Joshua nameth four other kings.

Hobam king of Hebron.

Piram king of Jarmuth.

Japia king of Lachis, and Deber king of Eglon; who were all ^a*Amorites*, overthrown in battle, and hanged by Joshua. After this overthrow, Joshua nameth Jabin king of Hazor, and Jobab king of Madon; whom he also slaughtered, and took his cities: and this Jabin seemed to have some dominion over the rest, for it is said in the text, ^b*For Hazor before time was the head of all those kingdoms*.

After these Adonibezek that notorious tyrant is named; who confessed that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands and feet of seventy kings, enforcing them to gather crumbs under his table: who, after Juda and Simeon had used the same execution upon himself, acknowledged it to be a just revenge of God: this king was carried to Jerusalem, where he died.

The last king named is Jabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Joshua. For at such time as he employed Sisera against Israel, whom he oppressed twenty years, after the death of Ehud, he inhabited Hazor. This Jabin, ^c*Barak* (encouraged by Deborah) overthrew; and his captain Sisera had by Jael, the wife of ^d*Heber* the Kenite, a nail driven into his head while he slept in her tent; Jabin himself perishing afterwards in that war.

The Madianites had also their kings at times, but commonly mixt with the ^e*Moabites*; and they held a corner of land in Nabathea, to the south-east of the dead sea. They descended from Madian, Abraham's son by ^f*Keturah*. Raguel surname Gethogleus or Jethres, saith Josephus, called Jethro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Judges, the son of Dathan, the grand-child of Jexanis, or Joksham, the great grand-child of Abraham by ^g*Keturah*, was priest or prince of the Madianites by the Red sea, whose daughter or niece Moses married; and of whom I have spoken elsewhere more at large. This Jethro, if he were not the same with Hobab, must be his father: and this Hobab had seven daughters. He guided Moses in the wilderness, and became one of the Israelites: of him descended the Kenites, so called of his father ^h*Raguel*'s surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Jabin the second, even now remembered.

At such time as Saul invaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israel, gave them warning to separate themselves: and yet the ⁱ*Kenites* had strong seats, and lived in the mountains of the deserts.

The kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named, were these.

1. Memor the Hevite of Sichem.
2. Arad of the south parts.
3. Sehon of Essebon.
4. Og of Basan.
5. Adonizedek the Jebusite, king of Jerusalem.
6. ^j*Hobam* of Hebron.
7. Piram of Jarmuth.
8. Japia of Lachis.

9. Debir of Eglon.
10. Jabin of Hazor.
11. ^k*Jobab* of Modon.
12. Adonibezek of Bezek, and
13. Jabin the second king of Hazor.

Of the MADIANITES these:

Rekam or Recem, who built Petra, the metropolis of Petræa, so called by the Greeks: and by Isaiah xvi. 1. and Selah, which is as much as Petra: and so also it is called 2 Reg. xiv. 7. where it is also called Joktheel.

After the death of Barac, judge of Israel, the four last named of these Madianite kings, vexed Israel seven years: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and slain by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Jordan, as in the 6th, 7th, and 8th of Judges it is written at large. Afterwards in the pursuit of the rest, Gideon himself laid hands upon Zebah and Zalmunna, or Zalmunna, and executed them, being prisoners; in which expedition of Gideon there perished 120000 of the Madianites, and their confederates. Of the Idumeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speak hereafter in the description of their territories.

SECT. III.

Of the Amalekites and Ishmaelites.

OF the kings of the Amalekites, and Ishmaelites, I find few that are named; and tho' of the Ishmaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied into a greater nation, according to the promise of God made unto ⁿ*Abraham*) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Midianites, were numbered among them, were more renowned in ^o*Moses*'s time than the rest of the Ishmaelites. So also were they when Saul governed Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sur into Havilah, to wit, over a great part of Arabia Petræa, and the desert. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelve princes which came of Ishmael, were content to leave those barren deserts of Arabia Petræa, called Shur, Paran and Sin, to the issue of Abraham by Keturah, that joined with them (for so seem the Amalekites to have been, and so were the Midianites;) themselves taking possession of a better soil in Arabia the happy, and about the mountains of Galaad in Arabia Petræa. For Nabaioth, the eldest of those twelve princes, planted that part of Arabia Petræa, which was very fruitful, tho' adjoining to the desert, in which Moses wandred, afterwards called Nabathea: the same which neighboureth Judea on the east side. They also peopled a province in Arabia the happy, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathei, [b] changed into [p.]

Kedar, the second of Ishmael's sons, gave his own name to the east part of Basan or Batanea which was afterwards possessed by Manasseh, so much thereof as lay within the mountains of Traconi, or Gilead. Which nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, and Pliny, Cedreans.

Adbeel sat down in the desert Arabia, near the mountains which divided it from the happy; and gave name to the Adubens, which Ptolomy calleth Agubens.

Mibsam was the parent of the Masamancuses, near the mountain Zamath, in the same Arabia the happy.

The Raabens were of Mishma; who joined to the Orchens, near the Arabian gulf, where Ptolomy setteth Zagmais.

Of Duma were the Dumeans, between the Adubens and Raabens: where the city Dumeth sometimes stood.

Of Massa the Massani; and of Hadar, or Chadar, the Athrita, who bordered the Napatheans in the same happy Arabia.

Of Yetur the Itureans, or Chamatbens; of whom Tobu was king in David's time.

Of Nabhri the Nubeian Arabians; inhabiting Syria Zoba: over whom Adadezer commanded while David ruled Israel.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ishmael's sons, was the ancestor of the Cadmoneans; who were afterwards called Asitæ, because they worshipped the fire with the Babylonians.

The Amalekites gave their kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians, Adad to theirs, and the Arabians, Nabatheans, Aretas, as names of honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses, after he pass'd the Red sea; when of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished.

Afterwards they joined with the Canaanites, and beat the Israelites near Cades-barne. After the government of Othoniel, they joined them with the Moabites; after Barac with the Madianites, and invaded Israel. God commanded, that as soon as Israel had rest, they should root out the name of the Amalekites; which Saul executed in part, when he wasted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Chaldea: from Havilah to Shur.

In David's time they took Ziklag in Simeon: but David followed them, and surprized them, recovering his prisoners and spoils. And yet, after David became king, they again vexed him, but to their own loss.

In Hzekiab's time as many of them as joined to Idumea were wasted and displanted by the children of Simeon.

S E C T. IV.

Of the instauration of civility in Europe about those times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

THERE lived at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength, as in all sorts of learning. And as the world was but even now enriched with the written law of the living God, so did art and civility (bred and fostered far off in the east, and in Egypt) begin at this time to discover a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece neighbouring Asia and Judea. For if Pelagus, besides his bodily strength, was chosen king of Arcadia, because he taught those people to erect them simple cottages, to defend them from rain and storm: and learned them withal to make a kind of meal, and bread of Acorns, who before lived for the most part by herbs and roots: we may thereby judge how poor and wretched those times were, and how falsely those nations have vaunted of those their antiquities, accompanied not only with civil learning, but with all other kinds of knowledge. And it was in this age of the world, as both Eusebius and St. Augustine have observed, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea ferunt de lato formasse homines, quia optimus sapientiae doctor fuisse perhibetur; Of whom it is reported, that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of wisdom: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the invention of fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inventa sapientiae pertinere; To have reference to wise inventions: and Eschylus affirmeth, that by the stealing of Jupiter's fire was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the stars, and other celestial bodies. Again, it is written of him, that he had the art so to use this fire, as thereby he gave life to images of wood, stone, and clay: meaning that before his birth and being, those people among whom he lived had nothing else worthy men, but external form and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the hill Caucasus, his entrails the while devoured by an eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire he had to invelligate the natures, motions, and influences of heavenly bodies: for so it is said; Ideo altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut sereno cælo quam longissime astra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret: That he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a clear sky discern a-far off, the settings and risings of the stars: tho' Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwise, and others diversly.

Of this man's knowledge Eschylus gives this testimony.

As agebant omnia

Ut fors ferebat: donec ipse reperi

Signorum obitus, ortusque qui mortalibus

Sunt utiles: & multitudinem artium

His reperi: componere inde literas;

Matremque musarum auxi ego memoriam

Perutilem cunctis, &c.

But fortune governed all their works, till when I first found out how stars did set and rise;

A profitable art to mortal men:

And others of like use I did devise;

As letters to compose in learned wise

I first did teach: and first did amplify

The mother of the muses memory.

Africanus makes Prometheus far more ancient, and but 94 years after Ogyges. Porphyrus says, that he lived at once with Inachus, who lived with Isaac.

There lived also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sons of Japetus, of whom tho' it be said, that they were born before Moses's days, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date; yet the advantage of their long lives gave them a part of other ages among men, which came into the world long after them. Besides these sons of Japetus, Eschylus finds two other, to wit, Oceanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the west, gave name to the evening, and so to the evening-star. Also besides this Atlas of Libya or Mauritania, there were others, which bare the same name: but of the Libyan, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those mountains which cross Africa, to the south of Morocco, Sus, and Hea, with the sea adjoining took name, which memory Plato in Critias bestows on Atlas, the son of Neptune.

^a Plin. l. 6. c. 28. ^b Junius. ^c Exod. 17. ^d Numb. 14. ^e 1 Sam. 30. 2 Sam. 8. 12. ^f 1 Chron. 4. ^g Aug. l. 18. c. 8. de Civit. Dei. ^h Eschyl. in Prom. vinet. in c. 8. l. 18. de Civit. Dei. ⁱ L. Vives ex Hes. ^k Eschyl. in Prom. vinet. ^l Aug. l. 18. c. 3. de Civit. Dei.

Cicero, in the fifth of his Tusculan questions, affirmeth, that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to express divine knowledge. Nec vero Atlas sustinere Cælum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucaſo, nec stellatus Cepheus cum uxore traderetur, nisi divina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabulæ traduxisset; Neither should Atlas be said to bear up Heaven, nor Prometheus to be fastened to Caucasus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be stellified, unless their divine knowledge had raised upon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometimes express'd Time by Prometheus, sometimes he took him for Saturn; as Rheæ conjux alme Prometheu. But that the story of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction; and that he lived about this time, the most approved historians and antiquaries, and among them Eusebius and St. Augustine have not doubted. For the great judgment which Atlas had in astronomy, saith St. Augustine, were his daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleiades and Hyades: others attribute unto him the finding out of the moon's course, of which Archas the son of Orchomenus challengeth the invention. Of this Archas, Arcadia in Peloponnesus took name, and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the moon. Et luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to be understood, saith Natalis Comes, before there had been any observation of the moon's course; or of her working in inferiour bodies. And tho' there be that bestow the finding out thereof upon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Isacius Tzetzes, a curious searcher of antiquities, gave it Atlas of Libya: who, besides his gifts of mind, was a man of unequalled and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesian, as it is said, had the ground of his philosophy.

SECT. V.

Of Deucalion and Phaeton.

AND in this age of the world, and while Moses yet lived, Deucalion reigned in Theſſaly, Crotopus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion was the son of Prometheus, saith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gave him Pandora for mother, the rest Clymene: Homér, in the 15th of his Odyssey, makes Deucalion the son of Minos; but he must needs have meant some other Deucalion; for else either Ulyſſes was mistaken, or Homér, who put the tale into his mouth. For Ulyſſes, after his return from Troy, feigned himself to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was son to this latter Deucalion, the son of Minos: but this Minos lived but one age before Troy was taken (for Idomeneus served in that war) and this Deucalion the son of Prometheus, who lived at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalion's time happened that great inundation in Theſſaly: by which, in effect, every soul in those parts perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his wife, and some few others. It is affirmed, that at the time of this flood in Theſſaly, those people exceeded in all kind of wickedness and villany: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractive of God's vengeance, so did all that nation, for their foul sins, perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and cruelty of all mankind drew on them that general destruction by the flood universal. Only Deucalion and Pyrrha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be lovers of virtue, of justice, and of religion. Of whom Ovid:

*Non illo melior quisquam; nec amantior æqui
Vir fuit: aut illà reverentia ulla dearum.*

No man was better, nor more just than he:
Nor any woman godlier than she.

It is also affirmed that Prometheus foretold his son Deucalion of this overflowing, and advised him to provide for his own safety; who hereupon prepared himself a kind of vessel, which Lucian in his dialogue of Timon calls Cibotium; and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterwards add the sending out of the dove, to discover the waters fall and decrease, I should verily think that this story had been but an imitation of Noah's flood devised by the Greeks, did not the times so much differ, and St. Augustine, with others of the fathers, and reverend writers, approve this story of Deucalion. Among other his children, Deucalion had these two of note, Helen, of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas; and Melantibo, on whom Neptune is said to have begot Delphus, which gave name to Delphos, so renowned among the heathen for the oracle of Apollo therein founded.

And that which was no less strange and marvelous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also happened under Phaeton; not only in Ethiopia, but in Isiris, a region in Italy, and about Cume, and the mountains of Vesuvius: of both which, the Greeks, after their manner, have invented many strange fables.

SECT. VI.

Of Hermes Trismegistus.

BUT of all other which this age brought forth among the heathen, Mercurius was the most famous and renowned: the same which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter maximus: and of the Greeks, Hermes.

Many there were of this name: and how to distinguish, and set them in their own times, both St. Augustine and Lactantius find it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the God of thieves, the God of wrestlers, of merchants, and seamen, and the God of eloquence (tho' all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercury, of whose many works some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certain of the Greeks reckon five Mercuries: of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the son of Nilus, whose name the Egyptians feared to utter, as the Jews did their Tetragrammaton; the other, that Mercury which slew Argos in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is said to have delivered literature to the Egyptians, and to have given them laws. But Diodorus affirms, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Egypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying, that letters were not found out by that Mercury which slew Argus, but by that ancient Mercury, otherwise Themet; whom Philo Biblius writeth Taautus; the Egyptians Thoyth; the Alexandrines

* Lib. 13. c. 8. de Civitate Dei. b Ovid. de fast. l. 1. c Clem. Alex. Strom. l. 1. d Strab. l. 9. e August. de Civitate Dei, l. 18. c. 10. ex Eusebio & Hieronymo. f Laus. Vives out of Cicero, in Aug. de Civitate Dei, l. 8. c. 26.

Thot; and the Greeks (as before) Hermes.^a And to this Taautus, Sanconiatbo, who lived about the war of Troy, gives the invention of letters. But St. Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, calls neither of them the son of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to have slain Argus. For he finds this Mercury, the slayer of Argus, to be the grandchild of that Atlas which lived whilst Moses was yet young. And yet Lud. Vives upon St. Augustine seems to understand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest have remembered. But that conjecture of theirs, that any Grecian Mercury brought letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest (if there be any truth in prophane antiquity) that all the knowledge which the Greeks had, was transported out of Egypt, or Phenicia; and not out of Greece, nor by any Grecian, into Egypt. For they all confess that Cadmus brought letters first into Boetia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phenicia: it being true, that between Mercurius that lived at once with Moses, and Cadmus, there were these descents cast; Crotopus king of the Argives, with whom Moses lived, and in whose time about his tenth year Moses died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus who reigned 11 years; after him Danaus 50 years; after him Lyneus; in whose time, and after him in the time of Minos king of Crete, this Cadmus arrived in Boetia. And therefore it cannot be true, that any Mercurius about Moses's time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Egypt, whom St. Augustine remembreth, the one the grandfather, the other the nephew or grandchild, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moses found out letters, and taught the use of them to the Jews; of whom the Phenicians their neighbours received them; and the Greeks of the Phenicians by Cadmus. But this invention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembered; that is, because the Jews and the Phenicians had them first from him. For every nation gave unto those men the honour of first inventors, from whom they received the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercury, upon part of whose works he commenteth, to have been four descents after Moses; which he hath out of ^b*Virgil*, who calls Atlas, that lived with Moses, the maternal grandfather of the first famous Mercury, whom others, as Diodorus, calls the counsellor and instructor of that renowned Isis, wife of Osiris. But ^c*Ficinus* giveth no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury instructed Isis, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, and that such an inscription was found on a pillar erected on the tomb of Isis. Lud. Vives, upon the 26th chapter of the 8th book of St. Augustine de Civitate Dei, conceiveth that this Mercury, whose works are extant, was not the first which was entitled, Ter Maximus, but his nephew or grandchild. ^d*Sanconiaton*, an ancient Phenician, who lived shortly after Moses, hath other fancies of this Mercury; affirming that he was the scribe of Saturn, and called by the Phenicians, Taautus; and by the Egyptians, Thoth or Thoyt. It may be, that the many years which he is said to have lived, to wit, 300 years, gave occasion to some ^ewriters to find him in one time, and to others in other times. But by those which have collected the grounds of the Egyptian philosophy and divinity, he is found more ancient than Moses: because the inventor of the Egyptian wisdom, wherein it is said, that Moses was excellently learned.

It is true, that altho' this Mercury, or Hermes, doth in his divinity differ in many particulars from the scriptures, especially in the approving of images, which Moses of all things most detested; yet whosoever shall read him with an even judgment, will rather resolve that these works which are now extant, were by the Greeks and Egyptian priests corrupted, and those fooleries inserted, than that ever they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and spirit devised. For there is no man of understanding, and master of his own wits, that hath affirmed in one and the same tract, those things which are directly contrary in doctrine and in nature. For out of doubt (Moses excepted) there was never any man of those elder times that hath attributed more, and in a style more reverend and divine, unto Almighty God, than he hath done. And therefore if those his two treatises, now among us; the one converted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had been found in all things like themselves; I think it had not been perilous to have thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moses himself; and that the 'Egyptian theology hereafter written, was devised by the first, and more ancient Mercury, which others have thought to have been Joseph the son of Jacob; whom, after the exposition of Pharaoh's dreams, they called Saphanet Phane, which is as much as to say, Abconditorum Repertor, a finder out of hidden things. But these are over-adventurous opinions. For what this man was, it is known to God. Envy and aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worn out the certain knowledge of him: of whom, whosoever he were, Lactantius writeth in this sort: Hic scripsit libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem divinarum rerum pertinentes, in quibus majestatem summi ac singularis Dei asserit, iisdemque nominibus appellat, quibus nos Deum & Patrem; He hath written many books belonging to, or expressing the knowledge of divine things, in which he affirmeth the majesty of the most High and One God, calling him by the same names of God, and Father, as we do. The same father also feareth not to number him among the sibyls and prophets. And so contrary are these his acknowledgments to those idolatrous fictions of the Egyptians and Grecians, that for my self, I am persuaded, that whatsoever is found in him contrary thereunto, was by corruption inserted. For thus much himself confesseth: Deus omnium Dominus & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim ex ejus esse prodiens, perfectissimum existens, & generator & opifex, &c. God (saith he) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountain, and life, and power, and light, and mind, and spirit: and all things are in him and under him. For his word out of himself proceeding, being most perfect, and generative, and operative, falling upon fruitful nature, made it also fruitful and producing. And he was therefore (saith Suidas) called Ter maximus, quia Trinitate loquutus est: in Trinitate unum esse Deum asserens; Because he spake of the Trinity, affirming that there is one God in Trinity. Hic ruinam (saith Ficinus) prævidit prisce religionis, hic ortum novæ fidei, hic adventum Christi, hic futurum judicium, resurrectionem sæculi, beatorum gloriam, supplicia peccatorum. This Mercury foresaw the ruin of the old or superstitious religion, and the birth of the new faith; and of the coming of Christ, the future judgment, the resurrection, the glory of the blessed, and the torment or affliction of the wicked or damned.

To this I will only add his two last speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Volterran out of Suidas. Hactenus filii pulsus a patria, vixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolumis repeto: cumque post paulum a vobis corporeis vinculis absolutus discessero, videtote ne me quasi mortuum lugeatis: nam ad illam optimam beatamque civitatem regredior; ad quam universi cives mortis conditione venturi sunt. Ibi namque solus Deus est summus princeps: qui cives suos replet suavitate mirifica; ad quam hæc, quam multi vitam existimant, mors est potius dicenda quam vita; Hitherto, O son, being driven from my country, I have lived a stranger and banished man; but now I am preparing homeward again in safety. And when I shall after a few days (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and blood depart from you, see that ye do not bewail me as a man dead; for I do but return to that best and blessed city, to which all her citizens (by the condition of death) shall repair. Therein is the only God, the most high and chief prince, who filleth or teedeth his citizens with a sweetness more than marvellous; in regard whereof this being, which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death, than a life. The other, and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus converted by others, agreeing in sense, but not in words with Suidas. O cælum magni Dei sapiens opus, teque O vox patris quam ille primam emisit, quando universum constituit mundum, adjuro per unigenitum ejus verbum & spiritum cuncta comprehendentem, miseremini mei; I adjure thee, O heaven, thou wise work of the great God, and thee O voice of the father, which he first uttered, when he framed the whole world, by his only begotten Word and Spirit, comprehending all things, have mercy upon me.

But Suidas hath his invocation in these words; Obtestor te Cælum magni Dei sapiens opus, obtestor te vocem Patris quam locutus est primum cum primam mundum firmavit, obtestor te per unigenitum sermonem omnia continentem, propitius, propitius eslo. I beseech thee O heaven, wise work of the great God, I beseech thee, O voice of the father, which he spake first when he established all the world, I beseech thee by the only begotten word, containing all things, be favourable, be favourable.

Of Jannes and Jambres, and some others that lived about those times.

There were also in this age both Esculapius, which after his death became the God of physicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as Vives thinks in his commentary upon Augustine, de Civitate Dei, l. 8. and also those two notorious forcerers, Jannes and Jambres, who in that impious art excelled all that ever have been heard of to this day: and yet Moses himself doth not charge them with any familiarity with devils, or ill spirits; words indeed that seldom came out of his mouth; however by the Septuagint they are called Sophistæ or Venefici and Incantatores, sophist poisoners, and incanters: by Jerome, sapientes & malefici, wise men and evil-doers: and so by Vatablus, who also useth the word Magi. The Greek it self seems to attribute somewhat of what they did to natural magick; calling them φάρμακας, workers by drugs. The Genevian, Sorcerers and Incanters; Junius, Sapientes, Præstigiatores & Magi. Magicians and wise-men here by him are taken in one sense; and Prestigiatōrs are such as dazel men's eyes, and make them seem to see what they see not; as false colours, and false shapes. But as some virtues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded, and the one taken for the other (religion and superstition having one face and countenance) so did the works and workings of Moses, and of Pharoah's forcerers, appear in outward shew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to be one and the same art and gift of knowledge. For the devil changeth himself into an angel of light: and imitateth in all he can the ways and workings of the most High. And yet on the contrary, every work which surmounteth the wisdom of most men; is not to be condemned as performed by the help or ministry of ill spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath given to natural things, as such as where he also bestoweth the knowledge to understand their hidden and best virtues, many things by them are brought to pass, which seem altogether impossible, and above nature or art: which two speculations of works of nature, and of miracle, the Cabalists distinguished by these names; Opus de Beresith, & opus de Mercana: the one they call Sapientiam Naturæ, The wisdom of nature: the other Sapientiam Divinitatis, The wisdom of divinity: the one Jacob practised in the breeding the pied lambs in Mesopotamia; the other Moses exercised in his miracles wrought in Egypt; having received from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection, to wit, the knowledge of nature: of the other so far as it pleased God to portion him, both which he used to his glory that gave them; assuming to himself nothing at all, either in the least or most. Also St. Augustine noteth that from the time that Moses left Egypt, to the death of Joshua, divers other famous men lived in the world, who after their deaths, for their eminent virtues and inventions, were numbred among the gods: as Dionysius, otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Grecians the use of the vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted musical plays to Apollo Delphicus; thereby to regain his favour, who brought barrenness and scarcity upon that part of Greece, because they resisted not the attempts of Danaus, who spoiled his temple and set it on fire: so did Eriethonius institute the like games to Minerva; wherein the victor was rewarded with a present of oil, in memory of her that first press'd it out of the olive.

In this age also Xanthus ravished Europa, and begat on her Radamanthus, Sarpedon, and Minos, which three are also given to Jupiter by other historians. To these St. Augustine addeth Hercules; the same to whom the 12 labours are ascribed, native of Tyrinthia, a city of Peloponnesus: (or, as others say, only nursed and brought up there) who came into Italy, and destroy'd many monsters there; being neither that Hercules, which Eusebius surnameth Delphin, famous in Phenicia; nor that Hercules, according to Philostratus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Egyptian: Manifestum sit, non Thebanum Herculem, sed Egyptium ad Gades pervenisse, & ibi finem statuisse terræ (saith Philostratus, l. 2.) It is manifest that it was the Egyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which travelled as far as the streights of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. In this time also, while Moses wandered in the desarts, Dardanus built Dardania.

But whosoever they were, or how worthy soever they were that lived in the days and age of

Moses, there was never any man, that was no more than man, by whom it pleased God to work greater things, whom he favoured more; to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) he so often appeared; never any man more familiar and conversant with angels; never any more learned both in divine and human knowledge; never a greater prophet in Israel. He was the first that received and delivered the law of God entire; the first that left to posterity by letters, the truth and power of one infinite God, his creating out of nothing the world universal, and all the creatures therein; that taught the detestation of idolatry, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication which followed it.

^a Syracides calleth Moses the beloved of God and men, whose remembrance is blessed. He made him (saith the same author) like to the glorious saints, and magnified him by the fear of his enemies, made him glorious in the sight of kings, shewed him his glory, caused him to hear his voice, sanctified him with faithfulness and meekness, and chose him out of all men.

He is remembred among profane authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetick; by Megasthenes and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long lives which the patriarchs enjoyed before the flood, remembred by Moses, Esaius, Hieronymus, Egyptius, Hecateus, Elanicus, Acusilaus, Ephorus, and Alexander the historian, confirm. The universal flood which God revealed unto Moses, Berosus, Nicolaus Damascenus, and others have testified. The building of the tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Abydenus, Esaius, and Sybilla have approved. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Hecateus wrote a book of him. Damascenus, before cited, speaketh of Abraham's passage from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the books of Moses. Eupolemon writeth the very same of Abraham which Moses did. For, beginning with the building of Babel, and the overthrow thereof by divine power, he saith that Abraham, born in the tenth generation, in the city called Camerina, or Urien, excelled all men in wisdom; and by whom the astrology of the Chaldeans was invented. Is justitia pietateque sua (saith Eusebius out of the same author) sic Deo gratus fuit, ut Divino præcepto in Phœnicem venerit, ibique habitaverit; For his justice and piety he was so pleasing unto God, as by his commandment he came into Phœnicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus, in his 2d book and 5th chapter, speaketh reverently of Moses. There are many other among prophane authors, which confirm the books of Moses, as Eusebius hath gathered in the 9th of his Preparation to the Gospel, chapter the third and fourth, to which I refer the reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these words. ^b Moses enim affirmabat, docebatque, Ægyptios non recte sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: itemque Afros & Græcos, qui Diis hominum figuram assinxerunt: id vero solum esse Deum, quod nos & terram & mare continet, quod cælum & mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cujus profecto imaginem, nemo sanæ mentis, alicujus earum rerum, quæ penes nos sunt, similem audeat effingere. Proinde (omni simulachrorum effigione repudiata) dignum ei templum ac delubrum constituendum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum. Moses affirmed and taught, that the Egyptians thought amiss, which attributed unto God the images of beasts and cattle: also that the Africans and Greeks greatly erred in giving unto their gods the shapes of men; whereas that only is God indeed, which containeth both us the earth and sea, which we call heaven, the world, and the nature of all things, whose image doubtless, no wise man will dare to fashion out unto the likeness of those things which are amongst us; that therefore (all devising of idols cast aside) a worthy temple and place of prayer was to be erected unto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

Now concerning the Egyptian wisdom, for which the martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in works and words; the same is collected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Judeus, and Eusebius Cæsariensis, and divided into four parts, viz. mathematical, natural, divine and moral.

In the mathematical part, which is distinguished into geometry, astronomy, arithmetick, and musick, the ancient Egyptians excelled all others. For geometry, which is by interpretation, measuring of grounds, was useful unto them; because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper lands and territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yearly overflowed and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged unto him.

For the second part, to wit, astronomy, the site of the country being a level and spacious plain, free and clear from clouds, yielded them delight with ease, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the stars.

Arithmetick also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied; because without it, in geometry and astronomy, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of musick they made no other account, nor desired farther knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serve and magnify their gods, their kings, and good men.

The natural part of this wisdom, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of natural things, differs little from peripatetical philosophy; teaching that materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mix'd bodies and living creatures have their being; that heaven is round like a globe; that all stars have a certain sovent heat, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that rains proceed and be from mutations in the air; that the planets have their proper souls, &c.

The divine part of this wisdom, which is called theology, teacheth and believeth that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first original in Egypt, partly by means of the temperateness of that country, where neither winter with cold, nor summer with heat, are offensive; and partly through the fertility that Nilus giveth in those places: that the soul is immortal, and hath transmigration from body to body: that God is one, the father and prince of all gods; and that from this God, other gods are, as the sun and moon, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them temples, statues, and divers images, because the true similitudes of the gods is not known; that many of the gods have been in the estate of mortal men, and after death, for their virtues, and benefits bestowed on mankind, have been deified. That those beasts, whose images and forms the kings did carry in their arms when they obtained victory, were adored for God's ; because under those ensigns they prevailed over their enemies. Moreover, the Egyptian divines had a peculiar kind of writing; mystical and secret, wherein the highest points of their religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

* Clemens distributeth the whole sum of this latter Egyptian learning into three several sorts, viz. Epistolar, which is used in writing common epistles ; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their priests ; and Sacred, which sacred containeth scripture of two kinds ; the one proper, which is expressed by letters alphabetical in obscure and figurative words ; as for example, where it is written, The Ibis by the hornet participateth the beauty of the hawk ; which is red thus : The moon doth by the sun borrow part of the light of God ; because light is an image of divine beauty. The other symbolical, or by signatures, which is threefold, viz. imitative, tropical and enigmatical ; imitative, which designeth things by characters, like to the things signified ; as by a circle, the sun ; and by the horns of the moon, the moon itself : tropical or transferent, which applies the divers forms and figures of natural bodies or creatures, to signify the dignities, fortunes, conditions, virtues, vices, affections, and actions of their Gods and of men. So with the Egyptian divines, the image of an hawk signifieth God ; the figure of the hornet signifieth the sun ; the picture of the bird Ibis signifieth the moon ; by the form of a man, prudence and skilfulness ; by a lion, fortitude ; by a horse, liberty ; by a crocodile, impudency ; by a fish, hatred is to be understood. Enigmatical, is a composition or mixture of images or similitudes ; in which sense, the monstrous image of a lion's body having a man's head, was graven on their temples and altars, to signify, that to men all divine things are enigmatical and obscure. So the image of the sun set on the head of a crocodile (which liveth as well in the waters, as on land) expresseth, that the sun nourisheth meteors in the air, as well from the waters as from the earth. So a scepter, at the top whereof is made an eye, and an ear, signifieth God, hearing, seeing, and governing all things. The Scythians are thought to have been delighted with this kind of writing. For Pherecides Syrius reporteth, that when Darius sending letters, threatned Idanthura, king of the Scythians, with the ruin and destruction of his kingdom, unless he would acknowledge subjection : Idanthura returned to him a mouse, a frog, a bird, a dart, and a plough-share ; which Orontopagas, tribune of the soldiers, interpreted to signify, that by the mouse, their dwellings ; by the frog, their waters ; by the bird, their air ; by the dart, their weapons ; by the plough their lands ; were signified to be ready to be delivered to Darius, as their sovereign lord. But Xyphodres made another construction, viz. that the king meant, that except Darius with his men did hasten away, as a bird thro' the air, or creep into holes as a mouse, or run into the waters which they had passed as a frog, they should not escape his arms, but either be slain, or (being made captives) till his grounds. The same history is with little difference reported by Herodotus, l. 4.

The fourth and last part which is moral and politick, doth contain especially the laws, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trismegistus, or Termaximus devised ; who in his books or dialogues of Pimander and Asclepius, hath written so many things of God worthy of admiration ; as well (saith Sixtus Senensis) of the Trinity, and of the coming of Christ, as of the last and fearful day of judgment : that (as saith the same author, the opinion being also ancient) he is not only to be accounted a philosopher, but a prophet of things to come.

Jamblicus in his book of mysteries of the Egyptians, taking two very ancient historians for his authors, to wit, Seleucus and Menæus, affirmeth, that this Mercury was not only the inventor of the Egyptian philosophy, but of all other learning, called the wisdom of the Egyptians, before remembred : and that he wrote of that subject 36525 books, or pages. Of which there were numbered of fiery spirits, 100 books ; of aerial spirits as many ; and of spirits celestial a thousand : which because they were out of the Egyptian language converted by certain learned philosophers into the natural Greek, they seemed to have been first written in that tongue.

Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that among the books of Hermes, to wit, of the wisdom of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36 ; of physick six books ; of the orders of priests ten ; and of astrology four.

SECT. VIII.

A brief of the history of Joshua ; and of the space between him and Othniel ; and of the remainders of the Canaanites ; with a note of some contemporaries to Joshua ; and of the breach of faith.

AFTER the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth year of the egression, in the first month called Nisan, or March, Joshua the son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the spirit of wisdom, took on him the government of Israel ; God giving him comfort, and encouraging him to pass the river of Jordan, and to possess and divide among the Israelites the land promised.

The beginning of Joshua's rule, St. Augustine dates with the reign of Amyntas, the eighteenth king in Affyria ; with Corax the sixteenth king in Sicyonia ; when Danaus governed the Argives ; and Eriethonius, Athens.

Joshua, imitating in all things his predecessor, sent over Jordan certain discoverers to view the feat and strength of Jericho, the next city unto him on the other side of the river, which he was to pass over. Which discoverers being saved, and sent back by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, because she kept a tavern or victualling house, made Joshua know, that the inhabitants of Jericho, and those of the country about it, hearing of the approach of Israel, had lost their courage. Whereupon the day after the return of the spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth year after the egression, Joshua removed from Sbittim in the plains of Moab, and drew down his army to the banks of the river Jordan, and gave them commandment to put themselves in order to follow the ark of God, when the Levites took it up, and moved towards the river ; giving them withal this forcible encouragement, that they should thereby assure themselves of his favour and presence, who is Lord of all the world, when the river of Jordan should be cut off, and divided, and the waters coming from above should stand still on a heap ; whereby those below towards the Dead sea wanting supply, they might pass over into the land of Canaan with dry feet.

He also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, to prepare themselves (according to their covenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and (as we call it in this age) to lead in the van-guard, which thro' all the desarts of Arabia, from the mount Sinai to this place, those of the tribe of Judah had performed. For these tribes being already provided of their habitations, and the country and cities of the Amorites, by the help of the rest, conquered for them: it agreed with justice and equity, that Reuben, Gad, and the half of Manasseh should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession.

On the banks of Jordan they rested themselves from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first month Nisan, or March, they pass'd over to the other side, taking with them twelve stones from the dry ground in the midst of the river: which, for a memory of that miracle by God wrought, they set up at Gilgal, on the east side of the city of Jericho, where they encamped the first night. At which place ^a Joshua gave commandment, that all born in the last fortieth year in the deserts, ^b should be circumcised; which ceremony to that day had been omitted. Of the neglect whereof ^c St. Augustine giveth for cause, the people's contempt of their superiors, ^d Thomas excuseth it in this sort; that the Israelites knew not the certain time of their removing from one place to another; Damascen, that it was not needful by circumcision to distinguish them from other nations, at such time as they lived by themselves and apart from all nations.

On the fourteenth day of the same month, the children of Israel celebrated the passover now the third time; first, At their leaving Egypt; secondly, At mount Sinai; and now at Gilgal. After which being desirous to taste of the fruits of the country, and having, as it were, surfeited on manna, they parched of the corn of the land, being not yet fully ripe, and eat thereof.

And as Moses began to distribute those regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the land of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Sibon held, so did Joshua perform the rest; and after a view and partition made of the territories, he gave to each tribe his portion by lot. But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three several times; first, By ^e Moses to Gad, Reuben, and the half tribe of Manasseh, of the lands over Jordan; secondly, By Joshua, to the tribe of Judah, Ephraim, and the other half tribe of Manasseh, about the fifth year of his government; proved in Joshua xiv. 10. and a third division was made to the other seven tribes at Shilo, where ^f Joshua seated the Tabernacle of the congregation.

The victories of Joshua against the kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set down in his own books, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose story I chiefly note these particulars.

First, How in the beginning of the war, those little kings, or reguli of the Canaanites, had not so much understanding, as to unite themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custom of those estates, from whose governors God hath taken away all wisdom and foresight, they left those of their own nation, which were next the invaders, to themselves, and to their own defences; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat far off, might again have been quenched ere it could spread it self so far as their own territories and cities. But after such time as Jericho and Ai were entered, and the kings, people, and cities consumed, five of those thirty-one kings (all which at length perished in that war) joined themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendred themselves to Joshua.

Only five (the rest looking on to see the success) namely the king of the Jebusites, in Jebus, or Jerusalem, the kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachis and Eglon address'd themselves for resistance: whose army being by Joshua surprized and broken, themselves despairing to escape by flight, and hopeless of mercy by submission, creeping into a cave under ground, were thence by Joshua drawn forth and hanged. In the prosecution of which victory he also took ^g Makkedah, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the relief whereof Horam king of Gezar hastned, and perished. After which Joshua possessed himself of ^h Eglon, Heber, and Debir destroying these cities with their princes.

In the end, and when the south countries were possessed, the cities thereof conquered, and their kings and people made dust; the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the over-late counsels of necessity, united themselves to make one gross strength and body of an army; which Jabin king of Hazor practised and gathered together, being at that time of all the Canaanite kings the most powerful; which army being by Joshua discovered, as the same rested near the lake of Merom, he used such diligence, as he came on them unawares; and obtaining an absolute victory over them, he prosecuted the same to the utmost effect. And, besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entered their cities, of which he burnt Hazor only, reserving the rest for Israel to inhabit and enjoy.

Secondly, I note, that Joshua shewed himself a skilful man of war, for that in those ancient times he used the stratagem of an ambush in taking of Ai; and in that he broke the armies of the first five kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon by surprize: for he marched all night from his camp at ⁱ Gilgal, and set on them early the next day, when they suspected no enemy at hand; as he did also at Merom, when he overthrew Jabin, and his confederates. After which, making the best profit of his victory, he assaulted the great city of Hazor.

Thirdly, The miracles which God wrought during this war, were exceeding admirable; as the stay of the river of Jordan at the springs, so as the army of ^j Israel pass'd it with a dry foot; the fall of Jericho by the sound of rams horns; the showers of ^k hail-stones which fell upon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them perished, than by the sword of Israel. Again, the arrest of the sun in the firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lengthened, as the Israelites had time to execute all those which fled after the overthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a work only proper to the All-powerful God.

Fourthly, Out of the passage between Joshua and the Gibeonites, the doctrine of keeping faith is so plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all evasion, it admitteth no distinction, nor leaveth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiousness, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called equivocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a people of the ^l Hevites, expressly and by name, by the commandment of God, to be rooted out, and notwithstanding that they were liars, and deceivers, and counterfeits, and that they did over-reach, and, as it were, deride Joshua, and the princes of Israel, by feigning to be sent as ambassadors from a far country, in which travel their cloaths were worn, their bread mouldy, which they avowed to have been warm for newness when they first set out; their barrels and bottles of wine broken, their shoos patch'd, and their sacks, rent and ragged: yet ^m Joshua having sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel; he durst not, tho' urged by the multitude of the people, to lay violent hands on them; but he spared both their lives, and the cities of their inheritance.

Now if ever man had warrant to break faith, and to retract his promise made, Joshua had it. For first, The commandment which he received from God to root out this nation among the rest, preceded by far the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, He might justly have put these men to the sword, and have sack'd their cities; if there be any evasion from a promise made, whereof the living God is called to witness. For it was not to the Gibeonites that he gave peace, because he knew them to be a people hated of God. He told them, that if they were of the Hevites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a strange people that he gave faith, and to a nation which came from far, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had done in Egypt and over Jordan, sought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, The accord which Israel made with these crafty Canaanites was without warrant. For it is written in the same place, That the Israelites accepted their tale; that is, believed what they had said, and counselled not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, These men, who were known idolaters, and served those puppets of the heathen, men of an apish religion, as all worshippers of images are, could not challenge the witness of the true God, in whom they believed not. I say therefore, that if ever man might have served himself by any evasion or distinction, Joshua might justly have done it. For he needed not in this case the help of equivocation, or mental reservation. For what he swore, he swore in good faith; but he swore nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithless subtilty of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises he made in the name of God, were made to the living God, and not to the dying man, he held them firm and inviolable, notwithstanding that they to whom he had sworn it, were worshippers of the devil.

For it is not as faithless men take it, that he which sweareth to a man, to a society, to a state, or to a king, and sweareth by the name of the living Lord, and in his presence, that this promise (if it be broken) is broken to a man, to a society, to a state, or to a prince; but the promise in the name of God made, is broken to God. It is God that we therein neglect; we therein profess that we fear him not, and that we set him at naught and defy him. If he that without reservation of honour giveth a lie in the presence of the king, or of his superiour, doth in point of honour give the lie to the king himself, or to his superiour; how much more doth he break faith with God, that giveth faith in the presence of God, promiseth in his name, and makes him a witness of the covenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearful thing for a son to break the promise, will, or deed of the father; for a state, or kingdom, to break those contracts which have been made in former times, and confirmed by publick faith. For tho' it were 400 years after Joshua, that Saul, even out of devotion, slaughtered some of those people descended of the Gibeonites: yet God, who forgot not what the predecessors and fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworn in his name, afflicted the whole nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seven of Saul's sons were delivered to the Gibeonites grieved, and by them hanged up.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the help of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equivocation, to swear one thing by the name of the living God, and to reserve in silence a contrary intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of subjects to kings, of servants to their masters; of vassals to their lords, of wives to their husbands, and of children to their parents, and of all trials of right, will not only be made uncertain, but all the chains whereby free-men are tied in the world, be torn asunder. It is by oaths (when kings and armies cannot pass) that we enter into the cities of our enemies, and into their armies. It is by oath that wars take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it, or ought it to be, that makes an oath thus powerful, but this: That he that sweareth by the name of God, doth assure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the world is true, whom he calleth for a witness, and in whose presence, he that taketh the oath hath promised? I am not ignorant of their poor evasions, which play with the severity of God's commandments in this kind: but this indeed is the best answer: That he breaks no faith, that hath none to break. For whosoever hath faith and the fear of God, dares not do it.

The Christians in the Holy Land, when they were at the greatest, and had brought the caliph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not only lose it again, but were soon after beaten out of the Holy Land itself: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reverend bishop which wrote that story) that Almerick the fiftieth king after Godfrey brake faith with the caliph Elbadeck, and his vicegerent, the soldan Sanar; who being suddenly invaded by Almerick, drew in the Turk, Syracon, to their aid; whose nephew Seladine, after he had made Egypt his own, beat the Christians out of the Holy Land; neither would the wooden cross (the very cross, say they, that Christ died on) give them victory over Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge; seeing they had forsworn themselves in his name, that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the Holy Ghost, That he that speaketh lies, shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which uttereth them, slayeth the soul: how much more perilous is it (if any peril be greater than to destroy the soul) to swear a lie? It was Eugenius the pope that persuaded, or rather commanded the king of Hungary after his great victory over Amurath the Turk, and when the said king had compelled him to peace, the most advantageous that ever was made for the Christians, to break his faith, and to provoke the Turk to renew the war. and tho' the said king was far stronger in the field than ever; yet he lost the battle with 30000 Christians, and his own life. But I will stay my hand: for this first volume will not hold the repetition of God's judgments upon faith-breakers; be it against Infidels, Turks, or Christians of divers religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of oaths now-a-days is rather made a matter of custom than of conscience.

It is also very remarkable; that it pleased God to leave so many cities of the Canaanites unconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by foreseeing their idolatry, and as it is said in the scriptures, To be thorns in their eyes to prove them, and to teach them to make war. For these cities hereafter named, did not only remain in the Canaanites possession all the time of Joshua, but soon after his death, the ^achildren of Dan were beaten out of the plain countries, and enforc'd to inhabit the mountains, and places of hardest access. And those of Judah were not able to be masters of their own vallies; because, as it is written in Judges i. 19. The Canaanites had chariots of iron. And those principal cities which stood on the sea-side, adjoining unto ^b*Judah*, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistines; as Azzah, Gath, Asdod, out of one of which cities came Goliath, remembered in Samuel.

Neither did the children of Manasseh over Jordan expel the Geshurites, nor the Maachathites; which inhabited the north parts of Basan, afterward Traconitis.

Nor the Nephtalims possess themselves of Bethshemish, nor of Bethanab; but they enforce'd those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did ^d*Asher* expel the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Acon, Atblab, Achzib, Heblab, Aphike, and Rebob, nor enforce them to a tribute.

No more could Zabulon enjoy Kitron, and Nahalol, but received tribute from them. Also the Canaanites dwelt in ^e*Gezer* among the Ephraims; and among the children of Manasseh, on the west of Jordan, the Canaanites held Bethshean, Taanach, Dor, Ibleam, and Megiddo; yea, Jerusalem itself did the Jebusites defend above four hundred years, even till David's time.

Now Joshua lived one hundred and ten years, eighteen of which he governed Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expressed in the scriptures, which causeth divers to conjecture diversly of the continuance. Josephus gives him five and twenty years; Seder Ollam Rabbi, the author of the Hebrew chronology, eight and twenty; and Massius six and twenty; Maimonius, cited by Massius, fourteen; Joannes Lucidus, seventeen; Cajetan, ten; Eusebius giveth him seven and twenty, and so doth St. Augustine; Melancthon, two and thirty; Codoman five and twenty. But whereas there passed 480 years from the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, unto the building of the temple, it is necessary that we allow to Joshua only eighteen of them, as finding the rest supplied otherwise, which to me seems the most likely, and, as I think, a well approved opinion.

The same necessity of retaining precisely 480 years from the departure out of Egypt unto the building of the temple, convinceth of error such as have inserted years between Joshua and Othniel, of whom ⁸*Eusebius* finds eight years, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which he giveth his reason in his four and twentieth and last chapters upon Joshua: Bunting reckons it nine years, Bucholzer and Reusner but one, Codoman twenty, and Nicephorus no less than three and thirty; whereas following the sure direction of these 480 years, there can be no void years found between Joshua and Othniel, unless they be taken out of those eighteen ascribed unto Joshua by the account already specified. The praises and acts of Joshua are briefly written in the six and fortieth chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where, among many others things, it is said of him, Who was there before him like to him, for he fought the battles of the Lord?

That he wrote the book called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last chapter, verse 26. And Joshua wrote these words in the book of the law of God; which seemeth rather to have been meant by the covenant which Joshua made with Israel in Sichem, where they all promised to serve and obey the Lord, which promise Joshua caused to be written in the book of the law; and of this opinion were Cajetan and Abulensis: Theodoret doth likewise conceive that the book of Joshua was collected out of an ancient volume, intitled Liber Justorum; remembered by Joshua himself; and others, that it was the work of Samuel; for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion upon these words of the 26th verse, And Joshua wrote these words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to prove it; for when the people had answered Joshua, ^h*The Lord our God will we serve, and his voice will we obey*; it followeth that Joshua made a covenant with the people, and wrote the same in the book of the law of God.

There lived at once with Joshua, Eriethonius in Attica, who taught that nation to yoke beasts together, thereby to till the ground with more ease and speed: and about the same time the fifty daughters of Danaus (as it is said) slew the fifty sons of Egyptus, all but Lynceus, who succeeded Danaus, if the tale be true. There lived also with Joshua, Phœnix and Cadmus, and near the end of Joshua's life, Jupiter is said to have ravished Europa the daughter of Phœnix (afterwards married to Asterius king of Creta) and begat on her Minos, Radamanthus, and Sarpedon. But ⁱ*St. Augustine* reports this ravishment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the sons of Jupiter. But it may be doubted whether ^k*Minos* was father to Deucalion, and Deucalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the war of Troy, and Sarpedon was in person a young or strong man at the same Trojan war. And so doth Nestor reckon up in the counsel of the ^l*Greeks*, Theseus and Perithous for men of antiquity, and of ages past: Minos being yet more ancient than any of these. But hereof elsewhere.

CHAP. VII.

Of the tribes of Israel, that were planted in the borders of Phenicia, with sundry stories depending upon those places.

SECT. I.

The proem to the description of the whole land of Canaan, with an exposition of the name of Syria.

THE story of the Judges ought to follow that of Joshua, after whom the commonwealth of the Jews was governed by kings, of which so many of them as ruled the ten tribes, shall be remembered when we come to the description of Samaria: but because the land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the stages and theatres, whereon the greatest part of the story pass'd, with that which followeth hath been acted, I think it very pertinent (for the better understanding of both) to make a geographical description of those regions; that all things therein performed by the places known, may the better be understood and conceived. To which purpose (besides the addition of the neighbour countries) I have be-flowed on every tribe his proper portion; and do shew what cities and places of strength were by the Jews obtained; and what numbers it pleased God to leave unconquered; by whom he might correct and scourge them, when ungrateful for his many graces, they at sundry times forgot or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored those deaf and dead idols of the heathen. Divina bonitas (saith St. Augustine) ideo maxime irascitur in hoc seculo, ne irascatur in futuro; & misericorditer temporalem adhibet severitatem, ne eternam juste inferat ultionem; the divine goodness is especially therefore angry in this world, that it may not be angry in the world to come; and doth mercifully use temporal severity, that it may not justly bring upon us eternal vengeance.

To the cities herein described, I have added a short story of the beginnings and ends of divers kingdoms and common-wealths; and to help my self herein, I have perused divers of the best authors upon this subject; among whom, because I find so great disagreement in many particulars, I have rather in such cases adventured to follow mine own reason, than to borrow any one of their old patterns.

And because Canaan, with Palestina of the Philistines, and the lands of Og and Sihon kings of Basan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but small provinces of Syria; it shall be necessary, first to divide and bound the general, and so descend to this particular, now called the holy land.

^a Syria, now Soria, according to the largest description, as it was anciently taken, imbraced all those regions from the Euxine sea to the Red sea; and therefore were the Cappadocians, which look into Pontus, called ^b Leucosyrians, or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, and from the coast of Cilicia, which is the north border, unto Idumea towards the south, Tigris towards the sun-rising, and the Mediterranean sea westward: it then containeth, besides Babylonia, Chaldea, Arabia the Desart, and Arabia Petraea, that region also which the Greeks call Mesopotamia; the Hebrews Syria, of the two rivers, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for so Aram-Nabairajm is expounded; also Padan Aram; that is, Jugum Syriae, because the two rivers go along in it as it were in a yoke.

^c Edeffa, sometimes Rages, now Rage, was the metropolis of this region of Syria. In Syria, taken largely, there were many small provinces, as Cœlæsyria, which the Latins call Syria Cava, because it lay in that fruitful valley between the mountains of Lybanus and Anti-lybanus, in which the famous cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others were seated. Then Damascena, or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the city ^d Damascus, and the mountains of Lybanus, the regal seat of the Adades, the first kings of Syria. Adjoining to it was the province of Sophone, or ^e Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobal; over which Adadexer commanded in Solomon's time. Then Phenicia and the people Syrphœnices; and lastly, Syria Palestina bordering Egypt; of which ^f Ptolemy maketh Judea also a part; and to that province which Moses calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giveth the name of Syria Judea.

SECT. II.

Of the bounds of the land of Canaan, and of the promises touching this land.

BUT that land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phenicia, and stretcheth from behind Lybanus to the great desarts between Idumea and Egypt; bounded by the midland sea on the west, and the mountains of Hermon, Gilead, and Arnon towards the east; the same hills which Strabo calleth Traconi or Traconitæ, and Ptolemy Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from ^g Canaan the son of Cham, & lingua appellata fuit Canaan; The language was also called Canaan, saith Montanus; and after Hebræa of the Hebrews, who took name from Heber, the son of Sale, according to ^h St. Augustine. But Arius Montanus not so well allowing of this derivation, makes it a common name to all those of Noah's sons, which pass'd over Euphrates towards the west sea. For the word Heber, saith he, is as much as transiens, or transmittens, of going or passing over. And because the children of Abraham had for a long time no certain abiding; therefore, as he thinks, they were by the Egyptians called Hebræi, as it were passengers, which is also the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of ⁱ Eusebius long before them both. It had also the name of Judea from Juda; and then afterwards intitled the holy land, because therein our Saviour Christ was born, and buried. Now this part of Syria was again divided into four, namely, into Edom (otherwise Seir, or Edumea) Galilee, Samaria, and Judea. Galilee is double, the superior, called Gentium, and the inferior; and that Galilee and Judea are distinguished, it is plain in the Evangelists, tho' both of them belong to Phenicia.

Now besides these provinces of Phenicia, and Palestina (both which the river of Jordan boundeth; saving that Phenicia stretcheth a little more easterly towards Damascus) that part also to the east of Jordan, and within the mountains of Hermon, Gilead, and Arnon, otherwise Traconi, fell to the possession of half Manasseh, Gad, and Reuben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan also; as well because anciently possess'd by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enjoy'd by the Israelites; which eastmost parts are again divided into Basan, or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the territories of the Machati, Gessuri, Argobe, Ilus. They are known to the latter cosmographers by the name of Arabia in general; and by the names of Traconitis, Pieria, Batanea, &c. of which I will speak in their proper places.

But where Moses describeth the land of Canaan in the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the latter provinces, which fell to Manasseh, Gad, and Reuben; for these be his words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comest to Gerar until Azzah (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the country north and south; then it followeth in the text; And as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Seboim, even unto Lasba; by which words Moses setteth down the breadth, to wit, from the Dead sea to the Mediterranean. But in ¹ Deuteronomy, it seemeth to be far more large; for it is therein written: All the places whercon the soles of your feet shall tread shall be yours: your coast shall be from the wilderness, and from Lebanon, and from the river Perab, unto the uttermost sea. Now for the length of the country north and south, this description agreeth with the former; only Lebanon is put for Zidon; and the wilderness for Gerar and Azzah, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent east and west, if Perab be taken for Euphrates, then the land promised stretcheth it self both over Arabia Petraea and the desart, as far as the border of Babylon, which the Israelites never possess'd, nor at any time did so much as invade or attempt.

^a Ptol. Asia Tab. 4. ^b Ptol. 5. ^c Aurogallus. ^d 1 King. 11. ^e Herod. in Polym. Dion. l. 27. ^f Ptol. Asia Tab. 1. ^g Strab. l. 10. ^h Caleb. f. 62. ⁱ Euseb. Prep. Evang. l. 7. c. 3. ^k Matt. 2. Luke 2. John 4. ^l Deut. 11. 24.

And therefore Vadianus doth conceive, that by the river Perah, was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates; taking light from this place of Joshua; ^a Behold I have divided unto you by lot these nations, that remain to be an inheritance according to your tribes; from Jordan, with all the nations that I have destroyed, even unto the great sea westward.

And tho' it be true, that David greatly enlarged the territory of the holy land: yet, as ^b Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it but per gentes in amicitiam receptas. For David did not at any time enter so far to the east as Affyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these countries give advantage to those that would make any irreligious cavil, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites unperformed: for when both their kings, magistrates, and people fell from his worship and service, it pleased him, not only to inclose them within that territory, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein, and elsewhere, to subject them unto those idolatrous nations, whose false and foolish gods themselves also served and obey'd. And sure, the promise by which the Hebrews claimed the inheritance of ^c Canaan, and the lasting injoying thereof, to wit, as long as the heavens were above the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the verses preceding, and subsequent; which the Israelites never performed. And therefore they could not hope for other, than all mankind could or can expect; who knew, that all sorts of comforts, from the merciful goodness of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, than while we persevere in his love, service, and obedience. So in Deuteronomy xi. 8. the keeping of God's commandments, was a condition joined to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written; Therefore shall ye keep all commandments which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and go in, and possess the land, whither ye go to possess it. Also that you may prolong your days in the land which the Lord sware unto your fathers, &c.

The like condition was also annexed to the enjoying of the land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the heavens are above the earth. ^d For if ye keep diligently, saith he, all these commandments, which I command you to do, that is, to love the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these nations before you, and ye shall possess great nations, and mightier than you. And here, tho' it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of God's commandments, and their falling away from the worship of his All-powerful majesty, to the idolatry of the heathen, the conditional promises of God were absolutely void, as depending upon obedience unperformed. Yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Melanethon; for, saith he, ostendit promissionem precipuam non esse de hoc politico regno; He sheweth that his chief promise is not of a civil kingdom. To which agrees that answer, which St. Jerome made to a certain heretick, in his epistle ad Dardanum, who accused St. Jerome, that he overthrew the reputation of the Jews story, and brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an allegory, and ad illam duntaxat viventium terram que in cælis est (that is) Only to that land of the living which is in heaven. Quoniam tota Judæorum regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudinem habeat 160 milliarium, latitudinem vero 40, & in his etiam regiones, loca, urbes, & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam a Judæis occupata, sed tantum divina pollicitatione promissa; Because the whole country of the Jews is so narrow in compass, that it scarce hath 160 miles in length, and 40 miles in breadth; and in these are countries, places, cities, and many towns, which the Jews never possess'd, but were only granted by divine promise. In like manner the same father speaketh upon Isaiah, touching the blessings promised unto Jerusalem; where he hath these words, ^e De quo discimus Hierusalem nequaquam in Palæstina regione petendam: quæ totius provinciæ deterrima est, & saxosis montibus asperatur; & penuriam patitur sitis: ita ut cælestibus utatur pluviis, & raritatem fontium cisternarum extruptione soletur: sed in Dei manibus, ad quam dicitur festinaverunt structores tui; From whence, saith he, we learn, that Jerusalem is not to be sought in that region of Palestina, which is the worst of the whole province, and ragged, with craggy mountains, and suffereth the penury of thirst: so as it preserveth rain water, and supplieth the scarcity of wells, by building of cisterns: but this Jerusalem is in God's hands, to which it is said thy builders have hastned; so far St. Jerome. Where also, to prevent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himself; Neque hoc dico in suggillationem terræ Judææ, ut hæreticus sycophanta mentitur: aut quo auferam historiæ veritatem: quæ fundamentum est intelligentiæ spiritualis, sed ut decutiam supercilium Judæorum: qui synagogæ angustias latitudini ecclesiæ præferunt. Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum vivificantem, ostendant terram promissionis lacte & melle manantem; Neither (saith he) say I this to disgrace the land of Judea (as the heretical sycophant doth belie me) or to take away the truth of the history, which is the foundation of spiritual understanding, but to beat down the pride of the Jews; which enlarge the straits of the synagogue, farther than the breadth of the church: for if they follow only the killing letter, and not the quickning spirit, let them shew the land of promise flowing with milk and honey.

By this it may also be gathered, howsoever it be unlikely (seeing the west bound in the place, Deut. xi. 24. had his truth in the literal sense; that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the east bound, should be taken only for a spiritual sense) yet nevertheless that Jerome's opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be understood for Euphrates: and that the promise it self was never so large, much less the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this holy land, because Asher, Nephthalim, and Zabulon, held the northermost part, and were seated in Phœnicia, I will begin with these three, taking Asher for the first: of which tribe, yet before I speak, I must admonish the reader touching the names of places in this, and the other tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names, by reason of the divers fancies of translators, are diversly expressed; so that to the unskilful they may seem diverse, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diversity (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly, because the ancient editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew editions have; and partly, because the ancients expressed or omitted divers consonants, otherwise than the latter do think fit.

SECT. III.

The Tribe of ASHER.

† I.

The bounds of the tribe of Asher.

THE Asherites descended of Asher, the son of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500 and odd persons, all men above 20 years of age, and able to bear arms at the time, when they were mustered by Moses at mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the desarts, there remained of their issues, besides women and children, 53400 bodies fit for the wars: which pass'd the river of Arnon, into the plains of Moab; and, after the conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phenicia, from Zidon, and the fields of Libanus, unto Ptolomais Acon along the sea coast, containing 30 English miles, or thereabouts; and from the midland sea to the east border, some 12 miles; tho' ^a Antoninus makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitful, abounding in wine, oil, and wheat, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities; according to that prophesy, Asher pinguis panis; concerning Asher, his bread shall be fat; ^b And he shall give pleasures for a king.

† II.

Of Zidon.

THE first city seated on the north border of the territory of Asher, was Zidon, which Joshua calleth the great Zidon, both for strength and magnitude. The Greeks, and ^Q Curtius, make Agenor the founder thereof: and ^c Justin derives the name from the abundance of fish found on those shores; whereof it hath been called Zidona. But that it was far more ancient, ^d Moses, Joshua, and Josephus witness, the same being founded by Zidon, the eldest of Canaan's sons: and so strong it was in Joshua's time, as neither did himself attempt it, neither could the Asherites, or any of their successors, master it: but it continued all the time of the judges and kings, even unto the coming of Christ, a city interchangeably governed, by their own princes, or other magistrates: tho', according to the warnings and threats of the prophets ^e Isaiab, Jeremy, Ezekiel and Zachary; it was often afflicted, both by the enemies sword, and by the pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wash of the Phenician sea, which is a part of the Mediterranean, or midland sea. It hath to the north, the city of Berythus, and the river Leontis; and to the south, Sarepta, or Sarphat, which standeth between it and Tyre; the distance between which two great and famous cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14000 paces, saith ^f Seiglerus: but Vadianus makes it 200 furlongs, and so doth Weissinbury, in his description of the holy land, and both from Strabo: which 200 furlongs make 25 miles. This difference of distance, as well between these two known cities, as all the rest, make it over-difficult to devise any new scale to the map and description of the holy land.

What kings it had till Agenor's time, there is no memory: The story which Zeno the philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time consumed and lost. It seemeth to be more ancient than Tyre; which was also built by the Zidonians. For as ^g Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memory of Tyre; because it was but a member of Zidon, and a city subject to the kings thereof: tho' it be true, that in alter-times it contended with Zidon for primacy, and became far more renowned, opulent, and strong. From Zidon had Solomon and Zorobabel their principal workmen, both in timber and stone, for the building of the temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other mechanical arts and trades: the prophet ^h Zachary calling them the wise Zidonians. The city was, both by nature and art, exceeding strong, having a castle or citadel on the north side, standing upon an unaccessible rock, and compassed by the sea; which after the citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the knights of the Dutch order: and another castle it hath on the south side, by the port of Egypt, which the templers guarded. It also sent many other colonies besides that of Tyre, into places remote; as unto Thebes, and Sepbyra, cities of Beotia in Greece.

Strabo and ⁱ Pliny give the Zidonians the invention of ^k glass, which they used to make of those sands which are taken out of the river Belus, falling into the Mediterranean sea, near Ptolomais or Acon; and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those clear glasses which they make at Murana; of which St. Jerome and Pliny. Zidon insignis artifex vitri, Zidon vitrariis officinis nobilis; Zidon a famous glass-maker, or a skilful worker in glass-houses.

They were in religion idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and ^l Astaroth: which idols, tho' common to the other of the issue of Canaan (as Pineda gathers out of ¹ Sam. xxxi. 10. and Judges x. 6.) yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the gods of the Zidonians; as appears ¹ Kings xi. 5. in the story of Solomon's idolatry, where Astaroth is called the God of the Zidonians: and ¹ Kings xvi. 33. in the story of Achab, the chief worshipper of Baal, where it is said, that he marrying Jezebel, the daughter of the king of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Divers Baals, and divers Astaroths, in their idolatries, they acknowledged; as it appears by the plural names of Baalim and Astaroth, ¹ Sam. xii. 10. and elsewhere: for even the name Astaroth, as I am informed by a skilful Hebrician, is plural; the singular being Astoreth: whence Judg. ii. 13. the Septuagint read ελατρουσαν ταῖς ἀστροθαῖς; They worshipped the Astarties. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals, and Astoreths, may be diversly understood; either in respect of the diversity of the forms of the images, or of the worship in divers places, or of the stories depending upon them; which (as fables use to be) were doubtless in divers cities diverse. Augustine Quest. 19. in Judg. thinks Baal and Astarte to be Jupiter and Juno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Juno by some such name as Astarte, Tull. l. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making divers goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Astarte; whom he makes to be born of Tyrus and Syria, and to have been the wife of Adonis. As also Macrobius 2. Saturn. cap. 21. says, that Adonis was with great veneration commonly worshipped of the Affyrians. And Jerome, upon Ezekiel viii. 44. notes, that Thammuz (whom there the idolatrous women are noted to bewail) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seem, that in the worship of Astarte, or Venus, they did bewail her husband Adonis. As also the Grecians did in their songs of Adonis, ^a Mourn for Adonis the fair, dead is Adonis the fair. Howbeit, others in that place of Ezekiel, not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris, in the sacrifices of Isis: whose loss of her husband Osiris, was as famous in the Egyptian idolatry, as with the Grecians, Venus's loss of Adonis. And to this agreeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride; that Osiris with the Egyptians, is called Ammuz: which word may seem to be the same with Ezekiel's Thammuz. But howsoever these Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the milk of idolatry: yet they were more apt to receive the doctrine and gospel of Christ after this ascension, than the Jews: who had been taught by Moses, and the prophets, so many years, whereof our Saviour, in Matthew and Luke; ^b Wo be to thee Chorazin, &c. For if the great works which were done in thee, had been done in Tyrus and Zidon, they had repented long ago, &c. But I say unto you, it shall be easier for Tyrus and Zidon, at the day of judgment, than for you.

Strab. l. 16. ^g Strab. l. 16. ^h Zach. 9. 2. ⁱ Plin. l. 5. c. 9. ^k It seems that even in Joshua's time they practised Glass-making; whence Junius for Mithrephoth mairum, which ad verbum, is as much as combustiones aquarum, reads fornaces vitrarum, Josh. 11. 8. as it seems, because these furnaces were where there was store of water, either for the moving of the bellows by the force of the water, or for other necessary uses. But there are others that take them for salt pits, and others again for hot-baths. ^l The form of Astoreth (or Astarte) seemeth to have been a sheep; for, Deut. 7. 13. the word in the plural number signifieth sheep; and this may confirm Augustine's opinion, that Astarte was Juno: for the form of her husband Jupiter Hammon was a ram.

It received a Christian bishop with the first; who was afterwards of the diocese of Tyre. But in the year of our redemption 636, it fell into the hands of the Saracens; and continued in their possession till Baldwinus the first, then king of Jerusalem in the year 1111, by the help of the Danes and Norways, who came with a fleet to visit the holy land, and took port at ^c Joppa; it was again recovered, the commandment thereof being given to Eustace Gremer, a nobleman of that country. And again, in the year 1250, it was re-edified and strengthened by Lodowick the French king; while he spent four years in the war of the holy land. ^d Lastly, in the year 1289, it was reconquered by the Saracens; and is now in possession of the Turks, and hath the name of Zai.

† III.

Of Sarepta, with a brief history of Tyre in the same coast.

S*arepta*, or, after the Hebrew, Sarpath, is the next city southward from Zidon, between it and the river called Naar, or l'ons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a city very famous for the excellent wine growing near it: of which Sidonius;

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna, Quæque Sareptano palmitis missa bibas.

I have no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for thy drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This city had also a bishop of the diocese of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turks, as the rest, and now called Saphet, saith Possellus.

Not far from Sarepta, was situate that some time famous city of Tyre, whose fleets of ships commanded, and gave the law over all the Mediterranean sea, and the borders thereof; during which time of greatness and power, the Tyrans erected Utica, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa; of which Virgil; ^e Urbs antiqua fuit Tyrus tenuere coloni, Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called ^f Punica quasi Phœnicum, a colony of the Phœnicians. In Spain they founded Gades, now Caliz. In Italy, Nola. In Asia the less, Dromos Achillis, which city the ^g Scholiast of Apollonius placeth near the river Phyllis in Bithynia.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor; and so it is written in Joshua xix. taking name from the situation, because built on a high rock, sharp at one end. The Latins, as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra; for ^h Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Ostrum Sarranum, by which name Juvenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it upon a high hill, whereof many ruins remain to this day, the place being still known by the name of the ancient Tyre: and because it was a colony of the Zidonians, the prophet Isaiah xxiii. calleth it the daughter of Zidon: which Trogus also confirmeth, tho' Berosus, by affinity of name, makes Thiras the son of Japhet to be the parent thereof: and tho', no doubt, it was very ancient (for so much the prophet Isaiah xxiii. also witnesseth, Is not this your glorious city, whose antiquity is of ancient days?) yet, that Thiras the son of Japhet set himself in the bosom of the Canaanites, who built Zidon, and peopled all that region, I see nothing to persuade me.

But that new Tyre, in after-times so renowned, seemeth to be the work of Agenor: and of this opinion was ⁱ Curtius and Josephus. And Eusebius makes this city elder than Solomon's temple 240 years: Cedrenus 361, who also addeth that Tyrus, the wife of Agenor, gave it her name: but of Agenor, I will speak more at large in the story of their kings.

For strength, and for the commodiousness of the harbour, and the better to receive trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an island 700 paces from the continent; and therefore ^k Ezekiel placeth it in the midst of the sea, as some read; or as others, in the innermost part of the sea; whence he calleth it, situate at the entrance of the sea; as also the same prophet calleth it, the mart of the people for many isles: and Isaiah xxiii. 3. A mart of the nations. And so proud, wealthy, and magnificent was this city, as the prophet Isaiah xxvii. 8. calleth the merchants thereof princes, and their chapmen the nobles of the world.

It excelled, both in learning, and in manufacture; especially in the making and dying of purple and scarlet cloth: which, saith Julius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules's dog, who passing along the sea coast, and eating of the fish Couchilis or Purpura, the hair of his lips became of that colour. It worshipped the same idols that Zidon did; saving that Hercules became their patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrans presented him with a crown of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remain his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the defender of their city, and the ancestor of the Macedonian kings, and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules's temple was in the mountain of old Tyre, where he might perform that ceremony. But this availed not, for Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious; he desired to enter the town, which being denied, he, as one whom no peril could fear, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ships as he could, and brought from Li- banus so great a number of cedars, and so many weighty stones from the old city of Tyre adjoining, as notwithstanding that his materials were often washed away with the strength of the sea and the tides, yet he never rested, till he had made a foot passage from the continent to the island: and having once approached their walls, he over-topp'd them with turrets of wood, and other frames; from whence (having filled the body of force with the violent moving spirit of resolution) he became lord thereof, putting all to the sword that resisted; after which, he caused 2000 more to be hung up in a rank all along the sea-shore; which execution in cold blood he performed (as some authors affirm) upon the issues of those slaves which had formerly slain all their masters, taking their wives, children, riches, and power of government to themselves. This victory of Alexander over the Tyrians, ^a Josephus remembreth; and how Sanaballat revolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000 soldiers; who was the last satrapa, or provincial governour, which Darius seated in Samaria; the same who having married his daughter to Manasseh, brother to Jaddus the high priest of Jerusalem, obtained of Alexander that a temple might be built on the mountain Garizim, over Samaria; that the forces of the Jews being divided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which priesthood he bestowed on his son-in-law Manasseh, whom the Jews oppugned, for that he had married out of their tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom ^b Gulielmus Tyrius calleth Sanabula, died.

Long before this desolation of Tyre, by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempte^d by Salmanassar the Assyrian king; when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten tribes, with the rest of Syria, became envious of the beauty, riches, and power of that city. He besieged it both on the land side, and with three-score ships of war held the port; to the end that neither any victuals nor any supply of men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelve sail scattered that fleet, and took five hundred prisoners of the Assyrians; notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his resolution, and lay before it by his lieutenants five years, but with ill success. And this siege Menander Ephesius, cited by Josephus, made report of in his chronicles, as he found the story among the annals of the Tyrians (which the said Menander converted into Greek) adding that Elulæus, whom Tyrius calleth Heliseus, was then king of Tyre, having governed the same six and twenty years. Soon after this repulse of Salmanassar, and about 200 years before the victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonosor, at such time as he destroyed Jerusalem with the temple, came before this city; who indeed gave to Alexander the example of that despairful work of joining it to the continent. For Nabuchodonosor had formerly done it; tho' by the diligence of the citizens, and the strength of the sea, the same way and passage was again broken down and demolished.

Against Nabuchodonosor for many years the Tyrians defended themselves; for so long did these Babylonians continue before it: As every head was made bald, and every shoulder made bare, saith, Ezekiel xxix. 18. who with the prophet Isaiab ch. 23, &c. had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proud place. In the end, and after thirteen years siege or more, the Tyrians, despoiled of all their hopes, and remembring over-late the predictions and threatnings of God's prophets, having prepared a convenient number of ships, abandoned their city, transporting with themselves the ablest of all that remained; and with their wives, children, and portable riches, sailed thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other maritime cities of their tributaries, or confederates; so as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to satisfy so many labours and perils, or any person upon whom to avenge themselves for the loss of so many bodies in that war. It pleased God in recompence thereof (who strengthened this resolution, as in a work of his own) to make Nabuchodonosor victorious over the Egyptians; and gave him that kingdom and the spoil thereof, as it were in wages for his army. Whereupon St. Jerome noteth, that God leaveth not the good deeds of the heathen unrewarded; who tho' they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attain unto that eternal happiness reserved for his servants and saints; yet such is the boundless goodness of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporal blessings.

Now of this enterprize of Nabuchodonosor against Tyre, profane historians have not been silent. For both Diocles and Philostratus (as ^c Josephus citeth them) the one in his second book, the other in his Phœnician histories remember it.

After these two great vastations by the kings of Babylon and Macedon, this city of Tyre repaired and recovered itself again; and continued in great glory about 300 years, even to the coming of our Saviour Christ; and after him flourished in the Christian faith near 600 years; the archbishop whereof gave place to none but to the patriarch of Jerusalem only; who within his own diocese had fourteen great cities, with their bishops and suffragans; namely, ^d Caipha, otherwise Porphyria, Acon or Ptolemais, Sarepta, Zidon, Cæsarea Philippi, Berytus, Biblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthosia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus (or Tortosa) and Maraclea. But in the year 636, it was with the rest of that beautiful region of Phœnicia and Palestina, subjected to the cruel and faithless Saracen. Under the burden and yoke of whose tyranny it suffered with the other Palestine cities 488 years.

^e In the year 1112, it was attempted by Baldwin king of Jerusalem, but in vain; yet in the year 1124, by Guaremonde, patriarch of Jerusalem, vicegerent to Baldwin II. with the assistance of the Venitians, and their fleet of gallies, it was again recovered, and subjected to the kings of Jerusalem, and so it remained 165 years.

Finally, in the year 1189, Saladine having first taken Jerusalem, removed his whole army, and sat down before Tyre, drawing his fleet of ships and gallies from Alexandria into the port, this city as then only remaining in the Christian power.

The citizens finding themselves reduced into great famine, and many other miseries, they at once with certain ralters of timber, fired, burnt and brake the Saracens fleet, and falling out resolvedly upon his army, slew so great numbers of them, and followed their victory with such fury, as that the Saracens forsaking their trenches and tents, removed in great disorder and dishonour. Two years after which victory, the body of that famous Frederick Barbarossa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christians enemies over a river unfordable, perished by the weight of his armour therein) was brought and interred in the cathedral church of Tyre, near unto that glorious sepulchre of Origen, garnished and graven with guilt pillars of marble, 940 years before therein buried; but in the year 1289, the Saracens again attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subject to the Turks.

Of Ptolomais, or Acon.

THE third city along the coast of the sea, which the Asberites could not obtain, on the south bound of Asber was Acho, which was the ancient name thereof, after Jerome; tho' other good authors affirm, that it took name from Acon the brother of Ptolemy. ^a Pliny calleth it Ace; and otherwise the colony of Claudius. It had also the name of Coth, or Cod; and by Zeiglerus it is called Haetipos.

But, lastly, it was intitled Ptolomais, after the name of one of the Egyptian Ptolemies; which city also, as it is 1 Mac. 11. another of the ^b Ptolemies perfidiously wrested from his son-in-law Alexander, which called himself the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, the same Alexander having married Cleopatra, daughter of the said Ptolemy, not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Maccabeus treacherously surprized and slain, as it is 1 Maccab. xii. 48. by the perfidiousness of ^c Tryphon; whom soon after Antiochus pursued, as it is in the story ensuing; and by like reason, about the same time, was the aforesaid Alexander in the war against Demetrius, one of the sons of Antiochus the great, with whom Ptolemy joined, overthrown and treacherously murdered by Zabdiel the Arabian, to whom he fled for succour; and his head presented unto his father-in-law Ptolemy, who enjoyed not the glory of his victory and treason above three days, for ^d God struck him by death.

For the beauty and strength of this city, this Alexander made it his regal seat; two parts of the same being environed by the sea; and the port of safety and capacity, not inferior to any other in all that tract. This city is distant from Jerusalem some 34 miles: four miles to the north, from the mountain Carmel, and as much to the south from Castrum Lamberti: from Tyre, ^e Antoninus maketh it 32 Italian miles. In the midst of the city there was a tower of great strength, some time the temple of Belzebub, and therefore called the castle of flies; on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetual light, like unto that called ^f Pharus in Egypt; to give comfort in the night to those ships, which came near and sought that port. It had in it a bishop's seat, of the diocese of Tyre, after it became Christian; but in the year 636 (a fatal year to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Haomarus the Saracen. In the year 1104, it was regained by ^g Baldwin I. by the help of the galleys of Genoa; to whom a third of the revenue was given in recompence. Again, in the year of our Lord God 1187, Saladine, king of Egypt and Syria, became lord thereof. In the year of Christ 1191, by Richard king of England, and Philip king of France, it was repossessed and redelivered to the Christians. Lastly, In the year 1291, it was, by the fury of the Saracens, besieged with an army of 150000, entered, sack'd, and utterly demolished; tho' in some sort afterward re-edified, and it is now Turkish.

† V.

Of the castle of St. George.

FIVE miles from Ptolomais, toward the east, is the castle of ^h St. George seated, in which he was born; the valley adjoining bearing the same name. And tho' for the credit of ⁱ St. George's killing the dragon, I leave every man to his own belief: yet I cannot but think, that if the kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others, it was strange that the order, full of honour, which Edward III. founded, and which his successors royally have continued, should have borne his name, seeing the world had not that scarcity of saints in those days, as that the English were driven to make such an erection upon a fable, or person feigned. The place is described by Adrichomius, in his description of Asber, to have been in the fields of Libanus, between the river Adonis and Zidon. His own words are these: Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, non longe à Beryto, memorant inclitum Christi militem D. Georgium, regis filiam ab immanissimo Dracone asservasse: eamque mactatam bestia parenti restituisse. In cujus rei memoriam ecclesia postmodum fuit edificata; In this place, which by the inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not far from Berytus, men say that the famous knight of Christ, St. George, did rescue the king's daughter from a huge dragon; and having killed the beast, delivered the virgin to her parent. In memory of which deed, a Church was afterwards built there: Thus far Adrichomius. His authors he citeth Ludovicus Roman. Patric. Navigationum, l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach, Itin. 5. The valley under this castle some time called Asber, was afterward called the valley of St. George. If this authority suffice not, we may rather make the story allegorical, figuring the victory of Christ, than accept of George the Arian bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.

† VI.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

BETWEEN Ptolomais and Tyre along the sea-coast, was the strong city of Acziba, or Achazib, which ^k St. Jerome calleth Achziph, and ^l Josephus, Ecdippus; Pliny, Ecdippa, one of those which defended itself against the Asberites. Bel-forrest finds Acziba and Sandalium, or the castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

The twelve searchers of the land which Moses sent from Cades-barne, travelled as far to the north as Roob, or Rechob, in the tribe of Asber, which Rechob, as also Berothæ, which by Ezekiel xlvii. 16. is placed in these north borders, belong'd, in David's time, to the king Hadarezer, as it may be gathered out of 2 Sam. viii. 8. and x. 6. and it defended itself against the Asberites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achziph, Ptolomai, Alab, Helbak, and Aphek did.

This Aphek it was, whose wall falling down, slew 27000 of Benhadad's soldiers after that 100000 had been slaughtered by the Israelites, under the conduct of Abab. Here Junius finds that the Philistines incamped, a little before the battle at Gilboa, tho' in his note upon 1 Sam. ix. 1. he takes Aphek there mentioned (at which battle the ark was taken) to have been in ^m Juda. Of which Joshua xv. 53. and in 2 Kings xiii. 17. he reads Fortiter, for, in Aphek. Where others convert it, Percutiens Syros in Apheck.

The next place along the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandanium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it, when he besieged Tyre: and set it on a point of land which extendeth itself into the sea, between Azciba and Tyre: which castle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified, in the year of Christ 1157, when he undertook the recovery of Tyre.

Not much above a mile from this castle, there ariseth that most plentiful spring of water, which Solomon remembreth, called the Well of living waters: from whence, not only all the fields and plains about Tyre, are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawn; but the same spring, which hath not above a bow-shot of ground to travel till it recover the sea, driveth six great mills in that short passage, saith Brochard.

Within the land, and to the east of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hofa: and beyond it, under the mountains of Tyre, the city of Achsaph, or Axab, or alter St. Jerome, Acisap, a city of great strength, whose king, amongst the rest, was slain by Joshua, at the waters of Merom.

† VII.

Of Thoron, Giscala, and some other places.

FARTHER into the land, towards Jordan, was seated the castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancto Abdemare built on the easternmost hills of Tyre, in the year 1107, thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians; the place adjoining being very fruitful, and exceeding pleasant. From this castle, the lords of Thoron, famous in the story of the wars for the recovery of the Holy Land, derive their names, and take their nobility. It had in it a curious chappel, dedicated to the blessed virgin, in which Humphrey of Thoron, constable to Baldwine III. king of Jerusalem, lieth buried: There were five castles besides this within the territory of Asher; whereof four are seated almost of equal distance from each other; to wit, Castrum Lamperti, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castrum regium, and Belfort. The first near the sea, under the hills of Saron; the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort and Regium, stand more within the land, and belonged to the brotherhood and fellowship of the Teutonicis, or Dutch knights (by which they defended themselves, and gave succour to other Christians, at such time as the Saracens possessed the best part of the upper Galilee) the chief of which order was in Ptolomais Acon. The first fortress was, for beauty and strength, called Belfort, seated in the high ground upon the river Naar, near the city Rama: of which in this tribe, Joshua xix. 29. for which the Vulgar reads Horma, making the article a part of the word, and mistaking the vowels; from the siege of this castle of Belfort, the great Saladine, king of Syria and Egypt, was by the Christians army raised, and, with great loss and dishonour, repulsed.

To the east of Belfort, is the strong city of Alab (or Achlab) which St. Jerome calleth Gbalab; one of those that defended themselves against Asher, as Roob (or Rechob) not far thence did.

Towards the south from Roob, they place Gabal (which Herod, surnamed the Ascalonite, rebuilt) making it of the territory of Ghabol, Quod Syro- rum lingua displicere significat (saith Weissenburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre, was ill pleased with those twenty cities, seated hereabout, which Solomon presented unto him in recompence of those provisions sent him for the building of the temple. Others think this Ghabol, or Chabul, containing a circuit of those twenty cities given to Hiram, to have been without the compass of the Holy Land; tho' bordering Asher on the north side: as it is said, 1 Reg. ix. 11. that they were in regione limitis; that is, in limite regionis, in the border of the country: for it was not lawful, say they, to give to strangers any part of the possession allotted to the Israelites: howsoever, that after Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appears 2 Chron. viii. 14. And it seems they were conquered by David, from the Syri Rechobea, whose city Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

Almost of equal distance from the castle of Thoron, they place the cities of Giscala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed over Jordan: Giscala was made famous by John the son of Levi, who from a mean estate, gathering together 400 thieves, greatly troubled all the upper Galilee; at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Judea; by whose practice Josephus, who then commanded in the upper Galilee, was greatly endangered: whereof himself hath written at large, in his second book of those wars, chap. 36. This John betraying, in all he could, the city of Giscala (whereof he was a native) to the Roman state: and finding a resistance in the city, gave opportunity, during the contention, to the Tyrians and the Gadarims, to surprize it; who at the same time forced it, and burnt it to the ground: But being by Josephus's authority rebuilt, it was afterwards rendred to Titus by composition. They find also the cities of Cana major, and Cades (or Cedessa;) of the first was that Syro-Phœnician, whose daughter Christ delivered of the evil spirit. Near the other, they say, it was that Jonathas Maccabeus overthrew the army of Demetrius.

There are, besides these forenamed cities within the tribe of Asher, divers others; as on the south border, and near the sea, Messal, or Misbeal: within the land Besara, Bethdagon, and Bethemec, standing on the south border, between Asher and Zabulon: on the north-side, joining to Syro-Phœnicia, is the city of Hethalon, or Gbethlon, the utmost of the Holy Land that way; under which, towards the sea, is Gbali, and then Enoch, supposed to be built by Cain, and named of his son Enoch, but without probability, as I have formerly proved. There are others also besides these, as Ammon, or Chammon, of which Joshua xix. 28. where also we read of Nebiel, Rama, Alamelec, and Beton: the cities of Alcath, or Gbelcath, Habdon, and Rechob, and Misbeal, which we have already mentioned, were by the Asherites given to the Levites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mention is made Judges i. 30. to which, out of Joshua, we may add Ebron, Ambad, and others, on which no story dependeth, and therefore I will not pester the description with them.

Of the rivers and mountains of Asher.

THE rivers to the north of Asher, are Adonis, afterwards Canis, to which Zeigler joineth Lycus, Ptolemy, Leontis: both which fall into the sea near Berytus : which river of Leontis, Montanus draws near unto Zidon : finding his head notwithstanding, where ^a*Ptolemy* doth, between Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a river called Fons hortorum Libani, which Adrichome, out of Brochard, entitleth Eleutherus : for which he also citeth ^b*Pliny* ; and ¹*Maccabees* xi. but neither of those authorities prove Eleutherus to be in Asher : for this river falleth into the sea at the isle of Aradus, not far from Balanea, witness ^c*Ptolemy* : and therefore ^d*Pinetus* calleth it Valania, and Postellus, Valana : which river boundeth Phœnicia on the north-side : to which Strabo also agreeth : but this principal river of Asher Arius Montanus calleth Gabatus. Christianus Schrot, out of the mouth and papers of Peter Laicstan (which Laicstan in this our age both viewed and described the Holy Land) calleth the main river, Fons hortorum Libani : and one of the streams which runneth into it from the north-side, Naar ; and another from the south-west, Chabul, of the city adjoining of the same name ; for Eleutherus it cannot be. There is also another river described by Adrichome, named Septael, which I find in no other author, and for which he citeth Joshua xix. but the word ^e*Ghe*, which is added there to Septael, is not taken for a river, but for a valley : and for a valley, the Vulgar, the Geneva, and Arius Montanus turn it. There is also found in Asher the river of Belus, remembered by Josephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, saith ^f*Pliny* : out of the sands of this river are made the best glafs, which some time the Zidonians practised ; and now the Venetians at Murana. Arius Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chedumim ; which it cannot be ; for Belus is known to flow from out of the lake Cendevia ; as all cosmographers, both ancient and modern, and the later travellers into those parts witness. It is true, that the river of Chifon, taketh water from Chedumim ; but not in that fashion which Montanus hath described it : neither doth it find the sea at Ptolomais Acon, according to Montanus, but farther to the south, between Caiphas and Sicaminum, witness Zeigler, Adrichomius, and Schrot.

Besides these rivers, there are divers famous springs and fountains, as that of living waters adjoining to Tyre : and ^g*Maserephot*, or after St. Jerome, Maserephotmaim, whose well filled by the flood of the sea adjoining (they say) the inhabitants, by seething the water, make salt thereof, as at Nantwich.

The mountains which bound Asher on the north, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Cœlesyria ; two great ledges of hills, which from the sea of Phœnicia, extend themselves far into the land eastward, four hundred stadia, or furlongs, according to ^h*Strabo* : for that length he giveth to the valley of Cœlesyria ; which those mountains inclose ; but ⁱ*Pliny* gives them 1500 furlongs in length from the west (where they begin at Theiophon, or Dei facies, near Tripolis) to the mountains of Arabia beyond Damascus ; where Anti-libanus turneth towards the south. These ledges, where they begin to part Traconitis and Basan from the desert Arabia, are called Hermion : which Moses also nameth Sion ; the Phœnicians, Syrion ; and the Amorites, Sanir ; neither is this any one mountain apart, but a continuation of hills ; which running farther southerly, is in the scriptures called Galaad, or Gilead : the same being still a part of Libanus, as the prophet Jeremy proveth ; Galaad tu mihi caput Libani : noting that this Galaad is the highest of those hills of Libanus. ^k*Strabo* knows them by the name of Traconite ; and Ptolemy by Hippus. Arius Montanus calleth these mountains bordering, Asher, Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrary to all other cosmographers, but he giveth no reason for his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops ; because, according to Tacitus, the highest of them are covered with snow all the summer ; the Hebrew word Libanos (saith Weissenburgh) signifieth whiteness. Others call them by that name of the frankincense which those trees yield ; because λίβανος is also the Greek word for that gum.

^l*Niger* out of Aphrodiseus affirmeth, that on Libanus there falleth a kind of honey-dew, which is by the sun congealed into hard sugar, which the inhabitants call Sacchar, from whence came the Latin word Saccharum.

The rivers which Libanus bestoweth on the neighbour regions, are, Chrysorrhoas, Jordan, Eleutherus, Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, Fons hortorum Libani, and others.

The rest of the mountains of Asher, are those hills above Tyre, and the hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitful ; but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus : for from Nebo, or the mountain of Abarim, in Ruben, Moses beheld Libanus 60 miles distant.

SECT. IV.

The Tribe of NEPH TALIM.

† I.

Of the bounds of Nephtalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

THE next portion of the land of Canaan, bordering Asher, was the upper Galilee ; the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Nephtalim, the son of Jacob by Billa, the handmaid of Rachel : who, while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 53400 persons, able men to bear arms, numbred at mount Sinai : all which leaving their bodies in the deserts, there entered the holy land of their sons 45400, besides infants, women, and children, under 20 years of age. The land of Nephtalim took beginning on the north part from the fountains of Jordan, and the hills of Libanus adjoining, as far south as the sea of Galilee, bounded on the west by Asher, and on the east and south-east by Jordan.

On the north side of Libanus, and adjoining to this territory of Nephtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabit ; in which tract, and under Libanus, was the city of Heliopolis ; which the height of the mountains adjoining shadowed from the sun, the better part of the day. Postellus calls it Balbec ; Niger, Marbeck ; and Leonclavius, Beallebeca.

Of this name of ^m*Heliopolis*, there are two great cities in Egypt : the first called On, by the Hebrews, and the Chaldean paraphrast, otherwile Bethshemes,

^a Alie Tab. 4. ^b Plin. l. 9. ^c Alie Tab. 4. ^d Post Orthosiam & Eleutherum est Tripolis. ^e The word Nachal is ambiguous, either for a valley, or for a river : but this word Ghe, is always a valley, as in Gehinnon and Gellemanim. Joseph. l. 2. *Bell. or after the Latins, Solis oppidum, or Domus solis, The city of the sun: into which, saith Ulpian, Severus the Roman emperor sent a colony: the other Gesselius nameth Dealmarach: and of this name Stephanus also findeth a city in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also, in the same valley adjoining to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis, of whom the region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidica, over which Herod, Agrippa, and Berenice the queen commanded.

Abilon also gave name to the region adjoining; of which Lyfanius, the son of Herod the elder, became tetrarch or governour; whereof Ptolemy gave it the addition of Lyfanii, and called it Abila Lyfanii. Volaterran names it Aphila, of which he notes that one Diogenes, a famous sophister, was native, who by Volaterran is intituled Aphileus, not Abileus. After that this city of Abila, or Aphila, had received the Christian faith, Priscillianus became bishop thereof; slain afterwards by our British Maximus at Trever. For distinction of this city (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembered, that in the tribe of Manasseh, joining upon the bounds of the tribe of Nephtalim, there is another city of the same name, saving that it is written with an [E] for an [I], and called Abela, remembered in the xxth chapter of the 2d of Samuel. The same Josephus calls Abelmachea, and Jerome, Bethmachab. In the place of Samuel, for distinction sake, it is written, Abel Beth-Mabaca (for belike it was the town of Mabaca, the wife of Macir, the son of Manasseh, the father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Majim. This city Joab besieged; because Seba the son of Bichri, who rebelled against David, fled thereinto for succour; but a certain wife woman of the city persuading the people to cast Seba's head over the wall, Joab retired his army. The same city was afterwards taken by the king of Damascus, Benhadad; and after a while by Teglatphalasar.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signify bewailing, or a plain ground, and therefore no marvel, that many towns (with some addition for distinction sake) were thus called; for even of bewailing many places took name, as Bochim, Judg. ii. 4. and so doubtless Abel-Misraim, Gen. i. 11. and yet Junius, in his note upon Numb. xxxiii. 49. thinks that Abel-Sittim was so called, rather by reason of the plain ground there (to wit, in the land of Moab) and so perhaps Abel-Mehola in the tribe of Ephraim; the town of Elisba the prophet; also Abel-Vinearum of the Ammonites, whither Jeftba pursued them.

Of Hazar.

IN this tribe of Nephtalim, was that famous city of Jabin, in Joshua's time, called Asar (or, after the Chaldean paraphrast, Hafzor) by Josephus, Asora; by Junius, Chatzor; which Laislan names Ilesron, the regal city and metropolis of Canaan, seated in the west part of Nephtalim, towards Asber. In this city was that great rendezvous, and assembly of those 24 kings against Joshua; who being all overthrown, slain, and scattered, this their powerful city was by Joshua taken and burnt to dust. But in process of time, the same being rebuilt by the Canaanites, a second king Jabin, 137 years after the death of this first Jabin, invaded the Israelites: and being ordained of God to punish their idolatry, he prevailed against them, and held them in a miserable servitude 20 years; till Deborah the prophetess overthrew Sifera, Jabin's lieutenant, and his army, near the mountain Tabor. This city Solomon restored at such time as he also re-edified Gezar, burnt by Pharaoh of Egypt, with Megiddo, Bethoron, and other cities; but about 260 years after, it fell into the hands of Teglatphalasar, king of the Assyrians. It is now, saith Adrichomius, called Antiopia; it was one of the principal cities of Decapolis. There is another city of this name in the territory of Benjamin, seated on the confines of Ascalon, called the new Hazar; * saith Jerome.

Of Cæsaria Philippi.

THERE was also on the border, and within the territory of Nephtalim, that renowned city of Laisb, or Lajisch, as Junius writes it, or Lajchem; which city the children of Dan (being straightened in their territory under Juda) invaded and mastered, and gave it the name of their own parent Dan; and by that name it is written in Gen. xiv. at which place Abraham surprized Chedorlaomer and his confederates; and followed his victory as far as Sobab, formerly remembered in the division of Syria, otherwise called Sophena. And after the possession of the Danites, it had the joint name of Lajchem Dan. Weissenburgh writes it Lacis; the Geneva, Laisb; Josephus, Dana; Benjamin, Balina; Breitenbach, Belena; but the now inhabitants know it by the name of Balina to this day: witness Nubrigenfis, Tyrius, Volaterranus, Brochard the monk, and Poslellus; who also taketh this city to be the same which in Matthew xv. 39. in the Vulgar is called Magedan: for which the Greek text hath Magdala in that place; and in St. Mark viii. 10. speaking of the same story, Dalmanutha. At such time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it seemeth that it was either a free city, of the alliance and confederacy of the Zidonians, or else subject unto the kings thereof; for it is written, Judges xviii. 28. And there was none to help, because Lais was far from Zidon: and they had no business with other men; for it was above 30 English miles from the Mediterranean sea, and from Zidon.

In after-times, when these regions became subject to the state of Rome, it had the name of Pancas, from a fountain adjoining so called; and therefore Ptolemy calls it Cæsaria Panie. Ilegesippus calls it Parnium, saith Weissenburgh: but he had read it in a corrupt copy, for in Ilegesippus, set out by Badius, it is written Pancum, without an [R]; and at such time as Philip the son of the elder Herod, brother to Herod, tetrarch of Galilee, became governour of Traconitis, some time Basan, this city was by him amplified and fortified; and both to give memory to his own name, and to flatter Tibe-

* Also a third in Ephraim called Abel Mechola; and a 4th in Reuben, called Abel Sittim, also Abel Misraim, at the foot of Jordan, and (as it seems) in the same tribe of Reuben, of all which, in that which follows, to which also we may add, Abel Magnum, the name, as some think, of a city, otherwise called Bethshemer, near the border of the Philistines; or according to others, of the great flow in the border. 1 Sam. 6. 18. Joseph. Ant. 1. 7. c. 10. 2 Sam. 20. 1 Kings 15. 2 Kings 15. 6 And Abel Magnum. 1 Sam. 6. 18. Judg. 7. 24. 1 Reg. 19. 15. Judg. 11. 35. * Of two other cities of this name in Juda, see chap. 9. sect. 1. Also in Simeon, Chatzar Subma, of which 1 Chron. 4. 31. which also is called Chatzar Sufa, and Chatzar Caddie; and lastly, Chatzar Shuleb, another city of Simeon. Jos. 19. 3. d 1 Kings 9. e Hicron, loc. Hebr. 1. rius Cesar, he called it ^a Cæsaria Philippi; and so it became the metropolis, and head city of Traconitis; and one of the first cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa, in the succeeding age, greatly adorned; by him, in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as nothing remained with that emperor, but the memory of his impiety; so in St. Jerome's time the citizens remembered their former Paneas, and so recalled it, with the territory adjoining, by the ancient name. Of this city was that woman whom Christ healed of a bloody issue, by touching the hem of his garment with a constant faith: who afterwards, as she was a woman of great wealth and ability, being mindful of God's goodness, and no less grateful for the same, as ^b Eusebius and Nicephorus report, caused two statues to be cast in pure copper; the one representing Christ, as near as it could be moulded; the other made like herself, kneeling at his feet, and holding up her hands towards him. These she mounted upon two great bases or pedestals, of the same metal, which she placed by a fountain near her own house; both which (saith Eusebius) remained in their first perfection, even to his own time; which himself had seen, who lived in the reign of Constantine the great. But in the year after Christ 363, that monster Julian Apostata, caused that worthy monument to be cast down and defaced, setting up the like of his own in the same place; which image of his was with fire from heaven broken into fitters; the head, body, and other parts, sundered and scattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time living. The truth of this accident is also confirmed by Sozomenus Saliminus, in his 5th book and 20th chapter.

This city built by the Danites, was near the joining together of those two rivers which arise from the springs of Jor and Dan, the two ^c apparent fountains of Jordan; in a soil exceeding fruitful and pleasant; for as it is written, Judges xviii. it is a place which doth want nothing that is in the world. In the fields belonging to this city, it was that St. Peter acknowledged Christ to be the son of God: whereupon it was answered, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram, &c. After this city received the Christian faith, it was honoured with a bishop's seat: and it ran the same fortune with the rest, for it was afterwards taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians; under Fulch the 4th king of Jerusalem, and after the death of Godfrey of Bulloin, the king of Damascus wrested it from the Christians: and shortly after by them again it was recovered. Lastly, now it remaineth, with all that part of the world, subjected to the Turks.

† IV.

Of Capernaum, and the cities of Decapolis.

AMong the remarkable cities within this tribe, Capernaum is not the least; so often remembered by the evangelists. This city had the honour of Christ's presence three years; who for that time was as a citizen thereof, in which he first preached and taught the doctrine of our salvation; according to that notable prophecy of Isaiah ix. The people that walked in darkness, have seen a great light: they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined.

Capernaum was seated on Jordan, even where it entreth into the sea of Galilee, in an excellent and rich soil: of whose destruction Christ himself prophesied in these words: And thou Capernaum, which art lifted up unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell, &c. which shewed the pride and greatness of that city; for it was one of the principal cities of Decapolis, and the metropolis of Galilee. And tho' there were some marks of this city's magnificence in St. Jerome's time, as himself confesseth, it being then a reasonable burgh, or town; yet those that have since, and long since seen it, as Brochard, Bridenbech, and Saliniac, affirm, that it then consisted but of six poor fishermen's houses.

The region of ten principal cities, called Decapolitana, or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned; and in St. Matthew, Mark, and Luke, also remembered; but I find no agreement among the cosmographers, what proper limits it had; and so Pliny himself confesseth: for ^e Marius Niger speaking from others, bounds it on the north by the mountain Casius in Casiotis, and endeth it to the south at Egypt and Arabia; by which description it embraceth Phenicia, a part of Cœlesyria, all Palestina, and Judea.

^f Pliny also makes it large, and for the ten cities of which it taketh name, he numbeth four of them to be situated towards Arabia; to wit, first these three, Damascus, ^g Opotos, Raphana; then Philadelphia (which was first called Amana, saith Stephanus, or, as I guess, Amona rather, because it was the chief city of the Ammonites, known by the name of Rabbah, before Ptol. Philadelphus gave it this latter and new name.) Then Scythopolis, sometime Nysa, built (as is said) by Bacchus, in memory of his nurse, who died therein, anciently known by the name of Bethsan: for the sixth he setteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Cœlesyria, which was also called Antioch and Seleucia;) but it is Gadara in Basan, which Pliny in this place meaneth, seated on a high hill, near the river Hieromaix. This river Ortelius takes to be the river Jaboc, which boundeth Gad and Manasseh over Jordan: but he mistaketh it, for Hieromaix falleth into the sea of Galilee, between Hippos and Gerasa, whereas Jaboc entreth the same sea between Ephron and Phanuel. For the seventh, he nameth ^h Hippos or Hippion, a city so called of a colony of horsemen there garisoned by Herod, on the east side of the Galilean sea, described hereafter in the tribe of Manasseh over Jordan. For the eighth, Pella, which is also called Butis, and Berenice, seated in the south border of the region over Jordan, called Perea. For the ninth, Gelasa, which Josephus takes to be Gerasa: and Gerasa is found in Cœlesyria by Josephus, Hegesippus and Stephanus; but by Ptolemy (whom I rather follow) in Phenicia. The tenth, and last, Pliny nameth Canatha; and so doth Suetonius, and Stephanus, which Volaterran calls Gamala; but Hegesippus rightly Camala, a city in the region of Basan over Jordan, so called, because those two hills on which it is seated, have the shape of a camel. But the collection of these ten cities, whereof this region took name, is better gathered out of Brochard, Broidenbach, and Saliniac, which make them to be these; Cæsaria Philippi, and Afor, before remembered, Cedes Nephthalim, Sephet, Corazin, Capernaum, Bethsaida, Jotapata, Tiberias, and Scythopolis, or Bethsan. For all other authors disagree herein, and give no reason for their opinion. One place of the evangelist St. Matthew makes it manifest, that this region, called Decapolitana, was all that tract between Zidon, and the sea of Galilee. For thus it is written in Matthew iv. And he departed again from the coasts of Tyrus and Zidon, and came unto the sea of Galilee, through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis: so that it was bounded by Damascus and Libanus on the north, by the Phenician sea, between Zidon and Ptolemais on the west; by the hills of Gelbo and Bethsan on the south; and by the mountains Tracones, otherwise Hermon, Sanir, and Galad, on the east; which is, from east to west, the whole breadth of the holy land; and from the north to the south, near the same distance, which may be each way 40 English miles.

† V.

Of Hamath.

BUT to look back again towards Libanus, there is seated, near the foot thereof, the city of ^a Hammath, or Chammath, of which (as they say) the country adjoining taketh name: the same which Josephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathensis: ^b Jacobus Zeigler, Ituræa. Ituræa regio tenet borealia tribus Nephtali, per montem Libanum usque Trachones. The country of Ituræa, saith he, containeth the north parts of the tribe of Nephtali, along the mount Libanus to Trachones. But herein following Strabo, who calls Trachonitis, Ituræa, he mistakes the seat of this region; and so doth Mercator. For indeed, were Ituræa (which Hegeſippus calls Peræa, and G. Tyrius, Baccan) the same with Traconitis, yet Traconitis it self is far more to the east than Hammath in Nephtalim; for Traconitis lieth between Cæsaria Philippi, and the mountains Trachones, which the Hebrews call Gilead: and this Hammath, or Chammath, is seated under Cæsaria, towards the sea westward. And it seemeth that this mistaking grew, by confounding Emath, or Hamath the great in Cæſyria, beyond the mountains Trachones, which ^c Jerome upon Amos calls Antiochia, with Hammath, or Hanath the lesser in Phenician; and Nephtalim, which he calleth Epiphania: for this Hammath, or in our translation Hamath (and not that which is commonly called Emath, which ² Chron. viii. 3. is set far from the north border of Canaan in Syria Soba) is remembred in Numb. xxxiv. 8. and Numb. xiii. 22. and in Ezek. xlvii. 16. In the first of which places, it bordereth the land of promise: these being the words; From mount Hor you shall point (that is, direct or draw a line) until it come to Hamath. In the second place, thus: So they went up and searched out the land from the wilderness in Sin, unto Rehob to go to Hamath. Then in Ezekiel; The west part also shall be the great sea from the border, till a man come over-against Hamath; that is, the coast of the sea shall be the west border from the southermost part of the holy land, till you come directly over-against Hamath northward: from whence, if a line be drawn to the sea, it will touch the walls of Zidon; which is ^d the north-west corner of the holy land.

Now that this Hamath or Hammath, which Moses also made the confine of the holy land, is that of Nephtalim, both the reference which it hath to the west sea, and the city of ^e Rehob adjoining prove it: the other Hamath or Emath (being far removed, and beyond the forenamed mountains, which inclose all those lands which Israel ever had possession of) is that Emath, which is also called Ituræa, witness ^f Stella and Laicſtan; and not that in Nephtalim, where ^g Jonathas Macchabæus attended the army of Demetrius, who fled from him, and removed by night.

For tho' Traconitis be comprehended within Ituræa (and therefore it is said to be ſinitima Galilææ Gentium) yet it hath beginning over the mountains Traconis, and so it stretcheth into the plains of the territory of Ituræa; whence Philip the brother of Hierod was tetrarch or president, both of Ituræa and Traconitis; both which are over Jordan towards the east. But Chamath in Nephtalim, is on the west side of Jordan towards the Mediterranean sea.

The country Ituræa was so called of Jethur, one of the sons of Iſhmael; it is placed in the bounds of Cæſyria and Arabia ^h the deſart.

The people of Ituræa were valiant and warlike men, and excellent archers. Of whom Virgil;

Ituræos taxi torquentur in arcus,
Of yew the Itureans bows were made.

The city Chamath, or Hamath, in Nephtalim, seems to have been as ancient as the other in Ituræa, both built by Amatheus, the 11th son of Canaan. Whether in the time of David, this, or the other had Tobu for king, it is not certain; for Hamath, or Emath, beyond the mountains, and Hammath in Nephtalim were both neighbours to Damascus; at whose subjugation Tobu rejoiced, because Hudadeſer, whom the Damaſceni came to help, was his enemy. This Tobu fearing the strength and prosperity of David, hearing of his approach towards his territory, bought his peace with many rich presents, and with many ancient vessels of gold, silver, and brass.

But it seemeth that David in such great success, would not have had peace with Tobu, if he had been king of any place in Nephtalim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tſoba; which city Solomon, after his father's death, made himself master of, as a part of the lands (ⁱ in the larger and Beroaldus rejecting Jerome, rather follows the opinion of Zeigler abovementioned, as indeed it cannot easily be justified, that either one or other of these is either Antiochia, or Epiphania: however, that the same city which, Josh. 19. 35. is called Chammath, and placed in Nephtalim, was also called Chamath (where the word Hamath and Emath were framed) it may be gathered, partly because the other Hamath, 2 Chron. 8. 3. for distinction is called Chamath-Tſoba, as this (as it may seem by Josh. 21. 32.) was Chamath Dor, and Chamath-Judah, as we have noted 2 Kings 24. Secondly, because Numb. 34. 8. and also Ezek. 47. 10. Chameth in the north side of the holy land, is placed too near the west corner to be that Chamath-Tſoba: for in the line which should make the north border, which begins at the great sea, they make Moses to name never a place eastward along all the breadth of the holy land, until we come to Hermon (for so they expound mount Hor, Numb. 34. 7.) and beyond Hermon eastward in this north side, they make him to name divers towns, first Chamath, then Tſedad, then Ziphon; and lastly, Chatſar-henan: a thing most unlikely, seeing Israel had little or nothing eastward beyond Hermon. Therefore we must needs expound Hor to be one of the hills near Sidon; and so those towns, as they are named to lie in order on the north side of Aſher, Nephtalim, and Manasseh: and in like manner those in Ezekiel's first, Chetlon, then Chamath; and so in order, Berotha, Sibraim, Tſedad, Chauran, Chatſar-Henan. ^d Of which, Josh. 19. 35. ^e Which Rehob, or Rechob, in Josh. 19. 28. is placed in Aſher towards Zidon, in the confines of Nephtalim. ^f Filemannus Stella, and Peter Laicſtan, in their tables of the holy land. ^g Joseph. Ant. 13. 8. ^h That it doth properly belong to Arabia, the name of Jethur Iſhmael's son, whose issue settled in the Arabians, may in part give witness. Also the place of 1 Chron. 5. 19. confirms it, where Jethur is named among the Hagarens, against whom the Reubenites and Gadites made war, and whose country they possess'd in the time of Jeroboam, as their forefathers had done in the time of Saul, after his conquest of the Amalekites, 1 Chron. 5. 10. where the country is placed at the east of Gilead. ⁱ Of the larger promise express'd Deut. 1. 7. where Euphrates is named for one of the bounds, see chap. 7. ſect. 2. conditional promise) allotted by God to the children of Israel.

But this Hamath of Nephtalim, in the end, and after divers mutations and changes, both of name and fortune, being, as it hath been said, possessed by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was called Epiphania.

While St. Jerome lived, it remained a city well peopled, known to the Syrians by the name Amathe, and to the Greeks by Epiphania.

† VI.

Of Reblatha and Rama, and divers other towns.

IN the border of Hamath, or Emath, towards Jordan, standeth the city Reblatha, or Ribla, watered from the fountain Daphnis, which falleth into the lake of Merom. Hereunto was Zedekiah brought prisoner, after his surprize in the fields of Jericho, and delivered to Nabuchodonosor: who, to be avenged of Zedekiah's infidelity, beyond the proportion of piety, first caused the princes his children to be slain in his presence: and to the end that this miserable spectacle might be the last that ever he should behold in this world, and so the most remembred, he commanded both his eyes presently to be thrust out: and binding him in iron chains, he was led a slave to Babylon, in which estate he ended his life. Of which seldom-exampled calamity, tho' not in express words, ^a Jeremiah the prophet foretold him in Jerusalem not long before: But Ezekiel thus directly, speaking in the person of God, ^b I will bring him to Babylon, to the land of the Chaldeans, yet shall he not see it, tho' he shall die therein.

There are besides these before-remembred, many other strong cities in Nephtalim; as that which is called ^c Cedes: there are two others of the same name, one in ^d Issachar, another in Juda, of which Josh. xv. 23. and therefore to distinguish it, it is known by the addition of ^e Nephtalim, as Judg. iv. It is seated on a high hill, whence Josh. xx. 7. Kedesh in Galilee in monte Nephtali: Josephus calls it Cedesis: and in St. Jerome's time it was called Cidissus. Belforest greatly mistakes this Cedes, and confounds it with Cades in the desert of Pharan.

After the king thereof, among other of the Canaanites, perished by the hand of Joshua, it was made a city of refuge, and given to the Levites. Herein was Barak born, who overthrew the army of the second Jabin of Hazor, at the mount Tabor. It was some time possess'd by Teglatphalassar, when he wasted all Nephtalim: afterwards by the Romans, and numbred for one of the ten cities of the Decapolitan region: when it had embraced the Christian Faith, it was honoured with a bishop's seat; but in time it fell with the rest into the power of the Saracens and Turks, and by them it was demolished.

From Cedes, some four Italian miles towards the south-west, standeth Sephet, otherwise Zephet, which was also one of the ten Decapolitan cities; a place exceeding strong, and for many years the inexpugnable fortress of the Christians, and afterwards of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour cities of those regions, both inland and maritime near it. Touching Rama of Nephtalim, seated northward near Sephet: this is to be noted, that there are divers places of this name in Palestine, all seated on hills; and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebraeis excelsam, Rama with the Hebrews is high.) Also that from this Rama, Josh. xix. 36. they read Arama, making the article (which it hath in the Hebrew, as being a name of divers towns) to be a part of the word: whence casting away the aspiration, they read Arama. From Sephet towards the west, they place ^g Bethsemes, of which Josh. xix. 38. which defended it self against Nephtalim, Judges i. 33. but paid them tribute. On the other side of Sephet, towards the east, was Bethanath, who also kept their city from the Nephtalims.

Adjoining to which standeth Cartban ^h or Kiria-thajim, a city of the Levites, not far from the mountain, out of which the springs of Capernaum arise, called Mons Christi; a place by our Saviour often frequented: as also then when calling his disciples together, he made choice of twelve, which he called and ordained to be his apostles or messengers; of which place, or the acts therein done, there is oftent mention in the ⁱ evangelists.

Adjoining to these are Magdalen, a place of strength; and ^k Masaloth, of which we read, that it was forced by Bacchides, in the time of the ^l Maccabees: also (according to Adrichomius) one of the two Berothas of Nephtalim. For Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this tribe; ^m one near Chamath in the north border, of which Ezek. xlvii. 6. Another (upon a weak conjecture out of Joseph. Ant. l. 5. c. 2.) he therefore placeth, in this tract, near the waters of Merom; because the kings that joined with Jabin against Joshua, which incamped at the waters of Merom, Josh. xi. 5. are by Josephus said to have incamped at the city Berotha in Galilee, not far from Cedes ⁿ Superior, which is also in Galilee: all which may be true of that Berotha of which Ezek. seeing it is in that Galilee which is called the Upper Galilee, or Galilee of the Gentiles. The same Adrichomius placeth the region of Berim near Abela (of which Abela, or Abel-beth-mahacab, we have spoken already;) this he doth upon a conjecture touching the place, ^o 2 Sam. xx. 14. where some read Abel & Bethmahacab, & omnia loca Berim; but the better reading is, & omnes Berim, that is, with all the Berai; for Sheba being of Benjamin (in which tribe also there is a city called Berotha, or Becroth) drew the men of that city after him.

To the north of Berotha of Nephtalim, standeth Sebarim under Libanus, remembred by Ezekiel xlvii. and Aroseth gentium, near the waters of Merom, or Samochomitis, the city of Sisara, lieutenant of the army of the second Jabin: from whence, not far off, towards the sea of Galilee, is Ethrai, or Edebi, a strong city; besides many others, whereof I find no particular story of importance; as Ser in Josh. xix. 35. called Triddim-Tzer, and named for the first of their fenced cities: whence they make two cities, Affedim and Ser: then Adama, which they call Edama; also Ilion, which they call Abion; of which in the books of Kings. Then the strong city of Cinnereth, afterwards called Genezareth, whence we read of the land and lake of Genezareth; the same lake which is also called the sea of ^p Tiberias.

In the body of the land they place Galgala to the south border ; of which ^a Maccab. xix. 2. also divers named, Josh. xix. as Ucuca, or Chukkok : Horrem and Azanolh-tabor (which they place towards the east parts) and out of the same place of Joshua : Jirzon, Lakkum, Jepnael, Heleb, and ^b Reccath ; which two last they place near Cesaria Philippi : To these they add out of Joshua, Nekeb, and Adami ; for which two Junius readeth Fossa Adamæi, making it no town, but a ditch cast by some of Adamath, as it seems ; or at least the custody of which march or limit belonging to the town. To these out of Numb. xxxiv. 10. they add Sephano, which ¹ Sam. xxx. 21. seems to be called Sipmoth. As for Tychon and Helon, whereof the former they fetch out of Ezek. xlvii. 16. and the latter out of Joshua xix. 33. it may appear by Junius's translation, that neither are to be taken for cities : for the former he readeth Mediani, and for the latter Quercetum. The city of ^c Nephtalim, which they make the native place of Toby, and Naasson near unto it, they fetch out of the Vulgar translation, Tob. vii. 7. but in the Greek text there is no sign, neither of the one nor of the other.

SECT. V.

The Tribe of ZABULON.

OF Zabulon, or Zebulon, another of the sons of Jacob by Leah, there were mustered at mount Sinai 57400 able men, besides women, children, and aged unable persons ; all which dying in the deserts, there entred the Holy Land of their issues 65000 fit to bear arms ; who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Asher to the river of Chison ; southward, and from the sea of Galilee to the Mediterranean, east and west.

The cities within this tribe, which border Asher, are Sicaminum on the sea-shore, of which Joseph. Ant. 13. c. 19. Debbaset of which Joshua 19. 11. Jeconam, or ^a Joknebam (whose king was ^c slain by Joshua, and the city was given to the Levites) and Gaba, alterward called the City of horsemen, of a regiment there garisoned by Herod. Then the city which beareth the name of Zabulon, or the City of men, exceeding ancient or magnificent, ¹ burnt to the ground by Cestius, lieutenant of the Roman army. Adrichomius makes it the birth city of ² Elon judge of Israel, because he is called Zabulonita ; not marking that in the same place he is said to be buried at Ajalon.

To the east of this city of Zabulon is Cateth, of which Joshua xix. 15. on the border of Asher ; and beyond it the lesser ^b Cana of Galilee, where Christ converted water into wine ; the native city of Nathaniel, and, as it is thought, of Simon Zelotes. Beyond it begin the mountains of Zabulon : and then the city of Cetbron (in Zeigler, Gbiltron) which defended itself against Zabulon. Then Bersabe, which standeth in the partition of the upper and nether Galilee, fortified by Josephus against the Romans. Not far from hence standeth Shimron of Meron, whose king was slain by Joshua.

Then Damna or Dimna, a city of the Levites ; then Noa, or rather Neba, of which Joshua xix. 13.

Then Dotban, or Dotbain, where Joseph found his brethren feeding their flocks ; the same wherein Eliseus, besieged by the Syrians, struck them all blind.

Beyond it, towards the east, they imagine ⁱ Amthar, or Amatbar ; then Remmon of the Levites. The last of the cities on the north border of Zabulon, is Bethsaida, one of the ten cities of Decapolis, seated on the Galilean sea, and watered by the springs of Capernaum, the native city of the apostles, Peter, Andrew and Philip. Herein Christ did many miracles ; but these people being no less incredulous than the Capernaims, and others, received the same curse of threatened miseries ; as, Wo be unto thee Bethsaida, &c.

Along the west border of Galilee, towards the south from Bethsaida, was the strong castle of Magdalum, the habitation of Mary Magdalen, not long since standing.

And beyond it the strong and high seated city of Jotapata, fortified by Josephus in the Roman war : but in the end, after a long siege, surprized by Vespasian ; who slaughtered many thousands of the citizens ; and held 1200 prisoners, whereof Josephus the historian was one.

The last and greatest of the cities on that ^k sea, and the lake of Genesareth within Zabulon, was that of Tiberias ; from whence afterward the Galilean sea also changed name, and was called, The sea of the city Tiberias, so named in honour of Tiberius Cesar ; it was one of the ten cities, and the metropolis of the region Decapolitan, and the greatest and last of the lower Galilee. From hence our Saviour called Matthew, from the toll or custom-house, to be an apostle, and near unto it raised the daughter of Jairus from death ; it was built (as Josephus reports) by Herod the tetrarch, the brother of Philip, in the beginning of the reign of Tiberius Cesar, in the most fruitful part of Galilee, but in a ground full of sepulchres ; Quum juxta nostras leges (saith he) ad septem dies impurus habeatur, qui in talibus locis habitet ; Whereas by our law he should be seven days held as unclean who inhabited in such a place : by which words, and by the whole place of Josephus it appears, that this Tiberias is not (as some have thought) the same as the old Cinnereth, which was seated, not in Zabulon, but in Nephtalim.

Near unto this Tiberias at Amaus, there were hot baths, where Vespasian the emperor encamped against Tiberias : more into the land, toward the south-west, is Bethulia, seated on a very high hill, and of great strength, famous by the story of Holofernes and Judith, such as it is. Near which standeth Bethlehem of Zabulon ; and adjoining unto it, Capbarath fortified by ¹ Josephus against the Romans ; and Japha an exceeding strong place, afterward forced by Titus : who in the entrance, and afterward in fury, slew ^m 15000 of the citizens, and carried away above 2000 prisoners.

On the south-side are the cities of ⁿ Cartha of the Levites, and Gabara, of which Josephus in his own life ; then Jasic according to Adrichomius (of which Josh. 19. 12.) for he thinks that it is not that Japha of which we spake but now out of Josephus. Jile-

^a This place of the Maccab. avails no Galgala or Gilgal in Nephtali ; but may well be understood of Gilgal in Benjamin, or in Manasseh. ^b This Reccath, or Racath, Junius thinks that it is the same with Karthan (one of these being made of the other by transposition of letters) of which Karthan we have noted already, that it is also called Kinja thaim. ^c In the place ¹ Reg. 1. 1, which also they bring to prove that there was a city called Nephtalim, as it is evident by the following verses, the tribe of Nephtalim is meant, and not any city of that name. ^d Josh. 12. 22. ^e Jos. 2. bel. 19. ^f Jos. 2. bel. 22. ^g Judg. 12. 12. ^h The greater Junius reads Matth. 10. 4. Simon Kannites, which word Luc. 6. is, he thinketh, to be expounded by Zelotes. ⁱ The Hebrew Hammur thean (for which the Vulgar hath Amthar, Jos. 19. 13.) Vatablus expounds quæ gyrit ; Junius joins it with the word going before it, and reads Rimmonemo Methonrum, Matth. 8. 11. Mark. 1. 6. Luke. 4. 10. ^k The names of the chief cities seated about the sea, or lake, thro' which Jordan runneth, where Capernaum, Tiberias, Gadara, Tarchea, and they add Cinnereth, which in vin. sua. ^m Joseph. 2. bell. 25. ⁿ Josh. 21. 34. otherwise Kisloth Thabor, as Junius thinks upon Josh. 19. 12. where ¹ Chon. 6. 77. it is called Thabor.

la, of which Josh. xix. 15. Jerome calls it Jadela; under it westward Legio (afterwards a bishop's seat) and the city Belma, in ancient times exceeding strong, remembred Judith vii. 3. otherwise Chelma. Between Legio and Nazaret, is the city ^a*Saffa*, or Saffra, the birth city of Zebedæus, Alphæus, James, and John: then Sephoris or Sephora, according to Josephus: Sephorum, according to Brochard; which afterwards, saith Hegefippus and Jerome, was called Diocæsaria; the city of Joachim and Anna, the parents of the Virgin Mary, it was called by Herod the tetrarch; and by him, as ^b*Josephus* speaks, made the head and defence of Galilee; in another place he saith, Urbium Galilearum maximæ Sephoris & Tiberias. This Sephoris greatly vexed Vespasian ere he won it. Herod Antipas, when he made it the regal seat of the nether Galilee, and surrounded it with a strong wall, called it Autocratorida, which is as much as to say, imperial, saith Josephus; and it is now but a castle called Zaphet.

To the south-west of this Sephoris, or Diocæsaria, was that blessed place of Nazareth, the city of Mary the mother of Christ, in which he himself was conceived; it standeth between mount Tabor, and the Mediterranean sea. In this city he abode chiefly 24 years, and was therefore called a Nazarene, as the Christians afterwards were for many years. It was erected into an archbishoprick in the following age. Near unto it are the cities Buria, afterwards well defended against the Turks, and Nabalat, of which Josh. xix. 15. and Judg. i. 30. where it is called Nabalat: and Josh. xxi. 35. where it is a city of the Levites, near the sea; adjoining to the river of Chifon, is Sarid, noted in Joshua for the uttermost of Zabulon.

In this territory of Zabulon, there are divers small mountains; but Tabor is the most renowned, by the apparition of Moses and Elias: and by the transfiguration of Christ, in the presence of Peter, James and John; unto whom Moses and Elias appeared; in memory whereof, on the top of the mountain, the empress Helen built a sumptuous chappel.

The chief river of Zabulon, is Chifon; which rising out of Tabor, runneth with one stream eastward to the sea of Galilee, and with another stream westward into the great sea. This river of Chifon, where it riseth, and so far as it runneth southward, is called Chedumim, or Cadumim: and for mine own opinion, I take it to be the same which Ptolemy calleth Chorseus; tho' others distinguish them, and set Chorseus by Cæsaria Palestine. There is a second torrent, or brook, that riseth in the hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the sea of Galilee by Magdalum; and the third is branch of a river rising out of the fountains of Capernaum, which falleth also into the same sea, and near ^c*Magdalum*; which torrent they call Dotbam, from the name of the city from which it passeth eastward to Bethsaida, and so joining with Jordanis Parvus, which runneth from the valley of ^d*Jephthael*, which Joshua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon, it endeth in the sea of Galilee.

S E C T. VI.

The Tribe of ISSACHAR.

THE next adjoining territory to Zabulon, to the south and south-west, was Iffachar, who inhabited a part of the nether Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increased in Egypt, as appeared by their musters at mount Sinai, 54400 able and warlike men, who leaving their bodies with the rest in the deserts, there entered the Holy Land, 64300.

The first city of this tribe, near the sea of Galilee, was ^e*Tarichea* distant from Tiberias eight English miles, or somewhat more, a city wherein the Jews (by the practice of a certain mutinous upstart, John the son of Levi) took arms against Josephus the historian, then governor of both Galilees. This city was first taken by Cassius, and 3000 Jews carried thence captive; and afterwards, with great difficulty by Vespasian, who entered it by the sea-side, having first beaten the Jews in a sea-fight upon the lake or sea of Galilee, he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages; saving that his fury being quenched with the rivers of blood running thro' every street, he reserved the remainder for slaves and bondmen. Next to Tarichea is placed ^f*Cession*, or Cishion, of the Levites, and then Iffachar, remembred in 1 Kings iv. 17. then Abes, or Ebets, Josh. xix. 20. and Remeth, of which Josh. xix. 21. otherwise Ramoth, 1 Chron. vi. 73. or Jarmuth, Josh. xxi. 29. this also was a city of the Levites, from whose territory the mountains of Gilboa take beginning; and range themselves to the Mediterranean sea, and towards the west as far as the city of Jezerael; between which and Ramoth are the cities of Bethpbeses, or Bethpaffes, according to Zeigler, and Enadda, or Hen-chadda: near which Saul slew himself: under those ^g*Aphec*, or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Iffachar; between which and Suna, he saith, that the Philistines encamped against Israel, and afterwards against Saul, a land thirsty of blood; for herein also, says he, the Syrians, with 32 Reguli assisting Benbadad, incountred Achab, and were overthrown and slaughtered: to whom the king of Israel made a most memorable answer, when Benbadad vaunted before the victory; which was, Tell Benbadad, Let not him that girdeth his harness boast himself, as he that putteth it off; meaning, that glory followed after victory, but ought not to precede it. In the year following, in the fields, as they say, adjoining to this city, was the same vain-glorious Syrian utterly broken and discomfited by Achab, and 100000 footmen of the Aramites, or Syrians, slain: before which overthrow, the servants and counsellors of Benbadad (in derision of the God of Israel) told him, ^h*That the Gods of Israel were Gods of the mountains; and therefore if they fought with them in the plains, they should overcome them*.

Under Aphec, towards the sea, they set the city of Esdrelon, in the plains of Galilee, called also the great field of Esdrelon, and Maggedo; in the border whereof are the ruins of Aphec, to be seen, saith Brochard and Breidenbach. After these are the cities of ⁱ*Casaloth*, of which 1 Maccab. ix. 2. Anem, or Hen-Gannim of the Levites; and Seefima, or Shabatfima, the west border of Iffachar, of which Josh. xix. 22. From hence ranging the sea-coast, there is found the castle of pilgrims; a strong castle, environed with the sea, some-time the store-house and magazine of the Christians, and built by the earl of St. Giles, or Tolouse.

From the castle of pilgrims the sea maketh a great bay towards the north, and at the farthest shore beginneth mount Carmel, not far from the river Chifon; where Elijah assembled all the prophets and priests of Baal, and prayed king Achab, and the people assembled, to make trial, whether the God of Israel, or the idol of Baal, were to be worshipped, by laying a sacrifice without fire on the altar: which done, the priests of Baal prayed, and cut their own flesh after their manner, but the fire kindled not; while Elijah in derision told them, that their God was either in pursuit of his enemies, not at leisure, or perchance asleep, &c. But at the prayer of Elijah, his fire kindled, notwithstanding that he had caused the people to cast many vessels of water thereon; by which miracle the people incensed, slew all those idolaters on the banks of Chifon adjoining.

At the foot of this mountain, to the north, standeth Caiphas, built, as they say, by Caiphas the high priest. It is also known by the name of Porfina and Porphyria, sometime a suffragan bishop's seat. Returning again from the sea-coast, towards Tiberias, by the banks of Chifon, there are found the city of Ilapharaim, or Aphraim, and the castles of Mesra and Saba; of which Brochard and Breidenbach; and then Naim on the river Chifon, a beautiful city while it stood, in the gates whereof Christ raised from death the widow's only son.

Then Seon, or Shion, named Josh. xix. between the two hills of Hermon, in Iffachar: beyond it standeth Endor, famous by reason of the enchantress that undertook to raise up the body of Saul, at the instigation of Saul.

Beyond it stands Anadarath and Rabbith, named Josh. xix. 19, 20. Then Dabarath, as it is named Josh. xxi. 28. or Dobratba, as it is named 1 Chron. vi. 72. This city (which stretcheth itself over Chifon) was a city of refuge belonging to the Levites.

Next to Dabarath is Arbela situate, near the caves of those two thieves which so greatly molested Galilee in Herod's time. It joineth on one side to the mountain of Iffachar or Hermon, and on the other the valley of Jezreel; which valley continueth itself from Bethsan, or Scythopolis, the east border of Iffachar, even to the Mediterranean sea; two parts whereof are enclosed by the mountains of Gilboa on the south, and by Hermon and the river Chifon on the north. In these plains Gideon overthrew the Madianites, and herein, they think, Saul fought against the Philistines, Achab against the Syrians, and the Tartars against the Saracens.

SECT. VII.

The Half of the Tribe of MANASSE II.

§ I.

Of the bounds of this half tribe, and of Scythopolis, Salem, Therfa, and others.

THE next tribe which joineth itself to Iffachar towards the south, is the half of Manasse, on the west-side of Jordan. Manasses was the first begotten of Joseph, the 11th son of Jacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Putiphar, priest and prince of Mesopotamia: which Manasses, with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Jacob, were by adoption numbred amongst the sons of Jacob, and made up the number of the twelve patriarchs.

Of Manasse, there were increased in Egypt, as they were numbred at mount Sinai, 32200 able men: all which being consumed in the deserts, there entered of their issue 52700 bearing arms. The territory which fell on this one half of Manasse, was bounded by Jordan on the east, and Dora upon the Mediterranean sea on the west, Jezrael on the north, and Machmata is the south border.

The first and principal city which stood in this territory, was Bethsan, sometime Nyssa, saith Pliny, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his nurse there buried, of the same name, which Solinus confirms. Afterwards, when the Scythians invaded Asia the less, and pierced into the south, to the uttermost of Calesyria, they built this city anew, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the city of Scythians given it by the Greeks.

These barbarous northern people, constrained the Jews to fight against their own nation and kindred, by whose hands when they had obtained victory, they themselves set on the Jews which served them, and slew them all. Stephanus makes it the utmost towards the south of Calesyria: and Strabo joins it to Galilee. It is seated between Jordan and the hills of Gilboa, In autone ad montes Acrabitanæ, saith Zeigler. But I find it in the east part of the valley of Jezrael near Jordan: after that Jordan straiteneth itself again into a river, leaving the sea or lake Genezereth. Notwithstanding Montanus describes it far to the west, and towards the Mediterranean sea, near Endor, contrary to Stella, Laiclan, Adrichome, and all other the best authors. This city was the greatest of all those of Decapolis: but the children of Manasse could not expel the inhabitants thereof, and therefore called it Sane, an enemy; or Beth-san, the house of an enemy.

Over the walls of Beth-san, the Philistines hung the body of Saul and his sons, slain at Gilboa. It had, while the Christian religion flourished in those parts, an archbishop, who had nine other bishops of his diocese numbred by Tyrius, in lib. 14. cap. 12. but the same was afterwards translated to Nazareth. The later travellers in those parts affirm, that there is daily taken out among the rubbish and the ruins of that city, goodly pillars, and other pieces of excellent marble, which witness the stately buildings and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poor and desolate village.

From Beth-san, keeping the way by Jerusalem, they find an ancient city called Salim; which city, the ancient Rabbins, saith Jerome, do not find to be the same with Jerusalem; there being, in the time of Jerome, and since, a town of that name, near Scythopolis before remembred; which if the place of scripture, Gen. xiii. 18. do not confirm, where the Ungar readeth Transivitque in Salim quem Sechemum (for which others read, Veni incolens ad civitatem Sechemum, making the word Sechem not to be a proper name, but an adjective) yet the place John iii. 13. where it is said, that John was baptizing in Enon near Salim, may somewhat strengthen this opinion, and yet it is not unlikely that this Salim of which St. John speaketh, is but contracted of Sebalim, of which in the tribe of Benjamin, 1 Sam. ix. 4. This word Junius maketh to be the plural of Shubal; of which we read, 1 Sam. xiii. 17. for as for that which is added out of Cant. vi. 12. of Shulammitis, as if it had been as much as a woman of this Salim, near Enon, it hath no probability.

Not far from thence, where they place Salem, they find Pezek the city of Adonibezek; Josephus calls it Bala: here it was that Saul assembled the strength of Israel and Juda, to the number of 330000, when he meant to relieve Jabesh-Gilead, against Nabab the Ammonite; who would give them no other conditions of peace, than to suffer their right eyes to be thrust out. Near Bezek, is the city of Bethbera, or rather Beth-bara, of which Judg. vii. 24. in the story of Gideon; and then Ephra, or Hophra, wherein Gideon inhabited; in the border whereof stood an altar consecrated to Baal: which he pulled down and defaced; and near it that stone on which Abimelech the bastard slew his seventy brothers (an heathenish cruelty, practised by the Turks to this day;) and not far hence, between the village of Asophon and Jordan, Ptolomæus Latburus overthrew Alexander king of the Jews; and slaughtered, as Josephus numbred them, 3000; but according to Timagenes 5000: after which victory, as Ptolemy pass'd by the villages of the Jews, he slew all their women, and caused the young children to be sod in great caldrons, that the rest of the Jews might thereby think that the Egyptians were grown to be men-eaters, and strike them with the greater terror.

Towards the west, and on the border of Iffachar, they place the cities of ^b Aner of the Levites, and Abel-Mehola, which Junius, Judg. vii. 22. placeth in Ephraim; it was the habitation of Heliseus the prophet, numbred among those places, 1 Reg. iv. 12. which were given in charge to Baana by Solomon; to whose charge also Tabanach belonged, a place of great strength, which at the first resisted Joshua, tho' their king was afterward hanged, and their city given to the Levites.

In the body of this territory of Manasseh, but somewhat nearer to Jordan than to the Mediterranean sea, were three great cities, to wit, Thersa, whose king was one of those that Joshua slew; which the kings of Israel used for their regal seat, till such time as Samaria was built. From hence the wife of Jeroboam went to Achia to enquire of her son's health; who knowing her, tho' she were disguised, told her of her son's death.

The second was Thebes, near Samaria, of which name there are both in Egypt and Greece, of great fame; in the assault of the tower of this town, whereunto the citizens retired, the bastard Abimelech was wounded by a weighty stone, thrown by a woman over the wall; who despairing of his recovery, ^c commanded his page to slay him outright, because it should not be said that he perished by the stroke of a woman. But others set this city in Ephraim, near Siehem or Neapolis.

The third is Acrabata, of which the territory adjoining is called Acrabatena (one of the ten toparchies or governments in Judea) for which Jerome, 1 Maccab. v. reads Arabathena; but in the Greek it is Acrabatine: Isidore calls it Agrabat. This city had one of the largest territories of all Palestine, belonging to the governour thereof. Josephus remembreth it often, as in his second book of the Jeros wars, c. 11, 25, 28. and elsewhere.

The difference between a tetrarchy and a toparchy, was, that the first was taken for a province, and the other for a city, with some lesser territory adjoining; and a tetrarch is the same with Præses in Latin, and president in English, being commonly the fourth part of a kingdom, and thereof so called. ^d Pliny nameth seventeen tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had four, and so hath the kingdom of Ireland to this day, ^e Lempster, Ulster, Conanath, and Munster.

To the south-west of Acrabata, they place the cities of Balaam, or Bilham, and Gethremmon of the Levites: but Junius out of Josh. xxi. 25. and 1 Chron. vi. 70. gathers, that these two are but one; and that Jibleham, Josh. xvi. 11. is another name of the same city.

Then is Jezrael a regal city, set at the foot of the mountains of Gilboa, towards the south-west; herein Jezabel, by a false accusation, caused Naboth to be stoned, to the end she might possess his vineyard joining to the city; which Naboth refused to sell, because it was his inheritance from his father.

Joram also was cast unburied into the same field; for which his mother ^f Jezabel murdered Naboth.

Towards the sea, from Jezrael, is the city which they call Gaber; in whose ascent, as Abaziah king of Juda fled from Jehu, when he had slain Joram, he was wounded with the shot of an arrow, of which wound he died at Maggeddo adjoining. The scripture calls this city of Gaber, ^g Gur.

Then Adadremmon, near unto which the good king Josias was slain by Necho king of Egypt, in a war unadvisedly undertaken. For Necho marched towards Affyria against the king thereof, by the commandment of God; whom Josias thought to resist in his passage: it was afterwards called Maximianopolis.

A neighbour city to Adadremmon was ^h Maggeddo, often remembred in the scriptures; whose king was slain among the rest by ⁱ Joshua; yet they defended their city for a long time against Manasseh. The river which passeth by the town, may perhaps be the same which Ptolemy calleth Chorseus: and not that of which we have spoken in Zabulon. For because this name is not found in the scriptures, many of those that have described the holy land, delineate no such river. Moore only sets it down in his geography of the twelve tribes: but the river which passeth by Maggeddo, he understandeth to be but a branch falling thereinto. Laicstan and Schrot make a great confluence of waters in this place; agreeable to this scripture in the vth of Judges; Then fought the kings of Canaan in Tanaac, by the waters of Maggeddo. But these authors, and with them Stella, give it no other name than the torrent so called.

But seeing that ancient cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phenicia even to Sebaste, or Samaria; and ^k Strabo far beyond it on the sea-coast: and Josephus calls Cæsaria Palestinæ a city of Phenicia: yea, Laurentius Corvinus extendeth Phenicia as far as Gaza: seeing also Ptolemy sets down Chorseus for the partition of Phenicia and Judea, this river running east and west parallel with Samaria; it is very probable that this torrent called Maggeddo, after the name of the city which it watereth, is the same which Ptolemy in his 4th table of Asia, calleth Chorseus. The later travellers of the holy land call Maggeddo, Subimbre at this day.

† II.

Of Cæsaria Palestinæ, and some other towns.

FROM Maggeddo towards the west, and near the Mediterranean sea, was that glorious city of Cæsaria Palestinæ: first, the tower of Straton: the same which Pliny calls Apollonia: tho' Ptolemy sets Apollonia elsewhere, and towards Egypt, between this city and Joppe, to which Vespasian gave the name of Flavia Colonia. It was by Herod rebuilt, who therein laboured to exceed all the works in that part of the world: for besides the edifices, which he reared within the walls, of cut and polish'd marbles, the theatre and amphitheatre, from whence he might look over the seas far away, with the high and stately towers and gates; he forced a harbour of great capacity, being in former times but an open bay: and the wind blowing from the sea, the merchants haunting that port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their cables and anchors. This work he performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that kind hath not been found in any kingdom, nor in any age: which, because the materials are fetched from far, and the weight of the stones was such, as it exceedeth belief, I have added Josephus's own words of this work, which are these: "Hanc locorum incommoditatem correcturus, circum portus circumduxit, quantum putaret magnæ classi recipiendæ sufficere: Et in viginti ulnarum profundum, prægrandia saxa demisit: quorum pleraque pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis vero octodecim, altitudine novem-pedali: fuerunt quædam etiam majora, minora alia. To mend this inconvenience of place (saith Josephus) he compass'd in a bay wherein a great fleet might well ride: and let down great stones twenty fathom deep: whercof some were 50 foot long, 18 foot broad, and 9 foot thick: and some bigger and some lesser. To this he added an arm or caufway of 200 foot long to break the waves: the rest he strengthened with a stone wall, with divers stately towers thereon builded: of which the most magnificent he called Drusus, after the name of Drusus the son-in-law of Cæsar: in whose honour he intitled the city it self, Cæsaria of Palestine: all which he performed in 12 years time. It was the first of the eastern cities that received a bishop: afterwards erected into an archbishoprick, commanding 20 others under it, saith Tyrius.

St. Jerome nameth Theophilus, Eusebius, Acacius, Euzorus, and Gelasius, to have been bishops thereof. In this city was Cornelius the centurion baptized by St. Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the apostle. St. Paul was herein two years prisoner, under the president Felix, unto the time and government of Porcius Festus: by whom, making his appeal, he was sent to Cæsar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the Quinquennialia, taking delight to be called a God by his flatterers, he was stricken by an angel unto death, saith Josephus.

To the north of Cæsaria standeth Dora, or Naphoth Dor, as some read, Josh. i. 2. so called (saith Adricomius) because it joineth to the sea, whose king was slain by Joshua. But Junius, for in Naphoth Dor, reads in trælibus Dor: and so the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor, altho' 1 Kings iv. 11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Nephtalim Dor: the Septuagint in the place of Joshua call it Nephth-Dor, and in the other of the kings, Nephth-Dor: but the true name by other places (as Josh. xii. 23. Judg. i. 27.) may seem to be Dor. It was a strong and powerful city, and the fourth in account of those 12 principalities, or sitarchies, which Solomon erected. Junius upon Macc. xv. 11. placeth it between the hill Carmel, and the mouth of the river Chorseus: for so some name the river Corseus, of which we have spoken already.

Into this city, for the strength thereof, Typhon fled from Antiochus the son of Demetrius, where he was by the same Antiochus besieged with 120000 footmen, and 8000 horse: the same perfidious villain that received 200 talents for the ransom of Jonathan Macchabeus (whom he had taken by treachery) and then slew him: and after him slew his own master, usurping for a while the kingdom of Syria. It had also a bishop's seat of the diocese of Cæsaria.

From Cæsaria towards the south, they place the cities of Caparnaum, Gabe, and Galgal: for besides that Caparnaum famous in the evangelists, they find in these parts near the west sea, another of the same name. Of Gabe, Jerome, in locis Hebraicis. "The famous Galgal, or Gilgal, was in Benjamin: but this Gilgal, they say it was, whose king was slain by Joshua.

Then Antipatris, so called of Herod, in honour of his father: but in the time of the Macchabees, it was called Capharsalama: in the fields whereof Judas Macchabeus overthrew a part of the army of Nicanor, lieutenant to Demetrius: an army drawn into Judea by a traiterous Jew, called Alcimus: who contended for the priesthood, first under Bacchides, and then under Nicanor. To this was St. Paul carried prisoner from Jerusalem, conducted by 470 soldiers, to defend him from the fury of the Jews. In after-times the army of Godfry of Bulloign attempted it in vain; yet was it taken by Baldwin. It was honoured in those days with a bishop's seat; but it is now a poor village, called Affur, saith Brochard. Near unto this city the prophet Jonas was three days preserved in the body of a whale.

Into the land, from Antipatris and Cæsaria, standeth Narbata, whereof the territory taketh name: which Cestius the Roman, wasted with fire and sword, because the Jews which dwelt at Cæsaria fled thence, and carried with them the book of Moses. Near unto it is the mountain of Abdia, the steward of king Achab; wherein he hid an hundred prophets, and fed them: after which he himself is said to have obtained from God the spirit of prophecy also.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the kingdom of Phenicia.

SECT. I.

The bounds, and chief cities, and founders, and name of this kingdom: and of the invention of letters ascribed to them.

BECAUSE these five tribes, of Asser, Nephthalim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the half of Manasseh, possess'd the better part of that ancient kingdom of Phenicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the south part of Anti-Libanus; I have therefore gathered a brief of those kings which have governed therein: at least so many of them as time (which devour-eth all things) have left to posterity: and that the rest perished, it is not strange: seeing so many volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and revolution, and in so many changes of estates, and conquests of heathen princes, have been torn, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this kingdom, as touching the south parts, are very uncertain: but all cosmographers do in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the north, where that part of Syria, which is called Casiotis, ends: most of them bounding it by Orthosia to the north of Tripolis. Ptolemy makes it a little larger, as reaching from the river Eleutherus that falls into the sea at the island of Aradus, somewhat to the north of Orthosia, and stretching from thence along the coast of the Mediterranean sea, as far as the river of Chorseus; which seems to be that which the Jews call the torrent, or river of Maggeddo. Pliny extends it further, and comprehends Joppe within it: Corvinus and Budæus, Joppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud præcos appellata (saith Budæus) quæ nunc Palestina Syriæ dicitur; It was called Phenicia of old (saith he) which now is called Palestina of Syria.

^a Strabo comprehends in this country of Phenicia all the sea side of Judea, and Palestina, even unto Pelusium, the first port of Egypt. On the contrary, Diodorus Siculus foldeth it up in Cœlesyria, which he boundeth not. But for my self, I take a middle course, and like best of Ptolemy's description, who was seldom deceived of his own art. It had in it these famous maritime cities (besides all those of the islands) to wit, Aradus, Orthofia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomais (or Acon) Dora, and Cæsaria Palestine: and by reason of the many ports and goodly sea-towns, it anciently commanded the trade of the eastern world: and they were absolute kings of the Mediterranean sea.

The ancient regal seat of those princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first son of Canaan: and the people then subject to that family were called Zidonians; the same state continuing even unto Joshua's time. For till then, it is probable that there was but one king of all that region, afterwards called Phenicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second book of Vandal Wars. But in process of time the city of Tyre adjoining, became the more magnificent: yet, according to the ^b prophet, it was but a daughter of Zidon, and by them first built, and peopled.

But after the death of Moses, and while Joshua yet governed Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phenician bred in Egypt, came thence with his sons Cadmus, Phenix, Cyrus, and Cilix (say Cedrenus and Curtius) and built and possess'd the cities of Tyre and Zidon, to wit, the new Tyrus; and brought into Phenicia (so called after the name of his second son) the use of letters: which also Cadmus, in his pursuit after his sister Europa, taught the Greeks. For Taurus king of Crete, when he surpris'd Tyre, had stolen her thence: of which the poets devised the fable of Jupiter's transformation into a bull, by whom that stealth was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the first king of Phenicia; and finds Cadmus his successor, whom he calleth his grand-child: and it seemeth that Belus was the father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the successors of Dido held that name always in reverence, making it a part of their own, as Asdrubal, Hannibal: whose memory Virgil also toucheth in these verses.

Implevitque moro pateram: quam Belus & omnes
A Belo soliti.*

The queen anon commands the weighty bowl
(Weighty with precious stones and massy gold)
To flow with wine. This Belus us'd of old,
And all of Belus' line.

Whether this Belus were father or grand-father to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seems to me by comparing of times, that Belus was ancestor to these Phenicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Jupiter Belus, the son of Neptune by Libya the daughter of Epaphus, or were he the son of Telegonus, according to Eusebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops's time, saith St. Augustin, Moses left Egypt: Agenor's successor living at once with Joshua. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither do I deny, but that he gave that region the name of Phenicia, in honour of his son. But instead of the building of Tyre and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a founder, as Semiramis and Nabuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For be it true, that Agenor was of the same nation, and brought up in Egypt, where he learned the use of letters (Egypt flourished in all kind of learning in Moses's time) or were he by nation an Egyptian; yet it is very likely, that either he came to save his own territory; or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan from the Israelites, who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great loss and dishonour of that nation, and by Joshua conducted over Jordan, to conquer and possess the Canaanites land. For tho' the Egyptians, by reason of the loss which they received by the hand of God in the Red sea, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrews from invading Canaan by land, which also they knew had so many powerful nations to defend it; the desarts interjacent, and the strong Edomites, Mobabites, Emorites, and Ammonites their borderers: yet Egypt having such vessels or ships, or gallies, as were then in use, did not in all probability neglect to garrison the sea-coast, or assist Agenor with such forces as they had to spare; and which they might perform with the greater facility, in that the Philistines, which held the shores of Canaan next adjoining unto them, were their friends and confederates.

Now, as it appeareth by the course of the story, those cities of Phenicia, which Agenor was said to have built (that is, to have fortified and defended against Joshua, and against the tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Joshua xix. 29. called the strong city, Accho afterwards Ptolomais, Achzib and Don) were all that Phenicia had in those days.

That the kings of Phenicia were mighty, especially by sea, it appears, first by their defence against David and Solomon, and secondly, by this, that David and Solomon could not master them, but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their cities, tho' they were then but Agau, defended it self 13 years against a king of kings, Nabuchodonosor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the providence of God, seemed irresistible) spent more time in the recovery of Tyre, than in the conquest of all the cities in Asia.

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Josephus, who conceives that Tyre was founded by Tyrus the son of Japhet. And for the region it self, tho' Calisthenes derives it, ab arbore dactylo- rum; and the Greeks from the word Phonos of slaughter, because the Phenicians slew all that came on their coasts; yet for my self, I take it that Phenix the son of Agenor gave it that name. But that either Agenor in Phenicia, or Cadmus his son in Greece, were the inventors of letters it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute unnecessary.

The Ethiopians affirm, that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those arts, sciences, and civil policies, which they afterwards profess'd and taught others: and that Pythagoras himself was instructed by the Libyans; to wit, from the south and superiour Egyptians: from whom those which inhabited nearer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their divinity and philosophy: and from them the Greeks, then barbarous, received civility. Again, the Phenicians challenge this invention of letters and learning, acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither do they allow that Agenor and his sons were Africans; whence Lucan,

* *Phoenices primi (fame si creditur) ausi,
Mansuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.*
Phenicians first (if fame may credit have)
In rude characters dar'd our words to grave.

And that Cadmus was the son of Agenor, and was a Phenician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that answer made by Zeno; when he in a kind of reproach was called a stranger, and a Phenician;

^b Si patria est Phoenix, quid tum? nam Cadmus & ipse Phoenix; cui debet Græcia docta libros.

If a Phenician born I am, what then?
Cadmus was so: to whom Greece owes
The books of learned men.

Out of doubt the Phenicians were very ancient: and from the records and chronicles of Tyre, ^c Josephus the historian confirms a great part of his antiquities. The Thracians again subscribe to none of these reports; but affirm constantly, that the great Zamolxis flourished among them, when Atlas lived in Mauritania, Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt, and Ochus in Phenicia. Yea, some of the French do not blush to maintain, that the ancient Gauls taught the Greeks the use of letters, and other sciences. And do not we know that our Bards and Druids are as ancient as those Gauls, and that they sent their sons hither to be by them instructed in all kind of learning?

Lastly; whereas others bestow this invention on Moses: the same hath no probability at all; for he lived at such time as learning and arts flourished most, both in Egypt and Affyria, and he himself was brought up in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancy.

But true it is, that letters were invented by those excellent spirits of the first age, and before the general flood, either by Seth or Enoch, or by whom else God knows; from whom all wisdom and understanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his creatures, so hath he given the same invention to divers nations; whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other, as well in this as in many other knowledges; for even in Mexico, when it was first discovered, there were found written books after the manner of those hieroglyphicks, anciently used by the Egyptians, and other nations: and so had those Americans, a kind of heraldry, and their princes differing in arms and escutcheons, like unto those used by the kings and nobility of other nations: ^d Jura naturalia communia, & generalia, &c. Natural laws are common, and general.

SECT. II.

Of the kings of Tyre.

BUT whatsoever remaineth of the story and kings of Phenicia (the book of Zeno, Sachoniathe, Mnaseas, and others of that nation, being no where found) the same is to be gathered out of the scriptures, Josephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor lived at once with Joshua, to whom succeeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so far towards the north as Aradus, took the name of Phenicia: what king succeeded Phœnix it doth not appear; but at such time as the Grecians besieged Troy, Phasis governed Phenicia.

In Jeremy's time, and while Jehoiakim ruled in Juda, the Tyrians had a king apart: for Jeremy xxvii. 3. speaketh of the kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of several kings.

In Xerxes's time, and when he prepared that incredible army wherewith he invaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phenicia about Tyre and Zidon: who commanded, as some writers affirm, Xerxes's fleet, or rather, as I suppose, those 300 gallies, which himself brought to his aid: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phenicians were tributaries to the Persians: for being broken into Reguli, and petty kings in Jeremy's time, they were subjected by Nabuchodonosor; of whose conquests in the chapter before remembred, Jeremiah prophesied.

Tennes, tho' not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus, remembred by D. Siculus in his fourteenth book.

Strato, his successor, and king of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependency upon Darius, and that his predecessors had served the east empire against the Grecians. But divers kings, of whom there is no memory, came between Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 130 years, and somewhat more, between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed the more unworthy of restitution, because (saith Curtius, l. 4.) he rather submitted himself by the instigation of his subjects (who foresaw their utter ruin by resistance) than that he had any disposition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Of this Strato, ^e Atheneus, out of Theopompus reporteth, that he was a man of ill living, and most voluptuous; also that he appointed certain games and prizes for women-dancers and singers, whom he to this end chiefly invited, and assembled: that having beheld the most beautiful and lively among them, he might recover them for his own use and delights. Of the strange accident about the death of one Strato king of these coasts, St. Jerome and others make mention: who having heard that the Persians were near him with an army too weighty for his strength, and finding that he was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians, he determining to kill himself, but fainting in the execution, his wife being present, wrested the sword out of his hand, and slew him: which done, she also therewith pierced her own body, and died.

After Alexander was possessed of Zidon, and the other Strato driven thence, he gave the kingdom to Hephæstion to dispose of: who having received great entertainment of one of the citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompense him therewith, and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this citizen, no less virtuous than rich, desired Hephæstion that this honour might be conferred on some one of the blood and race of their ancient kings: and presented unto him Balonimus, whom Curtius calls Abdolominus; Justin, Abdolomius; and Plutarch, Alynomus: who at the very hour that he was called to this regal estate, was with his own hands working in his garden, setting herbs and roots, for his relief and sustenance: tho' otherwise a wise man, and exceeding just.

These were the ancient kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterwards changed into popular or Aristocratical, and by times and turns subjected to the emperors of the east, there remaineth no further memory of them, than that which is formerly delivered in the tribe of Asber.

The kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuel's time, it doth not appear: Josephus the historian, as is said, had many things wherewith he garnished his antiquities from the Tyrian chronicles: and out of Josephus and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be gathered a descent of some 20 kings of the Tyrians; but these authors, tho' they both pretend to write out Menander Ephesius, do in no sort agree in the times of their reigns, nor in other particulars.

Abibalus is the first king of the Tyrians, that Josephus and Theophilus remember, whom Theophilus calls Abemalus: the same perchance that the son of Sirach mentioneth in his 46th chapter, speaking of the princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibalus, Suron succeeded, if he be not one and the same with Abibalus. David (saith ^a Eusebius out of Eupolemus) constrained this Suron to pay him tribute, of whom also David complaineth, Psalms lxxxiii.

Iiram succeeded Suron, whom Josephus calls Irom, and Theophilus sometimes Iheronimus, sometimes Iheromus, but Tatian and Zonaras Chiram. He entred into a league with David, and sent him cedars, with masons and carpenters, to perform his buildings in Jerusalem, after he had beaten thence the Jebusites. The same was he that so greatly assisted Solomon: whom he not only furnished with cedars, and other materials towards the raising of the temple, and with great sums of money, but also he joined with him in his enterprize of the east India, and of Ophir: and furnished Solomon with mariners and pilots: the Tyrians being of all nations the most excellent navigators: and lent him 120 talents of gold. Of this Iiram, there is not only mention in divers places of scripture, but in Josephus's antiquities, the 7th and 8th chap. ver. 2, 3. in Theophilus's 3d book, in Tatianus's oration against the Greeks, and in Zonaras, tome the first. This prince seemeth to be very mighty and magnificent; he despiseth the 20 towns which Solomon offered him: he defendeth himself against that victorious king David: and gave his daughter in marriage to ^c Solomon, called the Zidonian: for whose sake he was contented to worship Asteroth, the idol of the Phenicians. Iiram lived 53 years.

Balastartus, whom ^d Theoph. Antiochenus calleth Bazorus, succeeded Iiram king of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7 years, according to Josephus.

Abdastartus the eldest son of Balastartus, governed 9 years, and lived but 20 years according to Josephus: but after Theophilus, he reigned 12 years, and lived 54, who being slain by the 4 sons of his own nurse, the eldest of them held the kingdom 12 years.

Astartus, brother to Abdastartus, recovered the kingdom from this usurper, and reigned 12 years.

^e Astarimus, or Atbarimus, after ^f Theophilus, a 3d brother, followed Astartus, and ruled 9 years, and lived in all 54.

^g Phelles the 4th son of Balastartus, and brother to the 3 former kings, slew Astarimus, and reigned 8 months, and lived 50 years.

Ithobalus (or Juthobalus, in Theophilus) son to the 3d brother Astarimus, who was the chief priest of the goddess Astarta, which was a dignity next unto the king, revenged the death of his father, and slaughtered his uncle ^h Phelles: and reigned 32 years, the same which in 1 Kings xvi. is called Ethbaal, whose daughter Jezebel Achab married.

Badezor, or Bazor, the son of Ithobalus, or ⁱ Ethbaal, brother to Jezebel, succeeded his father, and reigned 6 years, and lived in all 45.

Mettimus succeeded Badezor, and reigned but 9 years (saith ^k Josephus) he had two sons, Pygmalion and Barca, and two daughters, Elisa and Anna.

Pygmalion reigned after Mettimus his father 40 years, and lived 56. In the 7th year of whose reign, Elisa sailed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143 years and 8 months after the temple of Solomon: which by our account was 289 years after Troy was taken, and 143 before Rome; and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Aeneas and Dido must be far out of square. For Pygmalion, covetous of Sicheus's riches, who had married his sister Elisa, slew him traiterously as he accompanied him in hunting: or, if we believe ^l Justin and Virgil, at the altar: whereupon Elisa, fearing to be despoiled of her husband's treasure, fled by sea into Africa, as aforesaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his mother's tears, and by threats from the oracle arrested. Barca accompanied his sister, and assisted her in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble family of Barce in Africa, of which race descended many famous captains, and the great Hannibal. Servius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her manlike acts: others from Jedidia, a surname of Solomon.

Eluleus succeeded Pygmalion, and reigned 36 years: the same that overthrew the fleet of Salmanassar, in the port of Tyre: notwithstanding which he continued his siege before it on the land side 5 years, but in vain.

After Eluleus, Ethobales governed the Tyrians, who vaunted himself to be as wise as Daniel: and that he knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the prophet writeth at large in his xxviiith chapter: out of whom it is gathered, that this prince died, or was slain in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor: who surrounded and attempted Tyre 13 years together, ere he prevailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10 years a tributary, perchance, to Nabuchodonosor: for after his death, it was governed by divers judges, succeeding each other: first by Ecnibalus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the priest, Mittonus, and Geraflus, who held it among them some 7 years and odd months: after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a king for one year: after him Merbalus sent from Babylon 4 years; after him Irom, sent thence also 20 years. In the 17th of whose reign Cyrus began to govern Persia.

SECT. III.

Of Bozias's conceit, that the Edumeans inhabiting along the Red sea, were the progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phenicia the knowledge of the true God.

Of the great mutations of this kingdom and state of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of divers other nations, there is one Bozias that hath written a tract at large, intitled, De ruinis Gentium. And altho' the great and many alterations found in this and other cities, yea in all things under heaven, have proceeded from his ordinance, who only is unchangeable and the same for ever; yet whereas the said Bozias, insinuating here-hence, that the prosperity and ruin of the Tyrians were fruits of their embracing or forsaking the true religion; to prove this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to have been Edumeans, descended from Esau, Jacob's brother: first, it can hardly be believed that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glory, was in any sort truly devout and religious. But to this end (¹ besides the proof which the scriptures give of Hiram's good affection, when Solomon built the temple) he brings many conjectural arguments, whereof the strongest is their pedigree and descent: it being likely in his opinion, that the posterity of Eſau received from him by tradition the religion of Abraham and Iſaac. That the Tyrians were Edumeans, he endeavours to ſhew, partly by weak reaſons painfully ſtrained from ſome affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than weight: partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Pliny, and others witneſs, that the Tyrians came from the Red ſea, in which there were three iſlands, called Tyrus, Aradus, and Zidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards given to the cities of Phenicia. Conſidering therefore that all the coaſt of the Red ſea, was (in his opinion) under the Edumeans: as Elab and Eſiongaber, or under the Amalekites who deſcended of Amalek the nephew of Eſau, whoſe chief city was Madian, ſo called of Madian the ſon of Abraham by Cethura, whoſe poſterity did people it: the conſequence appears good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edomites: differing little or nothing in religion from the children of Iſrael. Hereunto he adds, that Cadmus and his companions brought not into Greece the worſhip of Aſtartis the idol of the Sidonians. That the parents of Thales and Pherecides being Phenicians, themſelves differed much in their philoſophy from the idolatrous cuſtoms of the Greeks. That in Teman, a town of the Edumeans, was an univerſity, wherein, as may appear by Eliphaz the Temanite, who diſputed with Job, religion was ſincerely taught.

Such is the diſcourſe of Bozcius, who labouring to prove one paradox by another, deſerves in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumeans, they were then of the true religion, or well affected to God and his people: neither is it true that they were Edumeans at all. In what religion Eſau brought up his children, it is no where found written; but that himſelf was a profane man, and diſavowed by God, the ſcriptures in plain terms expreſs. That his poſterity were idolaters, is directly proved in the 25th chapter of the 2d book of Chronicles, that the Edomites were perpetual enemies to the houſe of Iſrael, ſave only when David and ſome of his race, kings of Juda, held them in ſubjection, who knows not? or who is ignorant of David's unfriendly behaviour amongſt them, when firſt they were ſubdued? Surely, it was not any argument of kindred or alliance between Tyrus and mount Seir, that Hiram held ſuch good correſpondence with David; even then when Joab ſlew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their devotion to God, and good affection to Iſrael, that the Edomites were ſo ill treated. It ſeemeth that the piety and ancient wiſdom of Eliphaz the Temanite was then forgotten, and the Edumeans puniſhed, for being ſuch as David in his own days found them. Altho' indeed the city of Teman whence Eliphaz came to reaſon with Job, is not that in Edumea, but another of the ſame name, lying eaſt from the ſea of Galilee, and adjoining to Iluſ, the country of Job: and to Sueb the city of Bildad the Shuite; as both ſuch chorographers who beſt knew thoſe parts, do plainly ſhew, and the holy text maketh maniſeſt. For Job is ſaid to have exceeded in riches, and Solomon in wiſdom, all the people of the eaſt; not the inhabitants of mount Seir, which lay due ſouth from Paleſtina. True it is, that Elephaz the ſon of Eſau had a ſon called Teman: but that fathers were wont in thoſe days to take name of their ſons, I no where find. And Iſhmael alſo had a ſon called Thema: of whom it is not unlike, that Theman in the eaſt had the name: for as much as in the ſeventh chapter of the book of Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, and all they of the eaſt are called Iſhmaelites. He that well conſiders how great and ſtrong a nation Amalek was, which durſt give battle to the hoſt of Iſrael, wherein were 600000 able men, will hardly believe that ſuch a people were deſcended from one of Eſau's grandchildren. For how powerful and numberleſs muſt the forces of all Edom have been, if one tribe of them, yea, one family of a tribe had been ſo great? ſurely mount Seir, and all the regions adjoining, could not have held them. But we no where find that Edom had to do with Amalek, or aſſiſted the Amalekites, when Saul went to root them out. For Amalek is no where in ſcripture named for a tribe in Edom, but a nation of itſelf, if diſtinct from the Iſhmaelites. The like may be ſaid of Midian, that the founder thereof being ſon to Abraham by Keturah, doubtleſs was no Edomite. And thus much in general for all the *Seignior*y of the Red ſea coaſt, which Bozcius imagines the Edumeans to have held: if the Edomites in after-times held ſome places, as Elan and Ezion-gaber on the Red ſea ſhore, yet in Mofes's time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Mofes himſelf ſaith, that Iſrael did compaſs all the borders of Edom; within which limits had Midian flood, Mofes muſt needs have known it: becauſe he had ſojourned long in that country: and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Egypt.

But conjectural arguments, how probable ſoever, are needleſs in ſo maniſeſt a caſe. For in the lxxxiii. Pſalm, Edom, Amalek, and Tyre, are named as diſtinct nations: yea, the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good authors ſhew, and Bozcius himſelf confeſſeth, were Canaanites, as appears Gen. x. 15, 19. appointed by God to have been deſtroyed, and their lands given to the children of Aſher, Joſh. xxix. becauſe they were idolaters, and of the curſed ſeed of Canaan, not couſins to Iſrael, nor profeſſors of the ſame religion. For tho' Hiram ſaid, Bleſſed be God who hath ſent king David a wiſe ſon: we cannot infer that he was of David's religion. The Turk hath ſaid as much of Chriſtian princes, his confederates. Certain it is, that the Sidonians then worſhipped Aſhteroth, and drew Solomon alſo to the ſame idolatry.

Whereas Hiram aided Solomon in building the temple, he did it for his own ends, receiving therefore of Solomon great proviſion of corn and oil, and the offer of twenty towns or villages in Galilee. And if we rightly conſider things, it will appear, that Hiram in all points dealt merchant-like with Solomon. He allowed him timber, with which Labanus was, and yet is over-peſtered, being otherwiſe apt to yield ſilks: as the Andarine ſilks which come from thence, and other good commodities. For corn and oil, which he wanted, he gave that which he could well ſpare to Solomon. Alſo gold for land: wherein Solomon was the wiſer; who having got the gold firſt, gave to Hiram the worſt villages that he had; with which the Tyrian was ill pleaſed. But it was a neceſſary policy, which enforced Tyrus to hold league with Iſrael. For David had ſubdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, even to Euphrates: thro' which countries the Tyrians were wont to carry and to carry their wares on camels, to their fleets on the Red ſea, and back again to Tyrus: ſo that Solomon being lord of all the countries thro' which they were to paſs, could have cut off their trade.

But the Iſraelites were no ſeamen, and therefore glad to ſhare with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Solomon, as lord of the ſea-towns, which his father had taken from the Philiftines, might have greatly greatly distressed the Tyrians, and perhaps have brought them even into subjection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no marvel) that Solomon rather meant as a man of peace to employ his father's treasure in magnificent works, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly aided him, and sent him cunning workmen, to increase his delight in goodly buildings, imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages between Solomon and Hiram, are no strong arguments of piety in the Tyrians: so those other proofs which Bozius frames negatively upon particular examples, are very weak. For what the religion of Cadmus was, I think, no man knows. It seems to me, that having more cunning than the Greeks, and being very ambitious, he would fain have purchased divine honours: which his daughters, nephews, and others of his house obtained, but his own many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but single examples. Every savage nation hath some whose wisdom excelleth the vulgar, even of civil people. Neither did the moral wisdom of these men express any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the gods of Greece; whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not known to have taught idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Utica, Leptis, Cadiz, and all colonies of the Tyrians (of which, I think, the islands beforementioned in the Red sea to have been, for they traded in all seas) were idolaters, even from their first beginnings: therefore the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their idolatry from Solomon's time onwards, is acknowledged by Bozius, who would have us think them to have been formerly a strange kind of devout Edomites. In which fancy he is so peremptory, that he stileth men of contrary opinion, impious politicos; as if it were impiety to think that God (who even among the heathen, which have not known his name, doth favour virtue, and hate vice) hath often rewarded moral honesty, with temporal happiness. Doubtless this doctrine of Bozius would better have agreed with Julian the apostate, than with Cyril. For if the Affyrians, Greeks, Romans, and all those nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew nearest unto the true religion: what may be said of the foul idolatry which grew in Rome, as fast as Rome itself grew; and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost upon every new victory? How few great battles did the Romans win, in which they vowed not either a temple to some new God, or some new honour to one of their old Gods? Yea, what one nation, save only that of the Jews, was subdued by them, whose gods they did not afterwards entertain in their city? Only the true God, which was the God of the Jews, they rejected, upbraiding the Jews with him, as if he were unworthy of the Roman majesty. Shall we hereupon inforce the leud and foolish conclusion, which heathen writers used against the Christians in the primitive Church; that such idolatry had caused the city of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations, did also bring with it the decay of the empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperity were a sign or effect of true religion. Such is the blind zeal of Bozius, who writing against those whom he falsely terms impious, gives strength to such as are impious indeed. But such indiscretion is usually found among men of his humour; who having once either foolishly imbraced the dreams of others, or vainly fashioned in their own brains, any strange Chimera's of divinity, condemn all such in the pride of their zeal, as atheists and infidels, that are not transported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pity it is, that such mad dogs are oftentimes encouraged by those, who having the command of many tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious virtue of an hypocrite.

C H A P. IX.

Of the tribe of Ephraim; and of the kings of the ten tribes, whose head was Ephraim.

S E C T. I.

Of the memorable places in the tribe of Ephraim.

HAVING now pass'd over Phenicia, we come to the next territory adjoining; which is that of Ephraim, sometime taken, per excellentiam, for the whole kingdom of the ten tribes. Ephraim was the second son of Joseph; whose issues, when they left Egypt, were in number 45000; all which dying in the desarts, Joshua excepted, there entered the Holy Land of their children, grown to be able men, 32500, who sat down on the west side of Jordan, between Manasseh and Benjamin: who bounded Ephraim by the north and south; as Jordan and the Mediterranean sea did by the east and west.

The first and chief city which Ephraim had, was Samaria the metropolis of the kingdom of Israel, built by Amris, or Homri, king thereof, and seated on the top of the mountain Somron, which overlooketh all the bottom, and as far as the sea-coast. It was afterwards called Sebastæ, or Augusta, in honour of Augustus Cesar. This city is often remembered in the scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first building; for as Brochard observeth, the ruins which yet remain, and which Brochard found greater than those of Jerusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood upright: for to this day there found great store of goodly marble pillars, with other hewn and carved stone, in great abundance, among the the rubbish.

It was beaten to the ground by the sons of Hyrchanus the high priest: restored and built by the first Herod, the son of Antipater; who, to flatter Cesar, called it Sebastæ. Herein were the prophets Heliæus and Abdias buried; and so was John Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few cottages filled with Grecian monks.

Near Samaria towards the south, is the hill of Bethel, and a town of that name; on the top of which mountain Jeroboam erected one of his golden calves to be worshipped; with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this mountain of Bethel, was that ancient city of Sichem; after the restauration called Neapolis, now Pelosa, and Napolsa: it was destroyed by Simeon and Levi, in revenge of the ravishment of their sister Dinah: and after that by Abimelech evened with the soil. Jeroboam raised it up again; and the Damascenes a third time cast it down.

^a Psal. 59. 78, 108. Par. 25. ^b Sichur. Joh. 4. 5. Maborthan. Joseph. 11. Ant. 1.

Under Sichem towards the sea, standeth Pharaton, or Pirhaton, on the mountain ^a Amalek, the city of Abdon judge of Israel; and under it Bethoron of the Levites, built, as it is said, by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim. Near to this city, Judas Maccabeus overthrew Seron and Lysias, lieutenants to Antiochus. This city had Solomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Between Bethoron and the sea, standeth Samir, of which Josh. x. and Saron, whose king was slain by ^b Joshua: it is also mentioned Acts ix. 35. And of this Saron the valley taketh name; which beginning at Cæsaria Palestina, extendeth itself along the coast as far as Joppe, saith Adrichome. Tho' indeed the name Sarona is not particularly given to this valley, but to every fruitful plain region; for not only this valley is so called, to wit, between Cæsaria and Joppe, but that also between the mountain Tabor and the sea of Galilee; for so St. Jerome, upon Isaiab xxxv. interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same father, in his commentaries upon Abdia, read Saron for Assaron; understanding thereby a plain near Lidda: which Lidda, in his time, was called Diospolis, or the city of Jupiter, one of the toparchies of Judea, the fifth in dignity (or the third after Pliny) where St. Peter (non sua sed Christi virtute) cured Aeneas. ^c Niger calls all that region, from Antilibanus to Joppe, Sarona. This Joppe was burnt to the ground by the Romans, those ravens and spoilers of all estates, disturbers of commonwealths, usurpers of other princes kingdoms: who with no other respect led, than to amplify their own glory, troubled the whole world: and themselves, after murdering one another, became a prey to the most savage and barbarous nations.

In Diospolis (saith Will. of Tyre) was ^d St. George beheaded, and buried; in whose honour and memory, Justinian the emperor caused a fair Church to be built over his tomb; these be Tyrius's words; Relicta à dextris locis maritimis Antipatride, & Joppe, per latè patentem planitiem Eleutheriam pertranseuntes, Liddam quæ est Diospolis, ubi & egregii Martyris Georgii usque hodie sepulchrum ostenditur, pervenerunt, ejus ecclesiam quum ad honorem ejusdem Martyris pius & orthodoxus princeps Romanorum, Augustus Justinianus multo studio & devotione prompta ædificari præceperat, &c. They having left, saith he, on the right hand, the sea-towns Antipatris and Joppe, passing over the great open plain of Eleutheria, came to Lidda, which is Diospolis; where the sumptuous tomb of the famous martyr St. George is at this day shewed: whose Church, when the godly and orthodox prince of the Romans, high and mighty Justinian, had commanded to be built, with great earnestness and present devotion, &c. Thus far Tyrius, by whose testimony we may conjecture that this St. George was not that Arian bishop of Alexandria, but rather some better Christian; for this of Alexandria, was slain there in an uproar of the people, and his ashes cast into the sea, as ^e Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet also it may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian than he is commonly thought: for his words of the temple of Genius, How long shall this sepulchre stand? occasioned the uproar of the people against him, as fearing lest he would give attempt to overthrow that beautiful temple. This also Marcellinus reports; who tho' he says, that this Georgius was also deadly hated of the Christians, who else might have rescued him: yet he addeth, that his ashes, with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the sea, lest if their relicts had been gathered up, Churches should be built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather think that it was not Georgius, whose name lives in the right honourable order of our knights of the garter, but rather another, whom Tyrius, above cited, witnesseth to have been buried at Lidda, or Diospolis. The same also is confirmed by ^f Vitriac. St. Jerome affirms that it was sometimes called Tigrida; and while the Christians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a bishop suffragan.

Near to Lidda, or Diospolis, standeth Ramatha of the Levites, or Aramathia: afterward Rama and Ramula, the native city of Joseph, which buried the body of Christ. ^g There are many places which bear this name of Rama: one they set in the tribe of Judah near Thecua in the way of Hebron; another in Nephthalim, not far from Sephet; a third in Zabulon, which, they say, adjoineth to Sephoris; a fourth, which they make the same with Silo; and a fifth, which is this Rama in the hills of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel lived, and wherein he is buried.

From hence to the north, along the coast, are Helon, or Ajalon of the Levites, of which ^h Chron. vi. Apollonia, of which ⁱ Josephus in his antiquities, and in the wars of the Jews. Also Balsalifa (for which Junius, 2 Kings iv. 42. reads Planities Shalifæ) they place hereabout in this tribe of Ephraim: but Junius, upon 1 Sam. vi. where we read of the land of Shalifha, findeth it in Benjamin.

On the other side of the mountains of Ephraim, standeth Gofna, one of the toparchies, or cities of government, the second in dignity, of which the country about it taketh name.

Then ^j Thamnath-sira, or, according to the Hebrew Thamnath-serach; one also of the ten toparchies or presidencies of Judea, which they call Thamnathica; a goodly city and strong, seated on one of the high hills of Ephraim, on the north of the hill called Gaas; which city and territory Israel gave unto their leader Joshua; who also amplified it with buildings, near which he was buried. His sepulchre remained in ^k St. Jerome's time, and over it the sun engraven, in memory of that greatest of wonders which God wrought in Joshua's time.

In the places adjoining standeth Adasja, or Adasfa; where ^l Judas Maccabeus, with 3000 Jews, overthrew the army of Nicanor, lieutenant of Syria, near to Gaser, or Gezer, which Joshua took, and hang'd their king, a city of the Levites. It was afterwards taken by Pharaoh of Egypt, the people all slain, and the city razed: Solomon rebuilt it.

To the east of this place, is the frontier city of Jesseti, of which Josh. xvi. 3. otherwise Peletbi, whence David had part of his pretorian soldiers, under the charge of Benaia. Then that high and famous mountain and city of Silo, whereon the ark of God was kept so many years, till the Philistines got it.

To this they join the city of ^m Machmas, or Michmas, in which Jonathan Maccabeus inhabited; a place often remembred in the scriptures. It standeth in the common way from Samaria towards Jerusalem, and is now called Byra.

Then the village of Najoth where Saul prophesied; and near it ⁿ Ephron, one of those cities which Abijah recovered from Jeroboam, after the great overthrow given him. Then Kibtsaim of the Levites, of which Josh. xxi. 22. which Junius thinks to be the same with Jokmeham, of which 1 Chron. vi. 68. As for Abfalom's Baalhasar, which they find hereabout, Junius reads it in the plain of Chatfor; and finds it in the tribe of Juda; as Joshua xv. we read of two Chatfors in that tribe, one near Kadesb, ver. 23. and the other the same as Chetzron, ver. 25. towards Jordan.

In this tribe also they find the city of Mello; whose citizens, they say, joined with the Sichimites in making the bastard Abimelech king: adding, that for the building thereof, with other cities, Solomon raised a tribute upon the people. But it seems that Mello, or Millo, is a common name of a strong fort or citadel: and so Junius, for Domus Millo, reads incole munitionis; and for Salomo ædificabat Millo, he reads, ædificabat munitionem; and so the Septuagint read τῆς ἀνεργίας in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Solomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Jerusalem.

The other cities of note in Ephraim, are Taphuach, whose king was slain by Joshua; and Janoach, or Janoab, spoiled by Teglatphalassar: Pekab then governing Israel; with divers others, but of no great fame.

The mountains of Ephraim sometime signify the greatest part of the land of the sons of Joseph, on the west of Jordan; several parts whereof are the hill of Samron, or Samaria, 1 Reg. xvi. 24. ^b the hill of Gabas, Judg. ii. 9. the hill of Tsalmon, or Salmon, Judg. ix. 48. the hills of the region of Tsuph, or Tsophim, Judg. ix. 5. where Rama Sophim stood, which was the city of Samuel.

The great plenty of fruitful vines upon the sides of these mountains, was the occasion that Jacob in the spirit of prophecy, Gen. xlix. 22. compared Joseph's two branches, Ephraim and Manasseh, to the branches of a fruitful vine planted by the well side, and spread her daughter-branches along the wall: which allegory also Ezek xxii. in his lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the ten tribes, whose head was Ephraim) prosecutes: as also in his lamentation for Judab, he followeth the other allegory of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 9. comparing Judab to a lion. Upon the top of one of the highest of these hills of Ephraim, which overlooketh all the plains on both sides of Jordan, they find the castle called Dok; which they make to be the same with Dagon, of which Joseph. 1. bell. Jud. c. 2. in which castle, as it is 1 Mac. xvi. Ptolemy most traiterously, at a banquet, slew Simon Maccabeus his father-in-law.

Among the rivers of this tribe of Ephraim, they name Gaas, remembered in 2 Sam. xxiii. 30. where tho' Junius reads, Uiddai ex una vallium Gabasi; yet the Vulgar, and Katablus, read Giddai of the river of Gaas. Also in this tribe they place the river of Carith, by which the prophet Elias abode during the great drought, where he was ^d fed by the ravens: and after that the river was dried up, he travelled (by the spirit of God) towards Sidon, where he was relieved by the poor widow of Zarepta, whose dead son he revived, and increas'd her pittance of meal and oil, whereby she sustained her life.

SECT. II.

Of the kings of the ten tribes, from Jeroboam to Achab.

OF the first kings of Israel, I omit in this place to speak, and reserve it to the catalogue of the kings of Judab; of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the kings of the ten tribes; but briefly, beginning after the division from Judab, and Benjamin, now it followeth to speak. The first of these kings was Jeroboam the son of Nebat, an Ephrathite of Zereda; who being a man of strength and courage, was by Solomon made overseer of the buildings of the Millo or munition of Jerusalem, for as much as belong'd to the charge of the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, and so many of them as wrought in those works. During which time, as he went from Jerusalem, he encountred the prophet Abijah; who made him know that he was by God destined to be king of Israel, and to command ten of the twelve tribes. After this, fearing that those things might come to Solomon's knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shishak, whom Eusebius calleth Osochores, whose daughter he married: the predecessor of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertain Adad the Idumean, when he was carried young into Egypt from the fury of David, and his captain Joab; which Adad, the king of Egypt married to his wife's sister Tapbnes; using both him and Jeroboam as instruments to shake the kingdom of Judea, that himself might the easilier spoil it, as he did: for in the fifth year of Rehoboam, Shishak sack'd the city of Jerusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of David and Solomon, and all the spoils which David took from Adadezer of Soba, with the presents of Tobu king of Hamath, which were of an inestimable value.

This Jeroboam, after the death of Solomon, became lord of the ten tribes: and tho' he were permitted by God to govern the Israelites, and from a mean man exalted to that state: yet preferring the policies of the world, before the service and honour of God (as fearing that if the tribes under his rule should repair to Jerusalem to do their usual sacrifices, they might be drawn from him by degrees) he erected two golden calves, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, saith ¹ St. Ambrose, or rather of Aaron's calf in Horeb;) further, he made election of his priests out of the basest and unlearned people. This king made his chief seat and palace at Sichem: he despised the warning of the Judean prophet, whom Josephus calleth Adon, and Glycas, Joel: his hand thereafter withered, and was again restored; but continuing in his idolatry, and hardened, upon occasion that the prophet returning was slain by a lion, Abijah makes him know, that God purposed to root out his posterity.

He was afterward overthrown by ⁸ Abia king of Judab, and died, after he had governed 22 years; whom Nadab his son succeeded: who in the second year of his reign, together with all the race of Jeroboam, was slain, and rooted by Baasba, who reigned in his stead; so Nadab lived king but two years.

Baasba the son of Abijah, the third king after the partition, made war with Asa king of Judab: he seated himself in Thersa, and fortified Rama against Judab, to restrain their excursions. Hereupon Aſa entertained Benbadad of Damaſcus againſt him, who invaded Nephtalim, and deſtroyed many places therein: the mean while Aſa carried away the materials, with which Baaſha intended to fortify Rama; but being an idolater, he was threatned by Jehu the prophet, that it ſhould befall his race, as it did to ^a Jeroboam; which afterwards came to paſs. He ruled twenty-four years, and died.

To Baaſha ſucceeded Ela his ſon, who at a feaſt at his palace of Therſa, was in his cups ſlain by Zambris, after he had reigned two years: and in him the prophecy of Jehu was fulfilled.

Zambris ſucceeded Ela, and aſſumed the name of a king ſeven days: but Ambris in revenge of the king's murder, ſet upon ^b Zambris, or Zimri; and incloſed him in Therſa, and forced him to burn himſelf.

Ambris, or Homri, ſucceeded Ela, and transferred the regal ſeat from Therſa to Samaria, which he bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This ^c Ambris was alſo an idolater, no leſs impious than the reſt; and therefore ſubjected to Tabremmon king of Syria; the father of Benbadad, according to Eusebius, Nicephorus, and Zonaras. But how this ſhould ſtand, I do not well conceive; ſeeing Benbadad the ſon of Tabremmon, was invited by ^d Aſa king of Juda, to aſſail Baaſha king of Iſrael, the father of Ela who forewent Ambris. This Ambris reigned 12 years, 6 in Therſa, and 6 in Samaria, and left two children, Achab, and Athalia.

SECT. III.

Of Achab and his ſucceſſors, with the captivity of the ten tribes.

A Chab, or Ahab, ſucceeded Omri, who not only upheld the idolatry of Jeroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians; but he married Jezabel the Zidonian; and as Jeroboam followed the religion of his Egyptian wife: ſo did Achab of his Zidonian; and erected an altar and a grove to Baal in Samaria. He ſuffered Jezabel to kill the prophets of the moſt high God. God ſent famine on the land of Iſrael. Achab met Elias; Elias prevailed in the trial of the ſacrifice, and killeth the falſe prophets, and afterwards ſlieth for fear of Jezabel.

Benbadad, not long after, beſieged Samaria; and taken by Achab, was by him ſet at liberty: for which the prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michæas) reproveh him: afterwards he cauſed Naboth, by a falſe accusation, to be ſtoned. Then joining with Joſaphat in the war for the recovery of Ramoth; he was ſlain, as Michæas had foretold him.

He had 3 ſons named in the ſcripture, Ochozias, Joram, and Joas; beſides 70 other ſons by ſundry wives and concubins.

Ochozias ſucceeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: he bruised himſelf by a fall; he ſent for counſel to ^e Beelzebub the god of Chabaron. Elijab the prophet meeteth the meſſenger on the way; and miſliking that Ochozias ſought help from that dead idol, asked the meſſenger, if there were not a God in Iſrael? Ochozias ſendeth 2 captains, and with each 50 ſoldiers to bring Elijab unto him; both which, with their attendants, were conſumed with fire. The 3d captain beſought mercy at Elijab's hands, and he ſpared him, and went with him to the king; avowing it to the king that he muſt then die: which came to paſs in the 2d year of his reign.

Joram, the brother of Ochozias by Jezabel, ſucceeded: he allured Joſaphat king of Juda, and the king of Edom, to aſſiſt him againſt the Moabites, who reſuſed to pay him the tribute of 20000 ſheep. The 3 kings wanted water for themſelves and their horſes in the deſerts. The prophet Eliſha cauſeth the ditches to flow. The ^f Moabites are overthrown; their king ſlieth to Kirharafeth; and being beſieged, according to ſome expoſitors, burnt his ſon on the walls as a ſacrifice, whereat the three kings, moved with compaſſion, returned and left Moab, waſting and ſpoiling that region. Others, as it ſeems with better reaſon, underſtand the text to ſpeak of the ſon of the king of Edom, whom they ſuppoſe in this irruption to have been taken priſoner by the Moabites, and that the king of Moab ſhewed him over the walls, threatning, unleſs the ſiege were diſſolved, that he would offer him in ſacrifice to his Gods. Whereupon the king of Edom beſought thoſe of Juda and Iſrael, to break off the ſiege for the ſafety of his ſon: which when the other kings reſuſed to yield unto, and that Moab, according to his former threatning, had burnt the king of Edom's ſon upon the rampire, that all the aſſailants might diſcern it: the king of Edom being by this ſad ſpectacle enraged, forſook the party of the other kings; for want of whoſe aſſiſtance the ſiege was broken up.

After this the king of Aram ſent to Joram, to heal Naaman the captain of his army of the leproſy. The answer of Joram was; am I God to kill, and to give life, that he doth ſend to heal a man from his leproſy? adding, that the Aramite fought but matter of quarrel againſt him. Eliſha hearing thereof, willed the king to ſend Naaman to him; promiſing that he ſhould know that there was a prophet in Iſrael; and ſo Naaman was healed, by waſhing himſelf ſeven times in Jordan. Eliſha reſuſed the gifts of Naaman. But his ſervant Gebazi accepted a part thereof; from whence the tellers of ſpiritual gifts are called Gebazites, as the buyers are ^g Simonians, of Simon Magus.

Afterwards Benbadad, king of Aram or Damaſcus, having heard that this prophet did diſcover to the king of Iſrael whatſoever the Aramite conſulted in his moſt ſecret council, ſent a troop of horſe to take Eliſha: all whom Eliſha ſtruck blind, and brought them captives into Samaria; Joram then asked leave of the prophet to ſlay them; Eliſha forbade him to harm them, but cauſed them to be fed, and ſent back to their own prince in ſafety.

The king of Aram, notwithstanding theſe benefits, did again attempt Samaria; and brought the citizens to extream famine. Joram imputeth the cauſe thereof to the prophet Eliſha. Eliſha, by prayer, cauſed a noiſe of chariots and armour to ſound in the air, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the ſiege; an act of great admiration, as the ſame is written in ^h 2 Kings vii. After this, when Azael obtained the kingdom of Syria by the death of his maſter; Joram entring upon his frontier, took Ramoth Gilead; in which war he received divers wounds, and returned to Jezrael to be cured. But whiſt he lay there, Jehu (who commanded the army of Joram in Gilead, was anointed king by one of the children of the prophets ſent by Eliſha) ſurprized and ſlew both him and all that belonged unto him, rooting out the whole poſterity of Ahab.

Jehu, who reigned after Jehoram, deſtroyed not only the race of his foregoers, but alſo their religion; for which he received a promiſe from God, That his ſeed ſhould occupy the throne unto the 4th generation. Yet he upheld the idolatry of Jeroboam, for which he was plagued with grievous war, wherein he was beaten by Hazael the Aramite, who spoiled all the countries to the east of Jordan; in which war he was slain (saith Cedrenus) whereof the scriptures are silent. Jehu reigned 28 years.

Joachaz, or Jeboahaz, the son of Jehu, succeeded his father, whom Azael and his son Benhadad often invaded, and in the end subjected, leaving him only 50 horse, 20 chariots, and 10000 foot; and as it is written in ^a the scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Joachaz reigned 17 years.

After Joachaz, Joas's son governed Israel; who, when he repaired to Elisha the prophet, as he lay on his death-bed, the prophet promised him three victories over the Aramites: and first commanded him to lay his hand on his bow; and Elisha covered the king's hands with his, and bad him open the window westward (which was towards Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence-out. He again willed him to beat the ground with his arrows, who smote it thrice, and ceased. The prophet then told him, that he should have smitten five or six times; and then he should have had so many victories over the Aramites as he gave strokes. And so it succeeded with Joas, who overthrew the Aramites in three battles, and recovered the cities and territory from Benhadad the son of Azael, which his father Joachaz had lost. He also overthrew ^b Amazia king of Juda, who provoked him to make the war; whereupon he entred Jerusalem, and sacked it, with the temple. This Joas reigned 16 years, and died; in whose time also the prophet Elisha exchanged this life for a better.

Jeroboam, the third from Jehu, followed Joas his father, an idolater as his predecessors: but he recovered all the rest of the land belonging to Israel, from Hamath, which is near Libanus, to the Dead sea, and reigned 41 years.

Zacharias, the fourth and last of the house of Jehu, slain by Shallum his vassal, who reigned in his stead, governed six months. Shallum held the kingdom but one month, being slaughter'd by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menahem, who took revenge of Shallum, used great cruelty to those that did not acknowledge him; ripping up the bellies of those that were with child. This Menahem being invaded by Phul, bought his peace with 10000 talents of silver; which he exacted by a tribute of 50 sheckles for every man of wealth in Israel. Menahem governed 20 years.

Pekahiah, or Phaceia, or, after Zonaras, Phacefia, succeeded; and after he had ruled two years, he was slain by Phaca, or Pekab, the commander of his army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekab's time, Phulassar, or Tiglat-Phylassar, invaded the kingdom of Israel, and won Ijon, Abel-Bethmaaca, Janoah, Kedesb, Hasor, and Gilead, with all the cities of Galilee, ^d carrying them captives into Affyria: he was drawn in by Achas king of Judah, against Pekab and Rezin, the last of the Adades. For Achas being wasted by Pekab of Israel, and by Rezin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the church riches, and therewith engaged the Affyrian, who first suppressed the monarchy of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel; and this inviting of the great Affyrian, was the utter ruin of both states, of Israel and of Judah. Pekab reigned 20 years.

Then Hoshea, or Osea, who slew Pekab, became the vassal of Salmanassar; but hoping to shake off the Affyrian yoke, he sought aid from So, or Sua, or Sabicus king of Egypt: which being known to the Affyrian, he cast him into prison, besieged Samaria, and mastered it; carried the ten idolatrous tribes into Nineveh in Affyria, and into Rages in Media, and into other eastern regions, and there dispersed them: and replanted Samaria with divers nations, and chiefly with the Cuthæ (inhabiting about Cutha a river in Persia, or rather in ^e Arabia Deserta) and with the people Catanei bounding upon Syria, and with those of Sepharvajim (a people of Sephar in Mesopotamia upon Euphrates, of whose conquest Senacherib vaunteth) also with those of Ava; which were of the ancient Avins, who inhabited the land of the Philistines in Abraham's time, dwelling near unto Gaza, whom the Caphtorims rooted out; and at this time they were of Arabia the desert, called Havai; willing to return to their ancient seats. To these he added those of Chamath or Iturea, the ancient enemies of the Israelites, and sometimes the vassals of the Adads of Damascus, which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Affyrian advise himself better than the Romans did: for after Titus and Vespasian had wasted the cities of Judea and Jerusalem, they carried the people away captive; but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their own thin garrisons, which soon decayed: and thereby they gave that dangerous entrance to the Brabians and Saracens, who never could be driven thence again to this day.

And this transmigration, plantation, and displantation, happened in the year of the world 3292, the 6th year of Ezekiah, king of Judah; and the 9th of Hosea the last king of Israel.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Judah, Reuben, Gad, and the other half of Manasseh.

SECT. I.

Of Dan, whereof Joppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other towns.

NOW following the coast of the Mediterranean sea, that portion of land assigned to the tribe of Dan, joineth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which family there were num-bred at mount Sinai, 62700 fighting men, all which leaving their bodies with the rest in the deserts, there entered the holy land of their sons 66400 bearing arms. The first famous city in this tribe on the sea coast was Joppe, or Japho, as in Joshua xix. 46. one of the most ancient of the world, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the port of Jerusalem. From hence Jonas embarked himself when he fled from the service of God, towards Tharsis in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this city received many changes: and while Judas Macchabæus governed the Jews, the Syrians that were garrisoned in Joppe, having their fleet in the port, invited 200 principal citizens aboard them, and cast them all into the sea: which Judas revenged by firing their fleet, and putting the companies which sought to escape to the sword.

It was twice taken by the Romans, and by Cestius the lieutenant utterly burnt and ruined. But in the year of Christ 1250, Lodowick the French king gave it new walls and towers: it is now the Turks, and called Jaffa. There are certain rocks in that port, whereunto it is reported that Andromeda was fastned with chains, and thence delivered from the sea-monster by Persæus. This fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Josephus, Solinus, and Pliny. Marcus Scaurus, during his office of Edileship, shewed the bones of this monster to the people of Rome. St. Jerome upon Jonas speaks of it indifferently.

The next unto Joppe was Jamnia, where Judas Macchabæus burnt the rest of the Syrian fleet: the fire and flame whereof was seen at Jerusalem, 240 furlongs off. It had sometimes a bishop's seat, saith Will. of Tyre; but there is no sign of it at this time that such a place there was.

After Jamnia, is the city of Geth or Gath, sometime Anthedon, saith Volaterran. And so Montanus, fol. 244. seems to understand it. For he sets it next to Egypt, of all the Philistine cities, and in the place of Anthedon. But Volaterran gives neither reason nor authority for his opinion; for Ptolemy sets Anthedon far to the south of Joppe: and Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the north) of all the great cities of the Philistines: and about 16 miles from Joppe, where St. Jerome in his time found a great village of the same name. It was sometime the habitation and seminary of the Anakims: strong and giant-like men, whom Joshua could not expel, nor the Danites after him; nor any of the Israelites, till David's time: who slew Goliath, as his captains did divers others, not much inferiour in strength and stature unto Goliath.

Rehoboam the son of Solomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the son of Amaziah destroyed it again. It was also laid waste by Azazel king of Syria. Fulk, the 4th king of Jerusalem, built a castle in the same place out of the old ruins. Whether this Geth was the same that Will. of Tyre in the holy war calls Ibithin, I much doubt; the error growing by taking Geth for Anthedon.

Not far from Geth, or Gath, standeth Bethsemes, or the house of the Sun. In the fields adjoining to this city (as is thought) was the ark of God brought by a yoke of two kine, turned loose by the Philistines: and the Bethsemites presuming to look therein, there were slain of the elders 70, and of the people 50000, by the ordinance of God. After which slaughter, and the great lamentation of the people, it was called the great Abel, saith St. Jerome. Benedictus Theologus finds three other cities of this name; one in Nephtalim, another in Juda; and another in Issachar; Jerome finds a fifth in Benjamin.

Keeping the sea-coast, the strong city of Accaron offereth it self, sometimes one of the five satrapies, or governments of the Philistines. St. Jerome makes it the same with Cæsaria Palestine. Pliny confounds it with Apollonia: it was one of those that defended it self against the Danites and Judeans. It worshipped Beelzebub the god of hornets or flies. To which idol it was that Abaziab king of Israel sent to enquire of his health: whose messengers Elijah meeting by the way, caused them to return, with a sorrowful answer to their master. This city is remembered in many places of scripture.

Christianus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron, or Ekron. This Azotus, or Asdod, was also an habitation of the Anakims, whom Joshua failed to destroy, tho' he once possess'd their city. Herein stood a sumptuous temple, dedicated to the idol Dagon: the same idol which fell twice to the ground of it self, after the ark of God was by the Philistines carried into their temple: and in the second fall it was utterly broken and defaced. Near it was that famous Judas Macchabæus slain by Bacchides and Alcimus, the lieutenants of Demetrius. Afterwards it was taken by Jonathan: and the rest of the citizens being put to the sword, all that fled into the temple of Dagon were, with their idol, therein consumed with fire: near which also he overthrew Apollonius.

Gabinus the Roman rebuilt it. It had a bishop's seat while Christianity flourished in those parts. But in St. Jerome's time it was yet a fair village. And this was the last of the sea-towns within the tribe of Dan.

The cities which are within the land east-ward from Azotus, and beyond the fountain of Ethiopia, wherein Philip the apostle baptized the eunuch, are Tzorab, or Sarara, and Ejlbaol, and between them Castra Danis near Hebron: tho' this place where Sampson was born, may seem by the words, Judg. xviii. 12. to be in the tribe of Judah, as the other also were bordering towns between Dan and Juda.

After these, within the bounds of Juda, but belonging to the Danites, they find Gedor: or, as it is, 1 Macc. xv. Gedron, which Cendebeus the lieutenant of Antiochus, fortified against the Jews, and near which himself was by the Maccabees overthrown.

Then Modin, the native city of the Maccabees; and wherein they were buried, on whose sepulcher the 7 marble pillars, which were erected of that height, as they served for a mark to the seamen, remained many hundreds of years after their first setting up, as Brochard and Breidenbach witness.

There are, besides these, the city of Carathbairim, that is, the city of the woods: seated in the border of Juda, Benjamin, and Dan, wherein the ark of God remained 20 years in the house of Aminadab; till such time as David carried it thence to Jerusalem: of this place (as they say) was Zacharias the son of Barachias, or Jehoida, who was slain between the temple and the altar: also Urias, whom Joachim king of Jerusalem slaughtered, as we find in Jeremy. Many other places which they place in this tribe, rather as I take it upon presumption than warrant, I omit: as that of Caspin, taken with great slaughter by Judas Macchabæus: and Iachis, whose king was slain by Joshua, in which also Amazias was slain: the same which Senacherib took, Ezechias reigning in Juda.

Of other cities belonging to this tribe, see in Joshua xix. from the 41st verse, where also it is added, that the Danites portion was too little for their number of families: and therefore that they invaded Leshem, and inhabited it: which city, after amplified by Philip the brother of Herod Antippos, was called Cæsarea Philippi, as before, and made the metropolis of Ituræa, and Trachonitis: of which coasts this Philip was tetrarch: but of this city see more in Nephtalim. In this tribe there are no mountains of fame.

It hath two rivers or torrents: the northermost riseth out of the mountains of Juda: and passing by Modin, falleth into the sea by Sachrona.^b The other hath the name of Sorek, or Sored, whose banks are plentiful of vines, which have no seeds or stones: the wine they yield is red, of excellent colour, taste, and favour, &c. In this valley of Sorek, so called from the river, inhabited Dalila whom Sampson loved.

SECT. II.

The tribe of Simcon.

THE tribe of Simeon takes up the rest of the sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Egypt; who being the second son of Jacob by Lea, there were increased of that family, while they abode in Egypt, as they were numbred at mount Sinai, 59300 able men; all which ending their lives in the deserts, there entered the land of promise of their issues 22200 bearing arms, who were^c in part mixed with Juda, and in part severed, inhabiting a small territory on the sea-coast, belonging to Edumæa; of which the first city adjoining to Dan, was Ascalon.

The Reguli, or petty kings thereof, were called Ascalonites; of which^d Volaterran out of Xanthus, in the history of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Ascalus were the sons of Hymenæus: and that Ascalus being employ'd by Aciamus king of the Lydians, with an army in Syria, falling in love with a young woman of that country, built this city, and called it after his own name: the same hath Nicolaus in his history, saith Volaterran.

Diodorus Siculus, in his third book, remembreth a lake near Ascalon, wherein there hath been a temple dedicated to Derceto the goddess of the Syrians; having the face of a woman, and the body of a fish: who, as I have said before, in the story of Ninus, was the mother of Semiramis, feigned to be cast into this lake, and fed and relieved by doves. And therefore was the dove worshipped, both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the poet:

Alba Palestina sancta columba Syro.

The white dove is for holy held, in Syria-Palestine.

It was one of the chiefest and strongest cities of the Philistines. It bred many learned men (^e saith Volaterran) as Antiochus, Sofus, Cygnus, Dorotheus the historian, and Antemidorus who wrote the story of Bithynia.

In Ascalon, as some say, was that wicked Herod born, that seeking after our Saviour; caused all the male-children, of two years old and under, to be slain. In the Christian times it had a bishop, and after that, when it was by the Saladine defaced, Richard king of England, while he made war in the holy land, gave it a new wall, and many buildings. ^f Ejus muros cum Saladinus diruisset, Richardus Anglorum rex instauravit, saith Adrichomius.

In David's time it was one of the most renowned cities of the Philistines; for he nameth Gath and Ascalon only, when he lamenteth the death of Saul, and Jonathan; not speaking of the other three. ^g Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streets of Ascalon; it is now called Scalone. Gabinus restored it, as he did Azotus and Gaza.

Next to Ascalon stood Gaza, or Gazera, which the Hebrews call Hazza; the Syrians, Azon, of Azonus (as they say) the son of Hercules. Other prophane writers affirm, that it was built by Jupiter. Pomp. Mela gives the building thereof to Cambyfes the Persian, because belike he rebuilt it; and Gaza in the Persian tongue, is as much as to say, treasure. This^h Gaza was the first of the satrapies of the Philistines, and the south bound of the land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this city was far more ancient than Cambyfes, as it is proved by many scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb; but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time asⁱ Alexander Macedon invaded the empire of Persia, it received a garrison for Darius: in despite whereof, it was, by the Macedonians, after a long siege, demolished, and was called Gaza of the desert.

^k Alexander Janneus king of the Jews surprised it, and slew 500 senators in the temple of Apollo, which fled thither for sanctuary; but this Gaza was not set up in the same place again, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had overturned, but somewhat nearer the sea side; tho' the other was but two miles off. It was a town of great account in the time of the Maccabees, and gave many wounds to the Jews, till it was forced by Simon: of which he made so great account, as that he purposed to reside therein himself; and in his absence, left John his son and successor to be governor. In ^l Brochard's time it was still a goodly city, and known by the name of Gazara.

At the very out-let of the river Bezor, standeth Majoma the port of Gaza: to which the privilege of a city was given by the great Constantine; and the place called Constance after the name of the emperor's son. ^m But Julian the apostate, soon after favouring the Gazeans, made it subject unto them, and commanded it to be called Gaza Maritima.

On the other side of ⁿ Bezor, standeth Antbedon, defaced by Alexander Janneus, restored by Herod, and called Agrippias, after the name of Agrippa, the favourite of Augustus.

Then ^o Raphia, where Philopater overthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whose torrent is known in the scriptures by the name of the torrent of Egypt, till the Septuagint converted it Rinocura; to difference it, Isaiab xxvii. 12. giving the name of the city to the torrent that wattereth it.

Pliny calls it Rhinocolura; and Josephus, Rhinocorura.

^p Epiphanius reports it as a tradition, that at this place the world was divided by lots, between the three sons of Noah.

Gen. 10. 19.

Within the land, and upon the river of Besor, they place Gerar; which the scripture placeth between Kadesh and Shur, Gen. xx. 1. That it was near to the wilderness of Beerseba, it appears, Gen. xx. 31. and therefore no marvel that as elsewhere Beerseba, so sometimes Gerar; be made the south bound of Canaan. It was of old a distinct kingdom from the Philistine satrapies, the kings by one common name were called Abimelechs: St. Jerome saith, that afterwards it was called Regio salutaris; The health county: so that it was no marvel that Abraham and Isaac lived much in these parts. Of king Ashur's conquest of the cities about Gerar, see 2 Chron. xiv. 14.

More within the land was ^a*Siceleg*, or Tsiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites; when David, in his flying from Saul to the Philistines, had left his carriages there; but David followed them over the river of Besor, and put them to the slaughter, and recovered the prey.

Next ^b*Dabir*, sometime Cariatb-Sepher, the city of letters, the university, as they say, or academy of old Palestine. In St. Jerome's time it seems it had the name of Daema: Joshua xv. 49. it is called Urbs Sannæ, from the name, as it seems, of some of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Urbs Arbabi. For even hence also were these giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by ^c*Othoniel*, encouraged by Caleb's promise of his daughter in marriage: but that Joshua and the host of Israel were at the surprise, it appears Joshua x. 39. This city, Josh. xxi. 15. is named among those, which out of Simeon and Juda, were given to the Levites. And hence it seems they attribute it to this tribe.

Besides these, there are many others in the tribe of Simeon, but of less fame; as Haij, of which Joshua xix. 7. which also Joshua xxi. 16. is reckoned for one of the cities of the Levites, given out of the portion of Juda and Simeon (for which Junius thinks Hasbam is named 1 Chron. vi. 59. tho' ^d in the place of Joshua these two are distinguished) also Tholad so named, 1 Chron. iv. 29. for which Josh. xix. 4. we have Eltholad. Chatzar-Susa, so named, Josh. xix. 5. for which Josh. xv. 1. we have Chatzar-Gadda, both names agreeing in signification; for Gadda, is Turma, and Susa, Equitatus.

In the same places of Joshua, and of the Chronicles, Chorma is named; which they think to be the same with that of which Numb. xiv. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites pursued the Israelites. But that Chorma cannot be in Simeon, nor within the mountains of Edumea. For Israel fled not that way, but back again to the camp, which lay to the south of ^e*Edumea*, in the desert.

The same places also name Beerseba in this tribe; so called of the oath between ^f*Abraham* and Abimelech; near unto which Hagar wandred with her son Ismael.

It was also called the city of Isaac, because he dwelt long there.

While the Christians held the holy land, they laboured much to strengthen this place, standing on the border of the Arabian desert, and in the south bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin.

The other cities of Simeon, which are named in the places of Joshua, and of the Chronicles, above noted, because they help us nothing in story, I omit them.

In the time of Ezekiah king of Juda, certain of this tribe being streightned in their own territories, passed to ^g*Gedor*, as it is 1 Chron. iv. 39. (the same place which Josh. xv. 36. is called Gedera and Gederothaima) which at that time was inhabited by the issue of Cham; where they seated themselves: as also 500 others of this tribe, destroyed the reliques of Amalek in the mountains of Edom, and dwelt in their places.

The mountains within this tribe are few, and that of Sampson the chiefest; unto which he carried the gate-post of Gaza. The rivers are Besor, and the torrent of Egypt called Shichar, as is noted in Affer.

SECT. III.

The tribe of Juda.

OF Juda, the 4th son of Jacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600; all which (Caleb excepted) perished in the deserts. And of their sons, there entered the land of Canaan 76500 bearing arms. Agreeable to the greatness of this number, was the greatest territory given, called afterwards Judea; within the bounds whereof, were the portions allotted to Dan, and Simeon included.

And many cities named in those tribes, did first, as they say, belong unto the children of Juda, who had a kind of sovereignty over them; as Succoth, Cariattharim; Lachis, Bethsemes, Tsiglag, Beerseba, and others.

The multitude of people within this small province (if it be meted by that ground given to this tribe only) were incredible, if the witness of the scriptures had not warranted the report. For when David numbred the people, they were found 500000 fighting men.

The cities of Juda were many: but I will remember the chiefest of them; beginning with Arad, or Horma, which standeth in the entrance of Judea from Idumea: whose king first surprised the Israelites, as they pass'd by the border of ^h*Canaan* towards Moab; and took from them some spoils, and many prisoners: who being afterwards overthrown by the Israelites, the sons of Keni, the kinsmen of Moses, obtained a possession in that territory; who before the coming of the Israelites, dwelt between Madian and Amalek.

Following this frontier towards Idumea and the south, ⁱ*Ascensus Scorpionis*, or Acrabbim is placed, the next to Arad; so called, because of scorpions which are said to be in that place: from which name of Acrabbim, Jerome thinks that the name of the toparchy, called Acrabathena, was denominated; of which we have spoken in Manasses.

On the south side also of Judea, they place the cities of Jagur, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Ashna, Yethnam, and Afor, or Chatfor, most of them frontier towns.

And then Ziph: of which there are two places so called: one besides this in the body of Juda, of which the desert and Forrest adjoining took name; where David hid himself from Saul.

After these are the cities of Ezion, Adar, Karkab, and Asemona, or Hatmon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumea, towards the north, we find the cities of Danna, Shemah, Amam, the other Afor, or Chatfor, Behaloth, and the two Socchoes: of all which, see Josh. xv. 25. also Cariath, by Josh. xv. 25. called Kerioth: whence Judas the traitor was called Is-cariath, as it were a man of Cariath. Then ^k*Hetham* the abode of Sampson, which Rehoboth re-edified. Beyond these, towards the north-border, and towards Eleutheropolis, is the city of ^a*Jetbar*, or Jatbir, belonging to the Levites. In ^bSt. Jerome's time it was called Jetbira, and inhabited altogether with Christians: near unto this city was that remarkable battel fought betwixt Asa king of Juda, and Zara king of the Arabians, who brought into the field a million of fighting men; and was notwithstanding beaten and put to flight: Asa following the victory as far as Gerar, which at the same time he recovered.

^a 1 Sam. 30. ^b Joseph. 10. 11. 12. ^c Josh. 11. 21. ^d And also 1 Chron. 4. 32. ^e Deut. 1. ^f Gen. 21. 31. ^g As it seems in the land of Juda. See in the first paragraph of this chapter, in the cities of Dan. Judg. 16. 3. ^h Numb. 21. 3. Josh. 12. 14. Judg. 1. 16. ⁱ Numb. 34. 3. Deut. 8. 15. ^k Judg. 15. 8. 1 Chron. 11. 6. Jun. out of the 1 Chron. 4. 32. notes, that this Hetham, tho' it were within the bounds of Juda, belonged to Simeon.

Not far from Jetbar, standeth Jarmuth, whose king was slain by Joshua, and the city overturned. Next unto it is Maresa, the native city of the prophet Micha: between it and Odolla, ^c*Judas Macchabeus* overthrew Gorgias; and sent thence 10000 drachmas of silver to be offered for sacrifice.

^d*Odolla*, or Hadullam it self, was an ancient and magnificent city, taken by Joshua, and the king thereof slain. Jonathan Macchabeus beatified it greatly. Then ^e*Ceila*, or Keila, afterwards Echela, where David sometime hid himself, and which afterwards he delivered from the assaults of the Philistines: near which the prophet Abacuc was buried; whose monument remained, and was seen by St. Jerome.

Near it is Hebron, sometime called the city of Arbah, for which the Vulgar hath Cariatbarbe: the reason of this name they give, as if it signified the city of four; because the four patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were therein buried; but of Adam it is but supposed; and it is plain by the places, Josh. xiv. 14. and xv. 13. and xx. 11. that Arbah here doth not signify four, but that it was the name of the father of the giants, called Anakim, whose son, as it seems, Anak was: and Achim, Sheshai, and Talmi (whom Caleb expelled, Josh. xv.) were the sons of this Anak, Numb. xiii. 23. The name of Anak signifieth torquem, a chain worth for ornament: and it seems that this Anak, enriched by the spoils which himself and his father got, wore a chain of gold, and so got this name: and leaving the custom to his posterity, left also the name: so that in Latin the name of Anakim, may not amiss be expounded by Torquati.

The city Hebron was one of the ancientest cities of Canaan; built 7 years before Tfoan, or Tanis in Egypt: and it was the head and chief city of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part given; to wit, the villages adjoining, and the rest to the Levites. It had a bishop in the Christian times, and a magnificent temple built by Helen the mother of Constantine.

Not far hence they find Eleutheropolis, or the free city, remembred often by St. Jerome. Then Eglon, whose king Dahir associated, with the other four kings of the Amorites, to wit, of ^f*Jerusalem*, Hebron, Jarmuth, and Lachis, besieging the Gibeonites, were by Joshua utterly overthrown. From hence the next city of fame was Emaus, afterwards Nicopolis, one of the cities of government, or presidencies of Judea. In the sight of this city, ^g*Judas Macchabeus* (after he had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Seron) gave a third overthrow to Gorgias lieutenant to Antiochus.

In the year 1301, it was overturned by an earthquake, saith ^h*Eusebius*. In the Christian times it had a bishop's seat, of the diocese of Cæsaria of Palestine.

From Emaus towards the west sea there are the cities of Nabama, Bethdagon, and Gader, or Gedera, or Gederothaima, of which, and of Gederoth, ⁱ*Josh. xv. 36, 41.* Then Azecha, to which Joshua followed the slaughter of the five kings before named, a city of great strength in the valley of ^k*Terebinth* or Turpentine: as the Vulgar readeth, ^l*Sam. xvii. 2.* whence (as it seems) they seat it near unto Soco, and unto Lebna of the Levites. It revolted from the subjection of the Jews, while Joram the son of Josaphat ruled in Jerusalem: and next unto this standeth Maceda, which Joshua utterly dispeopled.

On the other side of Emaus, towards the east, standeth Bethsur, otherwise Bethsora, and Bethfor; one of the strongest, and most sought for places in all Juda: it is seated on a high hill; and therefore called Bethsur (the house on the rock, or of strength.) It was fortified by Rehoboam, and afterwards by ^m*Judas Macchabeus*. Lyfias forced it, and Antiochus Eupator by famine: Jonathan regained it: and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified against the Syrian kings.

ⁿ*Bethlehem* is next unto it within six miles of Jerusalem, otherwise Lehem, sometime Ephrata; which name, they say, it had of Caleb's wife, when as it is so called by Moses before Caleb was famous in those parts, Gen. xxxviii. 16. Of this city was Abeſſan, or Ibzan, Judge of Israel, after Jephthah, famous for the thirty sons, and thirty daughters, begotten by him. Elimelec was also a Bethlemite, who with his wife Naomi sojourned in Moab during the famine of Juda, in the time of the Judges, with whom ^o*Ruth*, the daughter-in-law of Naomi returned to Bethlehem, and married Boaz, of whom Obed, of whom Ishai, of whom David. It had also the honour to be the native city of our Saviour Jesus Christ: and therefore shall the memory thereof never end.

^pIn Zabulon of Galilee there was also a city of the same name; and therefore was this of our Saviour called Bethlehem Juda.

From Bethlehem, some four or five miles, standeth Thecua, the city of ^q*Amos* the prophet: and to this place adjoining is the city of Bethzacaria, in the way between Bethsura and Jerusalem; on whose hills adjoining the glorious gilt shields of Antiochus shined like lamps of fire in the eyes of the Jews. The city of ^r*Rezek* was also near unto Bethlehem, which also Adoni-bezec commanded; who had, during his reign, tortured seventy kings, by cutting off the joints of their fingers and toes, and made them gather bread under his table: but at length the same end befel himself by the sons of Juda, after they had taken him prisoner.

The rest of the cities in this part (most of them of no great estimation) we may pass by, until we come to the magnificent castle of Herodium, which Herod erected on a hill, mounting thereunto with 200 marble steps, exceeding beautiful and strong. ^sAnd towards the Dead sea, and adjoining to the desert of Jeruel, between it and Tekoa, is that Clivus floridus, where in the time of ^t*Jehosaphat*, the Jews stood and looked on the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, massacring one another, when they had purposed to join against Juda; near which place is the valley of blessing, where the Jews the fourth day after solemnly came and blessed God for so strange deliverance.

Now the cities of ^a Judah which border the Dead sea, are these; Aduran beautified by Rehoboum, and Tsohar, which the Vulgar calleth ^b Segor; so called, because Lot in his prayer for it, urged that it was but a little one; whence it was called Tsohar, which signifieth a little one; when as the old name was Belab, as it is Gen. xiv. 2. In the Romans time it had a garison, and was called, as they say, Pannier: In Jerome's time Balexona. The Engaddi, or Hengaddi, first Asasenthamar; near unto which are the gardens of Balsamum, the best that the world had called Opobalsamum: the most part of all which trees, Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, sent for out of Judea; and Herod, who either feared or loved Anthony her husband, caused them to be rooted up, and presented unto her; which she replanted near Heliopolis in Egypt. This city was first taken by Chedorlaomer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the most remarkable cities of Judea, and one of the presidencies thereof.

The rest of the cities are many in the in-land, and among them ^d Jezrael; not that which was the city of Naboth, of which already; but another of the same name, the city of Achinoan, the wife of David, the mother of that Ammon, whom Abolom slew: also, as some think, the city of ^e Amasa, Abalom's lieutenant, and the commander of his army. But this seemeth to be an error, grounded upon the nearness of the words, Israel and Jezrael: and because ² Sam. xvii. 25. Amasa's father is called a Jezraelite, who ¹ Chron. ii. 17. is called an Ishmaelite: indeed the Hebrew orthography sheweth, that Amasa's father is not said to be of the city Jezrael, but an Israelite in religion, tho' otherwise an Ishmaelite.

In this tribe were many high hills, or mountains, as those of Engaddi upon the Dead sea, and the mountains of Judah, which begin to rise by Emaus, and end near Taphna; and these part Judah from Dan and Simeon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron: at the foot whereof was that oak of Mamre, where the three angels appeared to Abraham, which ¹ St. Jerome calleth a fir-tree; and saith, that it stood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that mountain, called Collis Achillæ, on the south side of Ziph; on the top whereof the great Herod, inclosing the old castle, erected by Jonathan Maccabeus, and called it Massada, garnished it with seven and twenty high and strong towers; and therein left armour and furniture for an hundred thousand men, being, as it seemeth, a place inaccessible, and of incomparable strength.

In the valley afterward called the Dead sea, or the lake Asphaltitis: this country had four cities, Adama, Sodom, Sebaim, and Gomorra, destroyed with fire from heaven for their unnatural sins.

S E C T. IV.

The Tribe of REUBEN, and his borderers.

† I.

The seats and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites won from Sehon, king of Heshbon.

ON the other side of the Dead sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacob's sons inhabited, of whose children there were numbred at mount Sinai, forty six thousand, who dying with the rest in the deserts, there remained to possess the land forty three thousand seven hundred bearing arms. But before we speak of these or the rest that inhabited the east-side of Jordan, something of their borderers, to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first, we are to remember, that out of Abraham's kindred came many mighty families; as by Isaac and Jacob, the nation called Israel, and afterward Jews: by Esau or Edom, the Idumeans: by Ishmael, the eldest son of Abraham, the Ishmaelites: and by Keturah, his last wife, the Midianites. And again, by Lot, Abraham's brother's son, those two valiant nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the land of Canaan (formerly possess'd by the Canaanites, and by the families of them descended) these issues and alliances of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Egypt, inhabited the frontier places adjoining.

Esau and his sons held Idumea, which bounded Canaan on the south. Ishmael took from the south-east part of the Dead sea: stretching his possession over all Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the desert, as far as the river Tigris, from Sur to Havilah.

Moab took the rest of the coast of the Dead sea, leaving a part to Midian; and passing over Arnon, inhabited the plains between Jordan, and the hills of Abarim, or Arnon, as far north as Essebon, or Geshon.

Ammon sat down on the north-east side of Arnon, and possess'd the tract from Rabba, afterwards Philadelphia, both within the mountains of ² Gilead, and without them as far forth as Aroer, tho' in Moses's time he had nothing left him in all that valley: for the Amorites had thrust him over the river of ¹ Jaboc, as they had done Moab over Arnon. As these nations encompassed sundry parts of Canaan, so the border between the river of Jaboc and Damascus was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mix'd nations: all which territory on the east-side of Jordan, and on the east-side of the Dead sea, was granted by Moses to the tribes of ¹ Reuben, Gad, and Manassah; whereof that part which Moab had, was first possess'd by the Emims, a nation of giants, weakned and broken by Chedorlaomer, after expelled by the Moabites, as before remembred. That which the Ammonites held, was the territory, and ancient possession of the Zamzummims, or Zurci, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlaomer, Amraphel, and the rest; and by them an easy way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written, that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be understood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon, or his ancestor, beaten the Moabites out of the plain countries, between Abarim and Jordan, and driven them thence from Heshbon over Arnon; and this happened not long before Moses's arrival upon that border, when Labeb governed the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab, when Moses pass'd Arnon, was not the son of Labeb; but his name was Baalac, the son of Zippor. And it may be, that those kings were elective, as the Idumeans anciently were.

Now all that part of Moab, between Arnon and Jordan, as far north as Essebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arrived there out of Egypt, it was in the possession of Sehon, of the race of Canaan, by Amoreus; and therefore did Jephthah, the judge of Israel, justly defend the regaining of those countries against the claim of the Ammonites;

^a 2 Chron. 11. ^b Sam. call it Balsatha, and Vitula consermans. See in Gad. 10. §. 5. post principium in Haruer. Gen. 19. 20. ^c Hieron in Ose. Heb. Chataston thamar. 2 Chron. 20. 2. ^d Gen. 14. 7. ^e 1 Reg. 21. ^f 2 Sam. 17. 25. ^g Hieron in loc. Heb. & quod Heb. Joseph. 14. Ant. c. 30. ^h Josh. 13. ⁱ Numb. 21. 24. ^k Gen. 14.

because (as he alledged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab, or Ammon, who (saith ^a*Jephthab*) had three hundred years time to recover them, and did not: Whence he inferreth, that they ought not to claim them now.

And lest any should marvel why the Ammonites in Jephthab's time should make claim to these countries; whereas Moses in the place, Numb. xxi. 26. rather accounts them to have been the ancient possession of the Moabites than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted, that Deut. iii. 11. when it is said, that the iron bed of Og was to be seen at Rabbath, the chief city of the Ammonites; it is also signified, that much of the land of Og, which the Israelites possessed, was by him, or his ancestors, got from the Ammonites, as much as Sehon's was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite nations were seated so confusedly together, that it was hard to distinguish them; so also were the sons of ^b*Moab* and Ammon, Midian, Amalek, and Ismael. Yet the reason seemeth plain enough why Ammon commanded in chief in Jephthab's time: for sometimes the one nation, sometimes the other of all those borderers acquired the sovereignty: and again, that one part of the land which Gad held, namely within the mountains of Galaad or Gilead, and as far south as Aroer, belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking advantage of the time, they then sought to recover it again. Yet at such time as Moses overthrew Sehon at Jabaz, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites all that part of their possession which lay about Aroer, and between it and Jaboc. Sehon and Og, two kings of the Amorites, having displanted both Moab and Ammon of all within the mountains. For it is written Numb. xxi. 24. that Israel conquered the land of Sehon from Arnon to Jaboc, even unto the children of Ammon; so as at this time the river of Jaboc was the south bound of Ammon, within the mountains; when as anciently they had also possessions over Jaboc, which at length the Gadites possess'd; as appears in Joshua xiii. 25.

† II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THE chief cities belonging to Reuben were these, ^a*Kademoth*, for which the Vulgar, without any shew of warrant, readeth Jethson. The Vulgar, or Jerome followed the Septuagint, those two verses 36 and 37 of Joshua xxi. being wanting in the old Hebrew copies, and the Septuagint read Kedson for Kedmoth, which Kedson by writing, slipped into Jethson.

This city, which they gave to the Levites, imparts her name to the desert adjoining; from whence Moses sent his embassy to ^d*Sehon*. In the same place of Joshua, where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Betser & villa ejus, reads Bosor in solitudine Misor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adrichomius makes a town called ^e*Misor*, in the border between Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth, near the Dead sea (for the country between being mountainous, hath few cities) they place two towns of note, Lasa, or Lesbab, of which Genesis x. 19. the ^f*Greeks* call it Callirrhoe; near which there is a hill, from whence there floweth springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweet water, all which, soon after their rising, being joined in one stream, do make a very wholesome bath, especially for all contractions of sinews: to which Herod the elder, when he was desperate of all other help, repaired; but in vain. ^gOthers say, that these springs arise out of the hills of Macherus in this tribe. The like fountains are found in the Pyrenees, and in Peru, called, The baths of the Inga's or kings. The other town is Macherus, the next between Lasa and Jordan, of all that part of the world the strongest in-land city and castle, standing upon a mountain, every way inaccessible. It was first fortified by Alexander Jannæus, who made it a frontier against the Arabians; but it was demolished by Gabinus in the war with Aristobulus, saith ^h*Josephus*. It was thither, saith he, that Herod sent John Baptist, and wherein he was slain: his army soon after being utterly overthrown by Arctas king of Arabia, and himself after this murder never prospering. Not far from Macherus was ⁱ*Bosor*, or Bozra, a town of refuge, and belonging to the Levites, and near it ^k*Livias* upon Jordan, which Herod built in honour of Livia, the mother of Tiberius Cæsar.

To the north of Livias is Setim, or ^l*Sittim*, where the children of Israel embraced the daughters of Midian and Moab; and where Phineas pierced the body of Zimri and Cosbi, with his spear, bringing due vengeance upon them, when they were in the midst of their sin: And from hence Joshua sent the discoverers to view Jericho, staying here until he went over Jordan. As for the Torrent ^m*Setim*, which in this place Adrichomius dreams of, reading Joel iii. 18. Irrigabit torrentem Setim. The Vulgar hath torrentem spinarum; and Junius vallem cedrorum; expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan, but for the Church, in which the just being placed, grow as the cedars, as it is Psal. xcii. 13.

The plain country hereabout, by ⁿ*Moses* called the plains of Moab, where he expounded the book of Deuteronomy to the people, a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same book precisely bounded by Moses. On the south, it had the great desert of Paran, where they had long wandered. On the east, it had Chatjeroth, and Dizabab (of which two, the former is that Gazorus, of which Ptolemy in Palestina; the latter was a tract belonging to the Nabathæes in Arabia Petraea, where was ^o*Mezabab*, of which Gen. xxxvi. 39.) by the geographers, called Medava and Medaba. On the west it had Jordan, and on the north it had Laban (in Junius's edition by the fault of the print, Lamban, Deut. i. 1.) the same which the geographers call Livias; and some confound it with Livias, of which even now we speak.

Also on the same north side, towards the confines of Cælesyria, it had Thophel, whereabout sometime Pella of Cælesyria stood; which was in the region of Decapolis; and as Stephannus saith, was sometime called Butis. It is also noted in Moses to be over-against, or near unto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the Red sea; as also Numb. ii. 14. it translateth the word Suphab in like manner; whereas in this place of Deuteronomy, there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to signify the sea ; and yet the scripture, when this word is so to be taken, useth the addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the region of Suph, or Suphab, which doubtless was about these plains of Moab, towards the Dead sea ; where the country being full of reeds ; was therefore thus called : as also the Red sea was called Mare Suph, for like reason.

^a Judg. 11. ^b Josh. 13. 25. Junius notes, that he one half of the land of Hammon, which in this place of Joshua is said to have been given to the Gadites, was taken first from the Ammonites by Sehon; but the place Deut. 3. 11. proveth, that as well Og as Sehon had gotten lands out of the hands of the Ammonites. ^d Deut. 2. 26. ^e It was a marginal note out of Deut. 3. where the seventy kept the word Misor, signifying a plain, which after crept into the text. ^f Joseph. 17. Ant. c. 9. & Hieron. in quæst. Heb. in Gen. ^g Aquila, l. 3. ^h Joseph. 13. Ant. c. 24. & 14. Ant. c. 10. & alibi. Joseph. bell. Jud. l. 7. c. 25. ⁱ Deut. 4. 43. Josh. 20. 8. ^k Euseb. in Chron. Hier. in loc. Heb. ^l Numb. 25. 1. ^m Josh. 3. 1. ⁿ Deut. 34. 1. ^o The same as it seems which Numb. 21. 30. is called Medeba, whence we read of the plains of Medeva, Josh. 13. 9, 16. of which also we read in the wars of David against Hanun the Ammonite 1 Chron. 19. 7. Also 1 Mac. 9. 36. Isaiah 16. 2. See before, c. 5. §. 7.

The place in these large plains of Moab, where Moses made those divine exhortations, some say, was ^a*Bethabara*, where John baptized, which in the story of Gideon, is called Beth-bara. ^b*Josephus* says, it was where after the city Abila stood, near Jordan, in a place set with palm-trees ; which sure was the same with Abel-sittim, in the plains of Moab, Numb. xxxiii. 49. that some call Abel-sathaim, and Bel-sathim, which is reckoned by Moses in that place of Numbers for the 42, and last place of the Israelites encamping in the time of Moses. This place is also called ^c*Sittim* ; which word, if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from cedars than from thorns, with Adrichomius and others. It was the wood of which the ark of the tabernacle was made.

Toward the east of these plains of Moab, they place the cities of ^d*Nebo*, Baal-meon, Sibma, and Hesbon, the chief city of Sehon and Elhael, and Kirjathaima, the seat of the giant Emim. Of the two first of these, Moses seems to give a note, that the names were to be changed, because they tasted of the Moabites ^eidolatry. For Nebo, (instead of which Junius, Isa. xvi. 1. reads Deus vaticinus) was the name of their idol-oracle, and Baal-meon is the habitation of Baal. Of the same idol was the hill Nebo in these parts denominated ; from whose top, which the common translators call Phasgab, Moses, before his death, saw all the land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which story Junius does not take Phasgab, or Pisgab, for any proper name ; but for an appellative signifying a hill : and so also Vatablus, in some places, as Numb. xxi. 20. where he noteth, that some call Pisgab that top which looketh to Jericho and Hair, as it looketh to Moab ; which opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the name of the city of Reuben, mentioned Josh. xiii. 20. called Ashtoth-Pisgab, which is as much as Decursus Pisga, to wit, where the waters did run down from Pisgab. In the same place of Joshua, there is also named Beth-peor, as belonging to Reuben : so called from the hill Peor, from whence also Baal, the idol, was also called Baal-peor, which, they say, was the same as Priapus ; the chief place of whose worship seems to have been Bamoth-baal ; of which also Josh. xiii. in the cities of Reuben ; for which Numb. xxii. 41. they read the high place of Baal (for so the word signifieth) to which place Balak first brought Balaam, to curse the Israelites.

† III.

Of divers places bordering Reuben, belonging to Midian, Moab, or Edom.

THESE were besides these divers places of note over Arnon, which adjoined to Reuben ; among which they place Gallim, the city of Phalti, to whom ^f*Saul* gave his daughter Michal from David : but Junius thinks this town to be in Benjamin ; gathering so much out of Isaiah x. 29. where it is named among the cities of Benjamin. With better reason, perhaps, out of Numb. xxi. 19. we may say, that Mathana and Nabaliel were in those confines of Reuben, thro' which places the Israelites pass'd, after they had left the well called Beer. Then Diblathaim, which the prophet ^g*Jeremiah* threatened with the rest of the cities of Moab.

Madian also is found in these parts ; the chief of the Madianites in Moab ; but not that Midian ; or Madian by the Red sea, wherein Jethro inhabited : for of the Madianites there were two nations ; of which these of Moab became idolaters, and received an exceeding overthrow by a regiment of twelve thousand Israelites, sent by Moses out of the plains of Moab, at such time as Israel began to accompany their daughters. Their five kings ; with Balaam the soothsayer were then slain, and their regal city ; with the rest, destroyed. The other Madianites, over whom Jethro was prince, or priest, forgot not the God of Abraham their ancestor ; but relieved and assisted the Israelites in their painful travels, thro' the deserts, and were in all that passage their guides. In the south border of ^h*Moab*, adjoining to Edom, and sometime reckoned as the chief city of Edom ; there is that Petra, which in the scriptures is called Selah, which is as much as Rupes or Petra. It was also called Joshtheel, as appears by the place ; 2 Reg. xiv. It was built (saith ⁱ*Josephus*) by Recem, one of those five kings of the Madianites, slain, as before is said ; after whom it was called Recem. Now they say, it is called Crac and Mozera.

The soldans of Egypt, for the exceeding strength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Egypt and Arabia ; of which it is the first and strongest city : the same ; perhaps, which Pliny and Strabo call Nabathea ; whence also the province adjoining took name ; which name seems to have been taken at first from Nabaioth, the son of Abraham, by Keturah. For Nabathea is no where understood for all Arabia Petraea (at least where it is not misunderstood) but it is that province which neighboureth Judea. For Pharan inhabited by Ishmael, whose people Ptolemy calleth Pharanites, instead of Ishmaelites ; and all those territories of the Cusites, Madianites, Amalekites, Ishmaelites, Edomites ; or Idumeans, the lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus ; Sin, and of Og king of Basan, were parts of ^k*Arabia Petraea* ; tho' it be also true, that some part of Arabia the desert belonged to the Amalekites and Ishmaelites : all which nations the scriptures in 1 Chron. v. calleth Hagarims of Hagar.

This city Petra, Scaurus besieged with the Roman army ; and finding the place in shew impregnable, he was content, by the persuasion of Antipater, to take a composition of money and to quit it. Yet Amasias, king of Judah (after he had slaughtered ten thousand of the Arabians in the valley called Salinarum) won also this city. St. Jerome finds Ruth the Moabite to be natural of this city. In the time when the Christians held the kingdom of ^l*Jerusalem*, it had a Latin bishop, having before been under the Greek Church. It is seated not far from Hor, where Aaron died ; and on the other side, towards the north, is the river of ^m*Zared*, or Zered, by which Moses encamped in the thirty eighth station. Adrichome describeth the waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his map of Reuben, not far hence, and between Zared and Arnon ; and so he doth the valley of Save : but the waters of ⁿ*Nimra*, or Beth-Nimra (for which it seems Adri- chomius writ Nemrim) refresh'd the plains of Moab: and the confluence of those waters of Nimra are in the tribe of Gad. Save also cannot be found in this place, that is, to the south of Arnon, and under Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Affyrian and Persian princes, the king of Sodom met him in the valley of Save, or Sba-veh, which is the king's dale, where Absalom set up his monument, as it seems, not far from Jerusalem. And at the same time Melchisedec, king of Salem, also encountered him. But Abraham coming from the north, and Melchisedec inhabiting, either near Betbsan, otherwise Scythopolis, in the half tribe of Manasseh, or in Jerusalem (both places lying to the west of Jordan) could not encounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Save, which was also called the King's Dale, could not be in these parts.

Of the Dead sea.

NOW, because the sea of Sodom, or the Dead sea, called also the lake of Asphaltitis, and the salt-sea (in distinction from the sea of Tiberias, which was fresh water) also the sea of the wilderness, or rather the sea^b of the plains, is often remembered in the scriptures, and in this story also; therefore I think it not impertinent to speak somewhat thereof: for it is like unto the Caspian sea, which hath no out-let, or disburthening. The length of this lake Josephus makes 180 furlongs (which make 22 miles and a half of ours) and about 150 in breadth, which make 18 of our miles, and somewhat more. Pliny makes it a great deal less. But those that have of late years seen this sea, did account it (saith Weissenberg) 8 Dutch miles (which is 32 of ours) in length, and 2 and a half of theirs (which is 10 of ours) in breadth. Of this lake, or sea, Tacitus maketh this report; Lacus est immenso ambitu, specie maris, sapore corruptior, gravitate odoris accolis pestifer: neque vento impellitur, neque pisces aut fuetas aquis volucres patitur, incertum unde superjecta ut solido feruntur, periti imperitique nandi perinde attolluntur, &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a sea of corrupt taste; of smell infectious, and pestilent to the borderers: It is neither moved, nor raised by the wind, nor endureth fish to live in it, or fowl to swim in it. Those things that are cast into it, and the unskillful of swimming, as well as the skillful, are born up by this water. At one time of the year it casteth up bitumen; the art of gathering which, experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is used in the trimming of ships, and the like businesses.

And then of the land, he speaketh in this sort: "The fields not far from this lake, which were " sometime fruitful, and adorned with great cities,
" were burnt with lightning; of which the ruins " remain, the ground looking with a sad face, as " having lost her fruitfulness: for whatsoever doth " either grow, or is set thereon, be it fruits or " flowers, when they come to ripeness, have no" thing within them, but moulder into ashes:" thus far Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that those pomegranates, and other apples, or oranges, which do still grow on the banks of this cursed lake, do look fair, and are of good colour on the out-side; but being cut, have nothing but dust within. Of the bitumen which this lake casteth up, it was by the Greeks called Asphaltitis. Vespasian, desirous to be satisfied of these reports, went on purpose to see this lake, and caused certain captives to be cast into it, who were not only unskillful in swimming, but had their hands also bound behind them; and notwithstanding, they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not sink.

† V.

Of the kings of Moab, much of whose country within Arnon, Reuben possess'd.

OF the kings of Moab, whose country (within Arnon) Reuben possess'd (tho' not taken from Moab, but from Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Junius in Numb. xxi. 14. nameth Vabeb, which seemeth to be the ancestor, or predecessor of Balac, the son of Zippor, which Balac sent for Balaam to curse Israel. For, fearing to contend with Moses by arms, by the examples of Sehon and Og, he hoped, by the help of Balaam's curfings, or enchantments, to take from them all strength and courage, and to cast on them some pestilent diseases. And tho' Balaam at the first, moved by the spirit of God, bless'd Israel, contrary to the hope and desire of Moab; yet being desirous in some sort to satisfy him, and to do him service, he advised Moab to send Midianitish women among the Israelites; hoping by them, as by fit instruments of mischief, to draw them to the idolatry of the heathen; but in the end, he received the reward of his falling from God, and of his evil counsel, and was slain among the rest of the princes of Midian.

After these times the kings of the Moabites are not named; saving that we find in 1 Chron. iv. that Jokim, and the men of Chozeba, and Joash, and Sareph, all being of the issue of Judab, sometime had the dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the 22d verse, These also are ancient things, to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these mens governments are no where extant, or remaining: or as others, hec prius fuerunt; these families of Judab were once thus famous: but now their posterity chuse rather to abide in Babylon, and be clay-workers to the king there.

Then we find Eglon king of Moab, who with the help of Anmon and Amalek, murthered Israel, and commanded them 18 years; which Eglon, Ehud slew in his own house, and afterwards 10000 of his nation. What name the king of Moab had, unto whom David fled, fearing Saul, it doth not appear; or whether it were the same against whom Saul made war, it is not manifest; for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul, he received David, and relieved him, knowing that Saul sought his life.

After this, David himself entered the region of Moab; but not likely in the same king's time: for he slaughtered two parts of the people, and made the third part tributary: whereupon it was said of David, Moab is my wash-pot, over Edom will I cast my shoe; meaning, that he would reduce them to such an abjection, and appoint them for base services: and that he would tread down the Idumeans.

The next king, after David's time, of the Moabites, whose name liveth, was Mesha; who falling from Judab (perhaps in remembrance of the severity of David) fastened himself to the kings of Israel.

^a Gen. 14. ^b So Junius reads for the Hebrew, Haraboth every where, and so also the edition of Vatablus, Deut. 4. ut in solitudine, as also 2 Kings 14. 25. the reason of this name seems to be, because it pass to the plains of Moab, which are called Haraboth Moab, Deut. 34. 1. as also we have Celuloth in Harbath, that is in the plain, to wit, of Zabulon, 1 Mac. 9. 2. Adrichomius imagines a city in Zabulon, called Araba. ^c Deter. Ter. Sancta. ^d Numb. 21. 22, 23, 24. Josh. 24. ^e Josh. 13. ^f 1 Sam. 22. ^g 1 Sam. 14. ^h 2 Sam. 8. ⁱ 1 Chron. 18. ^k Psalm 60. 10.

and paid tribute to ^a*Abab* 100000 lambs, and 200000 rams, with the wooll: who revolted again from Israel, after the death of Abab, was invaded by Jehoram; with whom joined the kings of Judab and Idumea; and being by these three kings pretis'd and broken, he fled to Kir-hareseth, as is elsewhere shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the king's name; when that nation, afflicted by the Ammonites and Idumeans invaded Jehosaphat. And by reason of some private quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set upon the Idumeans, and slaughtered them; and then one against another, so as ^b*Jehosaphat* had a notorious victory over them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of ^c*Jeremiah* the prophet, there was a king of Moab, which is not named, which was after Mesha of Moab many descents: for Mesha lived with Jehoram and this Moabite in Zedekiah's time, 14 kings of Judab coming between, who wasted 300 and odd years.

SECT. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

THE territory adjoining to Reuben, is that of Gad; whereof all that part which joined to the mountains, was sometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as far to the south as Aroer. Of the children of Gad, the 7th son of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of ^d*Leah*, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the deserts 45550, and of their sons, there entred the land promised 45000 bearing arms: from the half tribe of Manasseh, the river of Jabboc divided them: from Reuben, the cities of Hesbon, Elbela and Aphec.

The chief city of Gad, was Aroer, which they make to be the same with Ar, or ^e*Rabbath-Moab*, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Junius, attending diligently to those words of Moses, Deut. ii. 36. Ab Harabero, que est in ripa fluminis Arnon, & civitate ipsa que est in flumine; Where the city in the river is distinguished from the city upon the bank of the river (as also in like manner, Josh. xii. 2. and xiii. 9.) thinketh, that Harober, which doubtless belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. xxxii. 34. it is said, that they built it) was indeed seated near Har of the Moabites; but diverse from it. For that Har was never possess'd by Moses, it is plain, Deut. ii. 9. where God, forbidding Moses to touch it, saith, he hath given Har for an inheritance to the sons of Lot. Now that this city, which in divers places is said to be within and in the middle of the river of Arnon (and so distinguished from Harober, which is said in the same places to be on the bank of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites; the same Junius proveth out of Numb. xxi. 15. where Arnon is said to be divided into divers streams, where, or among which, Har is seated: and the same is confirmed by the place of Josh. xiii. 25. where Harober is said to be seated before Rabbab; which Rabbab, as it seems, cannot be the Rabbab of the Ammonites (for they sat not Harober near it, nor in sight of it) and therefore by Rabbab, here we must understand Rabbab of Moab, which they make to be Ar or Har; and so we must needs distinguish it from Harober. And as for ^f*Har* (which also gave the name to the coast adjoining) it seems it continued in the possession of the Moabites, after they had once expelled the giant-like people, called Emims, first weakened by ^g*Chedorlaomer*, and his associates: but Harober, by the interchange of times, suffered many ancient changes, as being won from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Israelites; and from them, as it seems in the story of Jephtha, by the Ammonites; and from the Ammonites again, by the Israelites, under the conduct of Jephtha. In St. Jerome's time, the greatest part of this city perished by an earthquake, as also Zoar in which Lot saved himself, in the destruction of Sodom, seated not far hence: which they say was therefore called Vitula consternans, because as a wanton tumbling heifer, she was thrice overthrown with earthquakes; for which cause also ^h*Jerome* seems to think that this Zoar was called Saliffa or Bal-saliffa, as if Bal had been a remainder of the old name Balah or Belah (of which Gen. xiv. 2.) and Saliffa which hath a signification of the ternary number, had alluded to the three earthquakes.

Brochard takes Harober to be Petra, but erroneously, as before it is noted; seeing that Petra was in the south border of Moab, adjoining to Edom, whereas Harober is in the north-east border. Between Harober and Jordan they seat Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, because they are said to have built it, Numb. xxxii. 34. tho' Joshua xiii. 17. it is said that Moses gave it the Reubenites. Of this city among the rest of Moab, both Isaiah xv. and Jeremiah xlviii. prophesied, that it should perish; and the lakes about it run with the blood of the inhabitants. It was a great village near Arnon in St. Jerome's time.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next cities of fame to Aroer was Beth-nimrab, of which Isaiah xv. 21. prophesieth, That the waters thereof should be dried up: and all the vale of Moab withered. Not far from Beth-nimrab in this tribe Adrichomius placeth Jogbeba, and Nobach or Nobe: of both which we read in the story of ⁱ*Gideon*; and that Jogbeba was in Gad built by the Gadites, it appears Numb. xxxii. 35. and therefore Nobach also must needs be in these parts: but whether in Gad or Manasseh, it is not certain; only that it was anciently called Kenath, Moses witnesseth; ^k*Nobach also* (saith he) went and took Kenath with her towns, and called it Nobach of his own name; where because the verses precedent speak of the Manassites, and because it is not likely that Moses would have severed this seat of the Gadites from the rest, of which he spake before, verses 34, 35, 36, therefore it may seem that this ^l*Nobach* was in that part of Manasseh, which was in the east of Jordan: tho' Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas he supposeth it to be the same with Nob, which Saul destroyed, of this we shall speak ^min the tribe of Benjamin. And as for that Karker where Zebach and Zalmunna rested themselves in their flight from Gideon, to which place Gideon marched thro' this Nobach and Jogbeba, tho' some place it in Gad, and make it the same with Kir-chares, of which Isaiah xv. and 2 Kings iii. 25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the same with Kir-chares, it is certain that it was a principal city held still by the Moabites, and not in the tribe of Gad.

In the body of this tribe of Gad they place ⁿ*Hararoth*: of which name the scripture witnesseth,

^a 2 Kings 3. ^b 2 Chron. 20. ^c Jerem. 27. ^d Gen. 30. Numb. 1. 26. 32. Josh. 13. ^e Isa. 15. Deut. 2. ^f Deut. 2. 9. Out of which place the words Numb. 21. 28. are to be expounded; not that the city of Har, but the coast adjoining, was wasted by Sehon. ^g Gen. 14. 5. Judg. 11. 35. ^h Hier. in Epitaph. Paul & in quest. & loc. Hebr. see Junius's annotations upon 1 Sam. 9. 2. where he makes Shaliffa a plain country in Benjamin, and the same with Bal-shaliffa, 2 Kings 4. 42. where he expounds Bal or Bahal to be as much as Planities. ⁱ Judg. 8. 11. ^k Numb. 32. 42. ^l Numb. 21. 30. It is called Nophach and placed in the border of the kingdom of Sehon towards Baan, and therefore it is altogether improbable that it was in Gad. ^m Chap. 12. sect. 1. Judg. 8. 10. ⁿ Numb. 32. 34, 35.

that two cities were built by the Gadites; the former simply called Hataroth, the latter Hatrotb-Sophan: for which latter the Vulgar makes two cities Roth and Shopban; the name Hataroth is as much as Carone.

In the valley of the kingdom of Sehon, together with Beth-nimrah, of which we have spoken, Josh. xiii. 27. nameth Beth-baram, and Succoth: the former Numb. xxxij. 36. (where it is called Beth-baram) together with Beth-nimrah, is said to have been built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather because in Joshua it is called Beth-baram) some take to be Betaramptha (of which ^b Josephus) after by Herod called Julias. But whether this Betaramptha were corrupted from Beth-baram, or from Beth-aramatha (of which Aramatha there is mention in ^c Josephus) or from Beth-remphan (of which Remphan, an idol of those countries, we read Acts vii. 43. and to which Junius refers the name of the city Rephan, 1 Macc. xxxvii.) of this question it were hard to resolve. But touching Julias (according to Josephus sometimes Betaramptha) the same Josephus placeth it in the region of Peræa, beyond Jordan; which Regio Peræa, as the Greek word signifieth, is no more than Regio ulterior, the country beyond the river; and therefore they, which labour to set down the bounds of this Peræa, take more pains than needs. Fourteen villages this Julias had belonging unto it, according to ^d Josephus. He makes it to have been built by Herod Antipas, and named Julias in honour of the adoption of Livia, Augustus's wife, into the Julian family: by which adoption she was called Julia. Another Julias, he ^d saith, was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, which he saith is the same as Bethsaida.

Upon the sea of Galilee near to Julias in Peræa (that is, in the region over Jordan) they find Vetexobra, as it is called in ^e Josephus, for Beth-ezob, which is as much as domus hisſopi. Of a noble woman of this city, which for safeguard in the time of war with the Romans, came with many others into Jerusalem, and was there besieged, Josephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable history; how for hunger she eat her own child, with other tragical accidents hereupon ensuing.

Of Succoth (which we said Josh. xiii. is placed with Ben-haran, in the valley of the kingdom of Sehon) it is plain by the story of ^f Gideon that it is near unto Jordan: where it is said, that as he was pass'd Jordan, with his 300, weary in the pursuit of Zebab and Zalmunna, he requested relief of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gideon's return were by him tortured, as it seems under a threshing-car, or tribulum, between which and their flesh he put thorns to tear their flesh as they were press'd and trod under the tribulum; and after which sort also David used some of the ^g Ammonites, tho' not with thorns, but with the iron teeth of the tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which signifieth such tabernacles as were made in haste, either for men or cattle, Moses. Gen. xxxiii. 17. witnesseth, that the original of the name was from such harbours, which Jacob in his return from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the ^h Red-sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Ramesses in Egypt, had their first station, was upon like reason called Succoth: because there they set up their first tabernacles or tents: which they used after for forty years in the wilderness. In remembrance whereof, the feast of Succoth, or tabernacles, was instituted.

Other four cities of Gad are named Josh. xxi. 38. Ramoth in Gilebad, Machanaïm, Chesbon, and Jabzer, all of them by the Gadites given to the Levites; of which Jabzer, as Chesbon or Hesbon was a chief city of Sehon, whence Numb. xxxii. 1. his country is called the land of Jabzer. It was taken by Moses, having first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilebad. In the latter times (as it may be gathered by the prophecy of Isaiab, touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites: to which place of Isaiab vi. 8. also Jeremiah xlviii. 32. in a like prophecy alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seems from the Ammonites) by Judas Macchabæus: as it is 1 Macc. v. 8. where Junius out of Josephus reads Jabzer, tho' the Greeks hath Gazer. For Gazer or Gezer (as he gathereth out of Joshua xvi. 3, 8. and Judg. i. 29.) was far from these countries of Sehon, seated in the west border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, until Solomon's time; for whom the king of Egypt won it from the Canaanite, and gave it him as a dowry with his daughter.

Of Chesbon it may be marvelled, that in the place of Joshua, and 1 Chron. vi. 81. it should be said to have been given to the Levites, by the Gadites, seeing Joshua xiii. 17. it is reckoned for a principal city of the Reubenites. Adrichomius, and such as little trouble themselves with such scruples, finding Casbon, 1 Macc. v. 36. among the cities of Gilebad, taken by Judas Macchabæus, makes two cities of one; as if this Casbon had been the Chesbon of Gad, and that of Reuben distinct from it; but the better reconciliation is, that it being a bordering city, between Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gave their part to the Levites: for so also it seemeth, that in like reason, Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another, given to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanaïm, which word signifieth a double army, we read Genesis xxxii. 2. that it was therefore so called, because the angels of God in that place met Jacob in manner of another host, or company, to join with his for his defence; as also Luke ii. 13. we read of a multitude of the host of heaven, which appeared to the shepherds, at the time of our Saviour's birth; and so unto the godly king Oswald of Northumberland, when he was soon after to join battel with the Pagan Penda of Middle-England. Beda reports, that the like comfort appeared; whence the field where the battel was fought in the north parts of England, is called Heaven-field. In this city of Machanaïm, David abode during the rebellion of Abſalom; and the same, for the strength thereof, Abner chose for the seat of Ishboſeth, during the war between David and the house of Saul.

Of the fourth town, which was Ramoth in Gilebad, we read often in the scripture; for the recovering of which, king Achab lost his life. Junius thinks, that Ramatha-mitſpe, of which Joshua xiii. 26. was this Ramoth in Gilebad. Concerning the place where Laban and Jacob sware one to the other, as it was called Gilebad, which is as much as a witnessing heap, because of the heap of stones which Laban and his sons left for a monument; so also that it was called Mitſpah, which signifieth over-looking (because there they called God to oversee, and be witness to their covenant) it is plain by the place, Genesis xxxi. 49. that in these parts

^a Joseph. 1. Ant. 18. c. 3. ^b Lib. 7. Ant. c. 7. Ubi Græcus Codex legit Αρραθας, Latinus Rabatha Metropolis Hammonitarum. ^c Ant. 20. 11. ^d Joseph. Ant. 18. 3. & Bell. Jud. 2. 8. ^e Joseph. de Bell. Jud. 1. 7. c. 8. ^f Judg. 8. 5. ^g 2 Sapn. 12. 31. ^h Exod. 12. 37. ⁱ Levit. 23. 43.

there was not only a town, but likewise a region called Mitspab, it appears Josb. xi. 3. where we read of the Chivites under Hermon, in the country of Mitspab the town of Mitspab, as it seems both by this place and in the 8th verse following, being not in the hill country, but in the valley. But seeing that Jephtha the judge of Israel, who after he came home from Tob (whither his brethren had driven him) dwelt in this town of Mitspab, who doubtless was of the tribe of Manasseh, and thence at first expelled by his brethren; it may seem that they do not well which place this town of Mitspab rather in Gad, than in Manasseh. By Judas Macchabæus this town of Mitspab (whether in Gad or in Manasseh) was utterly spoiled and burnt, and all the males of it slain: for it was then possess'd of the Ammonites.

Between Succoth (of which we have spoken) and the river Jaboc was that Peniel or Penuel, which name signifieth Locum faciei Dei; "A place where the face of God was seen: so called for memory of the angel's appearing to Jacob, and wrestling with him there: the churlishness of which city, in refusing to relieve Gideon, was the cause that in his return he overthrew their tower, and slew the chief aldermen thereof. To these places of the Gadites, they add Rogelim, the city of that great and faithful subject Barzillai, as it seems, not far from Mahanaim, where he sustained king David during Absalom's rebellion. To these they add the towns of Gaddi, Arnon, and Alimis, of which Gaddi being in Hebrew no more than Gaddita, is ignorantly made a name of a place. Arnon also no where appears to be the name of a town, but still of a river. Alimis Adrichomius frames of ἐν Ἀλέμοις 1 Macc. v. 26. so that the name should rather be Alema; but Junius out of Josephus reads Mallæ, for this in Alimis: and understanding Mallæ to be put for Millo, and to be as much as Munitio (as we have shewed touching the Millo of the Sichemites) he takes this Mallæ to be Mitspab Moabitarum, of which 1 Sam. xxii. 3. As for that Mageth which Adrichomius finds in this tribe of Gad, it is that Mabacath, which Moses noteth to be as far as the farthest of Manasses, out of the bounds this tribe. So also Dathema, of which 1 Macc. v. 10. (which Junius takes to be Rithma, of which Numb. xxxiii. 18. a place of strength in the territory of the Ammonites) and in like manner Minnith and Abel vinearum, tho' by some they be attributed to the Gadites, or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two last we read in Jephtha's pursuit of the Ammonites: seated as it seems by that place of the book of Judges, the former of them in the south-border, and the other in the east-border, both far removed from the Gadites. But the chief city of the Ammonites was nearer, and not far from the borders of Gad. It is called in the scriptures sometime Rabbath, as Deuteronomy iii. 11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to be that Philadelphia which Ptolemy finds in Cœlesyria. Jerome and Callistus in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but as it seems never possess'd by the Israelites, after the overthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites; whereupon at length it became the regal seat of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzumims: which is as much as to say, men for all manner of craft and wickedness infamous. The same were also called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recovered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his ancestors: who having been first beaten by the Affyrians, and their assistants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Seir had been) were afterward the easier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims were by the Idumeans. Yet did the races of Emoreus, of whom these giants were descended, contend with the conquerors for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Hesbon had dispossessed Moab, so had Og of Basan the Ammonites, and between them recovered the best part of all the valley, between the mountains and Jordan. For this Og was also master of Rabba or Philadelphia: and in the possession of the one or the other of these two, Moses and Israel found all those cities and countries, which were given to Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh. So that tho' it were 450 years since that the Zamzumims or Raphaims were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but having these two kings of one kindred, and both valiant and undertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon both Amorites, they recovered again much of their lost possessions, and thrust the sons of Lot over the mountains, and into the deserts. And as the kings, or captains of Persia and Affyria (remembered Genesis xiv.) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom; so by that great conquest which Moses had over those two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take opportunity to look back again into those plains, and when the Reubenites, Gadites and Manassites forsook the worship of the living God, and became slothful and licentious, they taking the advantage, invaded them, and cast them out of their possessions; and were sometimes their masters, sometimes their tributaries, as they pleased or displeased God; and according to the wisdom and virtue of their commanders.

In this city of Rabba, was the iron bed of Og found, nine cubits of length, and four of breadth, Deut. iii. The city was taken in David's time, and the inhabitants slain with great severity, and by divers torments. At the first assault thereof Uriah was shot to death, having been by direction from David, appointed to be employed in the leading of an assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the army perished, and wherein David so displeased God, as his affairs had ill success afterwardeven to his dying day. From hence had David the weighty and rich crown of gold, which the kings of Ammon wore; or which, as some expound it, was used to be set on the head of their idol, weighing a talent, which is sixty pound weight after the common talent. In the time of the Christians it had a metropolitan bishop, and under him twelve others.

The mountains which are described within this tribe, and that of Manasseh, with a part of Reuben, are those which Ptolemy calleth the hills of Hippus, a city of Cœlesyria; and Strabo, Trachones, the same which contain from Damascus to near the departs of Moab, and receive divers names, as commonly mountains do, which neighbour and bound divers countries: for from the south part, as far northward as Asteroth, the chief city of Og, they are called Galaad, or Gilead; from thence northward, they are known by the name of Hermion; for so Moses calleth them: the Zidonians name them Shirion; but the Amorites, Skenir, others Seir; of which name all those hills also were called, which part Judea and Idumea: and lastly, they are called Libanus; for so the prophet Jer. xxii. makes them all one, calling the high mountains of Galaad the head of Libanus. These mountains are very fruitful, and full of good pastures, and have many trees, which yield ^a*Balsamum*, and many other medicinable drugs. The river of this tribe are the waters of Nimrah and Dibon, and the river Jaboc: others do also fancy another river, which rising out of the rocks of Arnon, falleth into Jordan.

S E C T. VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whose territories the Gadites won from Og the king of Basan.

THIS tribe of Gad, possess'd half the country of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petraea called Nabathea, as well within as without the mountains of Gilead: tho' at this time when the Gadites won it, it was in the possession of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Moses did not expel the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thrust the issues of Lot over the mountains Trachones or Gilead, as before. After the death of Othoniel the first judge of Israel; the Ammonites joined with the Moabites against the Hebrews, and so continued long. ^b*Jephtha* judge of Israel had a great conquest over one of the kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they were at peace with them again.

Afterward we find that cruel king of the Ammonites, called Nabas; who besieging ^c*Jabez Gilead*, gave them no other conditions than the pulling out of their right eyes. The reason why he tender'd so hard a composition, was (besides this desire to bring shame upon Israel, because those Gileadites using to carry a target on their left arms, which could not but shadow their left eyes, should by losing their right, be utterly disabled to defend themselves: but Saul came to their rescue, and delivered them from that danger. This Nabas, as it may seem, became the confederate of David, having friended him in Saul's time, tho' ^d*Josephus* thinks that this Nabas was slain in the battle, when Saul rais'd the siege of Jabez, who affirmeth that there were three kings of the Moabites of that name.

Hanan succeeded Nabas; to whom when David sent to congratulate his establishment, and to confirm the former friendship which he had with his father, he most contemptuously and proudly cut off the ambassadors garments to the knees, and shaved the half of their beards. But afterwards, notwithstanding the aids received from the Aramites subject to Adadazer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maacab, and from ^e*Isob*, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were over-turned; their chief city of Rabba, after Philadelphia, taken, the crown, which weighed a talent of gold, was set on David's head; all such as were prisoners David executed with strange severity; for with saws and harrows, he tare them in pieces, and cast the rest into lime-kilns.

Jehosaphat governing Judah, they assisted the Moabites their neighbours against him, and perished together. Osias made them tributaries, and they were again by Jotham inforc'd to continue that tribute, and to increase it, to wit, one hundred talents of silver, ten thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley: which the Ammonites continued two years.

The fifth king of the Ammonites, of whose name we read, was Baalis, the confederate of Zedekiah: after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Baalis sent Ismael of the blood of the king of Judah, to slay Gedaliah, who served Nabuchodonosor.

Of the other half of Manasseh.

THE rest of the land of Gilead, and of the kingdom of Og in Basan, with the land of Ilus, and Argob, or Trachonitis (wherein also were part of the small territories of ^f*Batanea*, Gaulonitis, Gessuri, Machati, and Auranitis) was given to the half tribe of Manasseh over Jordan, of which those three latter provinces defended themselves against them, for many ages. But Batanea Ptolemy setteth farther off, and to the north-east, as a skirt of Arabia the desert: and all those other provinces before named with Peræa and Ituræa, he nameth but as part of Cælesyria, as far south as Rabba or Philadelphia; likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad and Reuben, saving the land near the Dead sea, he makes part of Arabia Petraea: for many of these small kingdoms take not much more ground than the county of Kent.

Basan, or after the Septuagint, Basanitis, stretcheth it self from the river of Jaboc, to the ^g*Machati*, and Gessuri; and from the mountains to Jordan, a region exceeding fertile; by reason whereof it abounded in all sorts of cattle. It had also the goodliest woods of all that part of the world; especially of oaks, which bear mast (of which the prophet Zacharias, Howl, O ye oaks of Basan) and by reason hereof they bred so many swine, as ^h2000 in one herd were carried head-long into the sea, by the unclean spirits which Christ had cast out of one of the Gadarens. It had in it threescore cities, walled and defended: all which, after Og and his sons were slain, Jair, descended of Manasseh, conquered, and called the country after his own name, Avoth Jair, or the cities of Jair.

The principal cities of this half tribe (for I will omit the rest) are these, Pella, sometimes ⁱ*Butis*, otherwise Bernice: by Seleucus, king of Syria, it is said to have been called Pella, after the name of that Pella in Macedon, in which both Philip the father, and his son Alexander the Great were born. It was taken, and in part demolished, by Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews, because it refused to obey the Jews laws; but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the government of Syria. It is now but a village, saith Niger. Carnaim by the river Jaboc, taken by ^k*Judas Maccabeus*, where he set on fire the ^a temple of their idols, together with all those that fled thereunto for sanctuary; and near it they place the castle of Carnion, of which 2 Mac. xii. 22. Then the strong city of ^b*Ephron* near Jordan, which refusing to yield passage to ^c*Judas Maccabeus*, was forced by him by assault, and taken, and burnt with great slaughter.

Jabez Gilead, or Jabesus, was another of the cities of this half tribe, which being besieged by ^d*Nabas*, king of the Ammonites, was delivered by Saul, as is ^e elsewhere mentioned. In memory whereof, the citizens ^f recovered, embalmed, and buried the bodies of Saul and his sons, which hung despitefully over the walls of Bethsan, or Scythopolis. ^g*Gaddara*, or Gadara, is next to be named, seat by Pliny on a hill near the river Hieromiace, which river Ortelius seems to think to be Jaboc. At the foot of the hill there spring forth also hot baths, as at Machærus. Alexander Jannæus, after ten months siege, won it, and subverted it. Pompey restored it; and Gabinus ^h made it one of the five courts of justice in Palestine. Jerusalem being the first, Gadara the second, Emath, or Amathus the third, Jericho and Sephora in Galilee the fourth and fifth. The citizens impatiently bearing the tyranny of Herod, surnamed Ascalonita, accused him to Julius Cæsar of many crimes; but perceiving that they could not prevail, and that Herod was highly favoured of Cæsar, fearing the terrible ⁱ revenge of Herod, they slew themselves; some by strangling, others by leaping over high towers, others by drowning themselves.

To the east of Gadara, they place Sebei ^k in which Josephus, Ant. 5. 13. saith Jephtha was buried; whence others reading with the Vulgar, Jud. xii. 7. Sepultus est in Civitate sua Gilehad (for in una Civitatum Gilehad) imagine Gilead to be the name of a city, and to be the same with Sebei. In like manner following the Vulgar, 1 Mac. v. 26. where it readeth Casphor for Chesbon: the same Adrichemius imagineth it to be Ampla & firma Gilehaditarum civitas; so of one city Hesbon, or Chesbon, which they call Essebon, the chief city of Sebon in the tribe of Reuben, he imagineth two more. This Casphor in Manasses, and a city in Gad, which he calleth Casbon, of which we have admonished the reader heretofore. Of Gamala (so called, because the hill on which it stood, was in fashion like the back of a camel) which Josephus placeth not far from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis, over-against Tarichea, which is on the west-side of the sea or lake of Tiberias. See this in Josephus's fourth book of the Jewish war, c. 1. 3. where he describes the place by nature to be almost invincible; and in the story of the siege, shews how Vespasian, with much danger of his own person, entering it, was at first repulled, with other very memorable accidents; and how at length, after the coming of Titus, when it was taken, many leaping down the rocks, with their wives and children, to the number of five thousand, thus perished; besides four thousand slain by the Romans; so that none escaped, save only two women that hid themselves.

About four miles west from Gadara, and as much east from Tiberias (which is on the other side of the lake) Josephus placeth Hippus, or Hippene, whence ^l*Ptolemy* gives the name to the hills that compass the plains in which it standeth: so that it may seem to have been of no small note. It is seated far from the hill country: on the east of the lake, as also Pliny noteth, lib. 5. cap. 15. it was restored by Pompey; after by ^m*Augustus* added to Herod's tetrarchy: it was wasted by the Jews, in the beginning of their rebellion: when by many massacres of their nation, they were enraged against their borderers.

The next city of note, but of more ancient fame, is ⁿ*Edrehi* or Edrai, wherein Og king of Basan chiefly abode, when Moses and Israel invaded him: and near unto this his regal city, it was that he lost the battle and his life. It stood in St. Jerome's time; and had the name of Adar or Adara. Not far from these towns near Jordan, in this valley stood Geraffa or Gergeffa, inhabited by the Gergefites, descended of the fifth son of Canaan. Of these Gergefites we read Mat. viii. 28. that Christ coming from the other side of the lake of Tiberias, landed in their coasts; where casting the devils out of the possessed, he permitted them to enter into the herd of hogs: in which story, for Gergefites or Gergefins, ^o*St. Luke* and St. Mark have Gadarens; not as if these were all one (for Gergeffa or Geraffa is a distinct town in these parts from Gadara) but the bounds being confounded, and the cities neighbours, either might well be named in this story. This city received many changes and calamities, of which Josephus hath often mention. For besides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annius lieutenant to Vespasian; and 1000 of the ablest young men put to the sword, and the city burnt. In the year 1120 it was rebuilt by Baldwin king of Damascus; and in the same year recovered by Baldwin de Burgo king of Jerusalem, and by him utterly razed. Near unto Geraffa is the village of Magedan, or after the Syriak, Magedu, or after the Greek, Magdala, where the Pharisees and Sadducees, Matt. xv. desired of our Saviour a sign from heaven; the same place, or some adjoining to it, which ^p*St. Mark* calleth Dalmanutha. By the circumstances of which story it appears, that this coast lay between the lake of Tiberias, and the country of Decapolis. ^q*Brochard* makes both these places to be one; and finds it to be Phiale, the fountain of Jordan according to Josephus: but this Phiale is too far from the sea of Galilee, and from Bethsaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmanutha. For as it appears by the story, not far hence towards the north, was the desert of Bethsaida, ^r where Christ filled 5000 people with the five barley loaves and the fishes.

On the north of this Bethsaida they place Julias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the region Trachonitis toward the south. It was sometimes a village, and not long after the birth of Christ it was compassed with a wall by Philip the tetrarch of Ituræa and Trachonitis; and after the name of Julia, the wife of Tiberias called Julias, as hath been farther spoken in the tribe of Gad, where it is noted that ^s*Josephus* makes this Julias to be the same as Bethsaida. Upon the east-side of the same lake of Tiberias stands Corozaim, or Corazim, of which Christ in Matthew; Wo be unto the Corazim.

But the principal city of all these in ancient time was Asteroth, sometime peopled with the giants Raphaim; and therefore the country adjoining called the land of giants, of whose race was Og king of Basan. In Genesis xvi. 5. this city is called Asteroth of Carnaim, whence 1 Mac. v. 26. is called simply Carnaim, as Josh. xiii. 21. it is called Asteroth without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim signifieth a pair of horns, which agree well with the name of their idol Astoreth, which was the image of a sheep, as it is elsewhere noted, that Asteroth in Deut. signifieth sheep. Others from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Karnaim, to have been the name of the people which inhabited this city, and expound it Heroes ^b radiantes. For of old the Raphæi which inhabited this city, Gen. xiv. 5. were giant-like men, as appears by comparing the words Deut. iii. 11. Og ex residuo gigantum, with the words Josb. xiii. 12. Og ex reliquiis Raphæorum; but if the Karnaim, or Karnaim, were those Raphæi, the word would not have been in the dual number; neither would Moses in the place of Genesis have said the Raphæi in Asteroth of the Karnaim, but rather the Raphæi in Asteroth of the Raphæi, or some other way fittest for perspicuity; for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth the one from the other.

Not far from Asteroth, Adrichomius out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar in the way out of Syria into Galilee, four miles from Corazin. This city, saith he, is remembred in the Canticles, and in the book of Judith, and there are that of this city understand David in Psalms 120, and here the sepulchre of Job is yet to be seen, saith Breidenbach.

Now concerning the texts which he citeth, it is so, that the Greek hath Galaad instead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth use in that place of Judith, and joineth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles, and the 120th Psalms do rather prove, that Kedar was not hereabout, than any way help Adrichomius. For that they speak of Scenitæ Cedareni, it is apparent, and as evident by the place in the Canticles that they were decolorés, much more than any under the Climates of the land of Canaan; whence Junius out of Lampridius and Pliny, placeth them in Arabia Petraea, far from these parts. Touching the sepulchre of Job it is certain that the Arabians and Saracens (holding those places) feign many things to abuse the Christians, and to get money. Further, it may well be affirmed, that many, if not all, the historical circumstances of Job are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his country seek to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded upon him, infer what his country was, and build unto him a city by conjecture.

Of Job himself, whether he were the same Jobab remembred in Genesis xxxvi. descended from Esau, and king also of Idumea, tho' ^c Rupertus, Lyranus, Oleaster, and Bellarmino are of another opinion, yet St. Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregory, with Athanasius, Hippolytus, Irenæus, Eusebius Emisenus, Apollinaris, Eustachius and others, cited by St. Jerome in his 126th epistle to Evagrius, take him for the same.

The land of Huts or Hus wherein Job dwelt is from the Greek ^d ἡὺς, which the Septuagint use for the word Huts, translated by the Vulgar sometimes Hus, as Job i. 1. sometimes Ausitis, as Jer. xxv. 20. This land is placed by Junius between Palæstina and Cœlesyria, beside Chamatba, or Hamatba, under Palmyrene in the country called by Ptolemy, Trachonitis or Bathanea, the bounds of which countries are confounded with Basan in this half tribe of Manassêb. And that this land of Hus was thus seated, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Jeremiah xxv. 20. where he reckons the Hushites among the promiscuous borderers of the Israelites, whom he therefore calleth promiscuous or miscellaneam turbam, because their bounds were not only joined but confounded, and their Seignories mingled one with the other, but of this place the words of Jeremiah, Lam. iv. 21. speaking of the same prophecy, of which he speaketh in the five and twentieth chapter, must needs be expounded; as Junius reads them, distinguishing the land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edomi, ô quæ habitas in terra Hutzî; O daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguish, but readeth, Filia Edom quæ habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwellest in the land of Hus: Hence, as it seems, some of the learned have thought that Job was an Edomite, as we have said, and king of Edom; which if they understand by it Idumæa or Edom, so called in Moses's time, they are greatly mistaken, making this land of Hus to be in Idumæa, Deut. iii. 9. For it is very probable, that Esau, when he first parted from Jacob, did not seat himself in Edom, or Seir, which lieth on the south border of Judea, but inhabited Seir far to the east of Jordan, and held a part of those mountains otherwise called Galaad and Elæmon, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites, Shenir for Seir, and from this his habitation did Esau encounter Jacob, when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who passed by the very border of Esau's abiding. It is true, that at such time as Moses wandred in the deserts, that the posterity of Esau inhabited Seir to the south of Judea. For it is like that the Amorites, who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did also drive the Edomites out of those parts, who thenceforward seated themselves to the south of Judea, bordering the desert Paran, and stretched their habitations over the deserts as far as Hôr, where Aaron died.

Now for this Hus, which gave the name to a part of the land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the son of Aram, as Junius thinks in his note upon Gen. x. 23. or rather Hus the son of Nachor, Abraham's brother, the question is doubtful. For my part I rather incline to think, that it was Hus the son of Nachor; partly because these families of Aram seem long before to have been lost; and partly because in Job. xxxii. 2. Elibu the fourth of Job's friends, which seems to be of Job's own country, is called a ^e Buzite, of Buz, the brother of Hus, the son of Nachor; as also Jer. xxv. in the same continuation (tho' some other nations named between) where Hus is spoken of, there Buz is also named. Neither doth it hinder our conjecture, that in the place of Job xxxii. Elibu the Buzite is said to be of the family of Ram (which Junius expounds to be as much as of the family of Aram;) for that by this Aram we are not to understand Aram the son of Shem, Junius himself maketh it plain, both in his annotation upon the beginning of his book, where he saith that one of Job's friends (which must needs be this Elibu) was of the posterity of Nachor (as also in this place he confesseth so much expressly) and in as much as he readeth not, de familia Aram, or Ram, but de familia Syra; like as elsewhere Laban who sprung of Nachor is called a Syrian.

^a See chap. 7. Hence also by Junius and others it is called Ausitis, and so as it seem they read it in the Septuagint. Jun. in Gen. 10. 23. ^e Whence the Septuagint calls him, ex regione Ausitis. As

As for the ^aother three of Job's friends (of whom by this note of Elibu's being of the Syrian family, or the family of Nachor) it is implied that they were of other kindreds; as also by the Septuagint's addition, that this Elibu was of the land of Hus, or Ausitis, it is implied that they thought only Elibu to have been of Job's own country.

Franciscus Brochard the monk, in his description of the holy land in the journey from Acon eastward, findeth Suetba, and Theman on the east of the sea of Galilee, both very near to the land of Hus; whereof the one may seem to have denominated Bildad the Shuchite; the other Eliphaz the Themanite; two of the three friends of Job, of the which Job. ii. 11. But Junius thinks that the Shuchites were inhabitants of Arabia the desert, descended of Shuach the son of Abraham and Ketura; of whom Genesis xxv. 2. perhaps, saith he, the same whom Pliny calls Sacchæi. So also he thinketh the Themanites, of whom Eliphaz was, to have been of Arabia the desert; and Eliphaz himself to have been of the posterity of Theman the son of Eliphaz, which was the son of Esau. And so also Nabamah whence Tophar the third of Job's friends (which in this place of Job ii. 11. are mentioned) is by the same learned expositor thought either to be named of Thimnah by transposition of letters (which Thimnah, Gen. xxxvi. 40. is named among the sons of Esau that gave denomination to the places where they are seated) or else to be the same Nabamah, which Josh. xv. 41. is reckoned for a city of Juda in the border, as he thinks, of Edom. And yet I deny not, but that near to the land of Hus, in Basán, as it seems, in the tribe of Manasses, there is a region which at least in latter times was called Suitis, or of some like name. For this is evident by the history of ^b*Gulielmus Tyrius*, which reports of a fort in this region of Suita or Suitis (as he calls it diversly) of exceeding great strength and use for the retaining of the whole country: which in the time of Baldwin the 2d king of Jerusalem, was with great digging thro' rocks recovered by the Christians; having not long before been lost to the great disadvantage of the country, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The situation of this fort is by Tyrius described to be 16 miles from the city Tiberias, on the east of Jordan; by Adrichomius 4 miles northward from the place where Jordan enters the lake Tiberias at Corazin.

Other cities of this part of Manasses named in the scripture are these; Golan, Bebeshtera, Mitspah of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the coming of the Israelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitspah of Gilead, we have spoken by occasion among the cities of Gad: the two other were given to the Levites, and Golan made one of the cities of refuge; from which Golan we have both Gaulanitis superior & inferior, oft in Josephus. Bebeshtera is accounted the chief city of Basán by some, but the writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Betser or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a region in this tract, and hence Jerome hath Arga, a name of a city placed by some about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Joshua) which make the lake Samachonitis, as Josephus calls it. This lake being as it were in the midst between Cæsaria Philippi and Tiberias, through which, as through the lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this half tribe on the west. When the snow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, saith Brochard; otherwise more contract, leaving the marsh ground on both sides, for lions and other wild beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plentifully grow there.

Adjoining to this lake in this country of Manasses, Josephus names two places of strength fortified by himself in the beginning of the Jews rebellion: Seleucia the one, and Sogane the other. In the north side of this half tribe of Manasseh, and in the north-east, the scripture nameth divers bordering places towards Damascus, as Tsedad Chauran, and Chatsar Henan, lying in a line drawn from the west; of which three cities we read Ezek. xlvii. 16. with which also agrees the place Numb. xxxiv. 8. where for Chauran, between Tsedad, and Chatsar-benan, Zipbron is named. From this Chauran is the name of Auranitis regio, in Josephus and Tyrius, whose bounds (as also the bounds of Gessur and Mabachath or Macati, which were likewise borderers to Manasses towards the north-east) are unknown; only that Gessur was of might, it appears in that David married ^d*Mabaca* the daughter of Tholmay king of Gessur; by whom he had the most beautiful, but wicked, and unfortunate Abfalon.

C H A P. XI.

The history of the Syrians, the chief borderers of the Israelites, that dwelt on the east of Jordan.

S E C T. I.

Of the city of Damascus, and the divers fortunes thereof.

D*amascus* of all other in this border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in beauty, antiquity, and riches, and was therefore called the city of joy or gladness, and the house of pleasure; and is not only remembered in many places of scripture, but by the best historians and cosmographers. The Hebrews, saith ^e*Josephus* i. 14. think it to have been built by Hus the son of Aram; of which opinion St. Jerome upon Isaiah xvii. seemeth to be; tho' in his Hebrew questions he affirmeth that it was founded by Damascus, the son of Eliezer ^f*Abraham's* steward, a thing very unlikely, seeing the city was formerly known by that name, as appears by Abraham's calling this his steward Eliezer of Damascio. David was the first that subjected it to the kingdom of Juda, after the overthrow of Adadezer their king; but in Solomon's time, Rezon recovered it again, tho' he had no title at all or right to that principality: but David having overthrown Nadad king of Sophona (otherwise Syria, Soba or Zobah) Rezon or Rezon with the remainder of that broken army, invaded ^g*Damascena*, and possess'd Damascus it self, and became an enemy to Solomon all his life.

The next king of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from ^h*David*, and Joab, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the king of Egypt's wife's sister, of whom Taphnes in Egypt was so called. This Adad returning again became an enemy to Solomon, all his life, and (as some writers affirm) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence out. In the line of Adad that kingdom continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the catalogue of those kings of Syria) to whom the Affyrians and then the Grecians succeeded. This city was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the rivers of ^a Abanah and Parphar; whereof one of those prophane writers call Chrysostrboas, the golden river. Junius takes it for Adonis. The country adjoining is very fruitful of excellent wines and wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong castle built, as it seems, by the ^b Florentines after it became Christian: the lilies being found cut in many marbles in that citadel. Against this city the prophets ^c Amos, Isaiab, Jeremiab, and Zacharias, prophesied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heap of stones. In the time of the last Rezon, and tenth king of the Damascenes, Teglathphalassar invited by Achaz king of ^d Juda, carried away the naturals of Damascus into the east, leaving of his own nation to inhabit it. After that it was utterly ruined by the Babylonians, said Jerome upon Isaiab xvii. which thing was performed by Salmanasar according to Junius, in his note upon that place, 5 years after the prophecy. In time it was restored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolemies; but long after when Syria fell into the hands of the Romans, it was taken by ^e Metellus and Lollius. In the time of the Christians it had an archbishop: St. Jerome living, as he affirmeth upon the Acts, it was the metropolis of the Saracens, being taken by Hlaomar their king from the Romans, in the year of our redemption 636. And in the year ^f 1147, Conrad the third, emperor of Rome, Lewis king of France, Baldwin the third king of Jerusalem, Henry duke of Austria, brother to Conrad, ^g Frederick Barbarossa afterwards emperor, Theodorick earl of Flanders, and other princes assembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the sea coast, determined to recover Damascus; but being betray'd by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprize.

In the year 1262, Halon the Tartar incompass'd it, and having formerly taken the king, brought him under the walls, and threatened extream torture unto him, except the citizens surrendred the place; but they refusing it, the ^h king was torn asunder before them, and in fine the city taken, Agab the son of Halon was by his father made king thereof.

In the year ⁱ 1400, Tamberlain emperor of the Parthians, invaded that region, and besieged the city with an army of 1200000 (if the number be not mistaken.) He entred it and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners, those that retired into the castle, which seemed a place impregnable, he over-topped with another castle adjoining; he forbore the demolishing of the city in respect of the beauty of the church, garnished with 40 gates or sumptuous porches. It had within it 9000 lanterns of gold and silver; but while he invaded Egypt they again surprized Damascus. Lastly, in his return after three months siege he forc'd it; the Mahometans, prostrating themselves with their priests, desired mercy: but Tamberlain commanding them to enter the church, he burnt them, and it, to the number of 30000, and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their houses, knew them not by their foundations. And as a trophy of his victory, he raised three towers with great art, built with the heads of those whom he had slaughtered. After this it was restored and repossessed by the soldan of Egypt, with a garrison of Mammalukes. And in the year 1517, Selim emperor of the Turks wrested it out of the hands of the Egyptians; in whose possession it now remain-

SECT. II.

Of the first kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power.

NOW be it that Damascus were founded by ^j Hus the son of Aram, or by Damascus the son of Eliezer, Abraham's steward, we find no relation of their kings, or common-wealth till David's time. For it stood without the bounds of Canaan; and therefore neglected by Moses, Joshua, and Judges, as impertinent to that story: but were it so that it had some reguli, or petty kings over it, as all the cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as David overthrew Adadezer prince of Sophena or Syria Zoba; the same nation which ^k Pliny calleth Nubæi, inhabiting between Batania and Euphrates. Now the better to understand the story of those Syrian princes, whom soon after the kings of Damascus made their vassals, the reader may inform himself, that on the north-east parts of the holy land there were three chief principalities whereof the kings or commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the state or commonwealth of ^l Israel, namely Damascus or Aram, Sophena or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath Zoba, of which these were the princes in David's and Solomon's times: Razon or Rezon of Damascus, Adadezer of Syria Zoba, and Tobu of Chamath. But it seemeth that Damascus was one of the cities subject to Adadezer when David invaded him, tho' when Saul made war against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Josephus affirmeth, the leader of those succours, which were levied and sent to Hadad-Hezer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battle slain with ^m 22000 Aramites of Damascus; whereof, as of the overthrow of Adadezer, Rezon the commander of his army, taking advantage, made himself king of Damascus: Adadezer and ⁿ Adad of Damascus being both slain. About the same time Tobu king of Chamath or Iturea, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adadezer was utterly overthrown, sendeth for peace to David, and presented him with rich gifts, but in dolo, saith St. Jerome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the north of the holy land, and to the west of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited; but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Judeans and Israelites. But to return to the kings of Syria, I mean of Syria as it is taken in the scriptures, containing Damascena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath or Iturea, to which I may add Geshur, because it is so accounted in ^o 2 Sam. xv. as joining in the territory to Damascus (for Syria at large is far greater, of which Palestina it self is but a province, as I have noted in the beginning of this tract. It is not agreed among the historians of former times, nor of our later writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, others Adad of Idumea: of whom it is written in the 1st of Kings, that David having invaded that region, and left Joab therein to destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the king's seed, fled into Egypt, and was there married to Taphnes the queen's sister as before; who hearing of David's death, and the death of his captain Joab (whom indeed all the bordering nations feared) he turned again; and, as Bunting thinketh, this Adad did expel Rezon out of Damascus, and was the first of the Syrian kings. To me it seemeth otherwise. For as I take it, ^a Adadezer the son of Rehob, whom Saul invaded, was the founder of that principality; and the first of Adads, who forsaking his father's name, as he grew powerful, took upon him the style of Adad, the great god of the Affyrians, saith Macrobius, which signifieth oneness or unity. I also find a city called Adada in the same part of Syria: of which whether these princes took the name or gave it, I am ignorant. For Adad-ezer, Ben-adad, Eli-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adjoined. And that Adadezer was of greatest power, it appeareth, first because it is against him, that Davida undertook the war; secondly, because he levied 22000 Aramites out of the territory of Damascus; as out of his proper dominions: for had the Damascenes had a king apart, it is probable that the scriptures would have given us his name; thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adadezer was king, was an exceeding large territory, and contained of Arabia the desert as far as to Euphrates, according to ^b Pliny, and the greatest part of Arabia Petraea, according to Niger. Whosoever was the first, whether Adadezer or Adad of Idumea, Rezon was the second: ^c Who was an enemy to Israel all the days of Solomon. Besides, the evil that Adad did seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumea, lately returned out of Egypt, to wit, 23 years after he was carried thither.

The third king of Damascus, and of Zobab both, was Hezion; to Hezion succeeded Tabrimmon, or Tabremmon; to him Benbadad, as is proved in ¹ Kings xv. 18. For Afa king of Juda, the son of Abiam, the son of Roboam, the son of Solomon, being vexed and invaded by Baasha, the successor of Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, sent to Benbadad, the son of Tabrimmon the son of Hezion king of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to invade Israel (while Baasha sought to fortify Rama against Afa; thereby to block him up, that he should not enter into any of the territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Afa, having received his presents, willingly invaded the country of Nephtalim, and took divers cities, and spoils thence: ^d Afa in the mean while carrying away all the materials, which Baasha had brought to fortify Rama withal, and converted them to his own use.

This Benbadad's father Tabremmon was in league with Afa: and so was his father Hezion; for Afa requireth the continuance of that friendship from Benbadad, his son; tho' it seemeth that the gold and silver sent him out of the temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon invaded Israel, before the enterprise of his son Benbadad, it is conjectured. For Benbadad, when he was prisoner with Achab, spoke as followeth. ^e The cities which my father took from thy father, I will restore; and thou shalt make streets or keepers of the borders, for thee in Damascus; as my father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it self were of much importance) because Tabremmon was father indeed to Benbadad which invaded Baasha, at the request of Afa. But this Benbadad that twice entred upon ^f Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the son of Benbadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Afa and Abiam, as before, than the son of Tabremmon: For between the invasion of Benbadad the first, in Baasha's time, and the siege of Samaria, and the overthrow of Benbadad by Achab, there pass'd 49 years, as may be gathered out of the reigns of the kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30 years of age to Benbadad, when he invaded Baasha, and after that 49 years, ere he was taken by Achab, which make 79 years, it is unlikely that Benbadad, at such an age, should make war. Besides all this, the first Benbadad came with no such pomp, but the second Benbadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32 kings; and therefore I resolve that Benbadad the son of Tabremmon invaded Baasha and Omri, and Benbadad the second invaded Achab, at whose hands this Benbadad received two notorious overthrows; the first at Samaria, by a fall of 700 Israelites; the second at Aphec, where with the like number in effect the Israelites slaughtered 100000 of the ^g Aramites, besides 27000, which were crush'd by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benbadad again setteth at liberty; to whom he rendreth those towns, that his father had taken from the predecessor of Achab; but being returned, he refused to surrender Ramoth-Gilead, a frontier town, and of great importance. Now three years alters (for so long the league lasted) ^h Ramoth not being delivered, Achab invadeth Gilead, and besiegeth the city, being assisted by Jehosaphat. The Aramites came to succour and fight, in which Achab is wounded, and died that night. After this, Benbadad sendeth the commander of his forces ⁱ Naaman, to Joram the son of Achab, to be healed of the leprosy; and tho' Elizeus had healed him, yet he picketh quarrel against Joram: and when Joram by Elizeus's intelligence, had escaped his plot, he sent men and chariots to take the prophet, as is aforesaid. After ^k Benbadad besiegeth Samaria again; and being terrified thence from ^l heaven, he departeth home, and sickneth, and sendeth Azael with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his estate, if he might live. Azael returning, smothereth him. Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benbadad, Adar, the son of Adar: ^m Amos and Jeremiah mention the towers of Benbadad. Josephus writeth, that Benbadad and his successor Azael, were worshipped for gods, by the Syrians to his time, for the sumptuous temples which they built in ⁿ Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, saith he, that scarce yet 1100 years are compleat, since their wars with the Israelites.

Hazael or Azael, the first king of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was anointed by Elisha, or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benbadad to the prophet, to know whether Benbadad should recover his present fit of sickness. He waged war with Joram, who received divers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead; from whence returning to be cured at Jesrael, he and the king of Juda, Ahaziah, or Ochozias, are slain by Jehu, as before is said. After the death of Joram, Azael continued the war against Jehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of ^o Gad, Reuben, and Manasseh, over Jordan. He then invadeth Juda, and took Gath; but by gifts from Joas, he was averted from attempting Jerusalem: for he presented him with all the ^p hallowed things which Jehosaphat, Jehoram, and Ahaziah, his fathers, kings of Juda had dedicated, and which he himself had dedicated; and all the gold which was found in the treasures of the Lord, and in the king's house. This was the second time that the temple was spoiled, to please the Adads of Damascus: for ^a*Afa* did present Benbadad with those treasures, when he invited him to war upon Baasha, king of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition between Joas and Azael, yet a part of his army spoiled the other provinces of Judea, and slaughtered many principal persons. Lastly, ^b*Azael* vexed Joahas the son of Jehu, and brought him to that extremity, as he left him but fifty horsemen, ten chariots, and ten thousand footmen of all his people.

Of the later kings, and decay and overthrow of their power.

AFTER Hazael, Benbadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the son of Hazael, reigned in Damascus, who fought against Israel with ill success: for ^c*Joas*, king of Israel, the son of the unhappy Joachaz, as he was foretold by ^d*Elisba* the prophet, beat Benbadad in three several battles; and he lost all those cities to Israel, which his father Hazael had taken violently from Joachaz.

Afterwards this Benbadad, the son of Hazael, there succeed 3 others of the same name, of whom the stories are lost; only Nicholaus Damascenus, cited by ^e*Josephus*, makes mention of them: and in one of these king's times it was, that Jeroboam the 2d, the son of ^f*Joas*, recovered Damascus it self, to Judah, saith the Geneva; but better in Junius, utque recuperabat Damascus, & Camatham Jebudæ, pro Israele; that is, And how he recovered for Israel, Damascus, and Camatha of Judea: for these cities, sometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the tribe of Juda.

And it is likely that this conquest upon the Adads was performed; the first of these three Adads then living, of whom there is no story. For when as Jehoas the king of the ten tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benbadad, the son of Hazael, and had recovered the cities which Hazael had won from Israel; and so left his kingdom to his son Jeroboam the 2d: it seemeth, that this Jeroboam, without delay, and having nothing else left for him to enterprise, instantly followed his father's good fortune, and invaded Damascus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Josephus Rases, after Zonaras Raason the 10th, Adad, making league with Pekab, or Phacas, king of Israel, against Achaz, king of Juda: both carry away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Jerusalem; but in vain. Then ^g*Adad* alone invadeth Elatb; and beating out the Jews, maketh it a colony of Syrians. Wherefore Achab brought ^h*Teglatphalassar* against Razin, who took him, and beheaded him, and won Damascus; with whom ended the line of the Adads, and the kingdom of Damascus; the Affyrians becoming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads, as they reigned in order, are thus reckoned:

1. Adadezer, the son of Rebob.
2. Rezin, the son of Eliadad, or Razin.
3. Hexion.
4. Tabrommon.
5. Benbadad, who invadeth Baasha.
6. Bonbadad the second, taken prisoner by Achab.
7. Hazael, whom Elisba foretold with tears, of his advancement; the same who overthrew Joram, king of Israel, at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazael, which preceded Benbadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Hazael which took Geth, and compounded the war with Joas, made the expedition thirty years, and perhaps more, after the first Hazael, which stifled his master Benbadad, and had slain Joram the son of Achab, king of Israel. For Joas began to reign in the seventh year of Jehu, king of Israel; and after he had reigned twenty three years, the temple was not yet repaired; after which (and how long we know not) it is said, that Hazael took Geth, and turned his face towards Jerusalem. It is also some proof, that Hazael which took Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murdered Benbadad, because he could not at that time but be of good years, being, as it seemeth, the second person in the kingdom, and commander of Benbadad's men of war. To this Hazael, be he the first or second, succeeded,

8. Benbadad the 3d, whom Joash, king of Israel, thrice overthrew.

9. Rezin, or Rezin the last, who joined with Pekab, king of Israel, against Juda, at which time Achaz, king of Juda, waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now between Benbadad the 3d, and Rezin the last, Nicholaus Damascenus finds 3 other kings of the Adads, which make 12 in all.

For the rest of the princes of Syria, which were but Reguli, as those of ⁱ*Emath*, and Gessur, we find that Tobu was king of Emath, or Chamath in David's time, to whom he sent his son Joram with presents, after David's victory against Adadezer. Also ^k*Sennacherib* speaketh of a king of Emath, but nameth him not.

S E C T. IV.

Of other lesser kingdoms of the Syrians, which being brought under the Affyrians, never recovered themselves again.

OF Gessur we find two kings named, to wit, Talmi, and his father Ammibur. To Talmi, whose daughter David married, it was that Abalom fled, who was his maternal grandfather. Of the kings of Sophena, or Syria, Soba, or Cœlesyria, there are two named, Rebob, or Rechob, the father of Adadezer, and Adadezer himself; and it is plain, that after his death, the seat of the kings of Soba, was transferred to Damascus, a city better fitting their greatness. After, Rezin became lord of both principalities. And the race of these kings of Syria (which became so potent, and joined Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the desert of Arabia, with other provinces, into one, under Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with David, so it ended at once with the kingdom of Israel. For Abaz king of Juda, waged the Affyrian Teglatphalassar against Pekab, king of Israel, and against Rezin, the last king of Damascus; which Teglatb first invaded Damascena, and the region of Soba, and took Damascus it self; and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the inhabitants captive. This was the second time that the Affyrians attempted Israel: for first, Phul Belochus entered the borders thereof (Menabem governing Israel) who stop'd the enterprize of Phul, with a thousand talents of silver: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree we will examine hereafter, being scarce warm as yet in his seat at Babylon, which he, with the help of his companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus; having besides this king of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the king of Israel, for that present time. But his son Teglath, following the purpose of his father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the war begun between Israel and Judah, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapt in that war, and wasted in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz king of Judah, his impress and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, he carried it (as is before remembred) and then with great ease possess'd himself of the cities of Nephthulim, leading with him a great part of the people captive. And his son Salmanassar, whom Ptolemy calleth Nabonassar, after the revolt of Hosea, forced Samaria, and rent that kingdom asunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the race and monarchy of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglath slaughtered, the kingdom of Israel in Hosea, whom Salmanassar overturned, happened near about a time; that of Ninus, in the days of Belochus, and the other two in the days of Teglathphalassar, and Salmanassar his son. For Sardanapalus perished, Osia ruling Judah; and the other two kingdoms were dissolved, Achaz yet living.

Lastly, The kingdom of Judah itself being attempted by Sennacherib, the son of Salmanassar, in vain, and preserved for the time by God, miraculously, was at length utterly overturned. Jerusalem and the temple burnt, an hundred thirty-two years after the captivity of Israel and Samaria; the destruction of Israel being in the ninth year of Hosea; that of Judah in the 11th of Zedekiah. Now the emperors of Affyria and Babylon, held also the kingdom of Syria, from the eighth year of Salmanassar, to the last of Baltassar, whom Herodotus calleth Labynitus; in all about two hundred years. After these, the Persians, from Cyrus to Darius their last king, held Syria about two hundred years.

Then Alexander Macedon took this among other provinces of the Persian empire; and his successors the Seleucide reigned therein, till it became subject to the power of the Romans, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turk, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the nations bordering upon the Israelites, with whom they had most to do, both in war and peace, being the only people, whose history in those ancient times carried an assured face of truth.

C H A P. XII.

Of the tribe of Benjamin, and of Jerusalem.

S E C T. I.

Of divers memorable places in the tribe of Benjamin, whereof Jericho, Gilgal, Mitspah, Bethel, Rama, Gobah, and Gibha.

Of the tribe of Benjamin, the twelfth and youngest son of Jacob, whom he had by Rachel, there were mustered at mount Sinai, 35000 able bodies; all which perishing in the deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their issues, 45600 fit to bear arms: and these had their territory on this side Jordan, between Judah and Ephraim. The cities within this tribe, nearest Jordan, are Lod, Hadid, and Ono; of which Lod and Ono were built by Shemed, a Benjamite, 1 Chron. viii. 12. they were all three re-inhabited with Benjamites, after the return out of captivity, as is mentioned, Nehem. xi. 35. and Esdras ii. 35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes besides Hadid in Nehemiah, a city called Lothadid. This Hadid, or Chadid, was rebuilt by Simon Maccabeus, 1 Mac. xii. 38.

Samarim, or Tjemaraim, named of Tjemary, one of the sons of Canaan, was another of their cities; and further into the land standeth Jericho, one of the toparchies, and the last of Judah; seated in a most fruitful valley, adorned with many palm-trees, and therefore elsewhere called the city of Palms, 1 Kings xvii. 36. From the time of Joshua, who utterly destroyed it, it lay waste until the time of Achab; in whose days Isriel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it in the loss of Abiram his eldest son, and built the gates of it in the loss of his youngest son Segub, according to the curse of Joshua; in which, and other respects, Hosea xii. 14. calleth Joshua a prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Vespasian, and rebuilt by Adrian.

To the south-east of Jericho, stood Halmon of the Levites, of which Josh. xxi. 18. to the south, Bethabara, of which Josh. xv. and xviii. then that Gilgal, of which there is so much mention in the scripture, where Joshua first eat of the fruits of the land; circumcised all those born in the deserts, and celebrated the passover.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the etymology of this name (for it seems by the place, Deut. xi. 30. that the name was known before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Josh. v. 9. Ob devolutionem probri Aegyptiaci, because their foreskins (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled down the hill; which from thence was called Collis preputiorum. This Gilgal was also called Geliloth, as appears by comparing the places, Josh. xv. 7. and xviii. 17. For it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Josh. xxii. 13. and Geliloth signifieth borders. It stood (tho' in some distance) directly eastward, over-against the two hills Garzim and Iabal, Deut. xi. 29. upon the one of which, the blessings, and on the other the cursings were to be read to the people, both being the mountains of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it and Mitspah of Benjamin (of which also we read oft in the scripture) were seated about the midst of the length of the land of Canaan; for which reason Samuel chose these two places, to either of which he came yearly to give judgment to the Israelites; of which two Gilgal (as is said) was near Jordan on the east-side of this tribe, and Mitspa near the west sea, towards the land of the Philistines.

The third place which is named with these two, whither also Samuel used yearly to come, is Bethel; which also was seated in this tribe of Benjamin. But to return to Gilgal which was the first place, where the ark resided, after they pass'd over Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kirjath-jeharim, and at length to Jerusalem) here in Gilgal it was that Joshua pitched up the twelve stones which were taken out of the channel of Jordan when it was dry, that the Israelites might pass over it; by which story, as it is set down Josh. iv. it appears, that the same day that they passed over Jordan they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the king of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitspah, whither Samuel came yearly to give judgment, there also were often the greatest meetings held, as that for the revenge of the Levite's wife against Gibba, and the Benjamites, Judg. xxi. 1. and another against the Philistines, 1 Sam. vii. 12. Thither also Judas Maccabeus gathered the Jews (when Jerusalem was possess'd by the heathen) as it is 1 Mac. iii. 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added; Quia locus orationi fuerat Mitspæ antea Israeli. Touching this Mitspa, to avoid confusion, it is to be remembred, that the scriptures mention four places of this name: Mitspa of Judah, of which Josh. xv. 38. ^a Mitspa of Gilead, of which we have spoken already in the tribe of Gad: Mitspa of the Moabites, where David for a while held himself, commending his parents to the king of Moab, 1 Sam. xxii. 3. and lastly, this chief Mitspa of the Benjamites. And as in this place the chief meetings were held, both before Jerusalem was recovered from the Jebusites, and also in the time of the Maccabees, as we have said, when Jerusalem was held by the wicked under Antiochus, so also in the time of Jeremy, after the destruction of the temple by the Chaldees, Geduliah, whom Nabuchodonosor left in Jewry, as governour over those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place; until (to the great hurt of the Jews) he was slain by the treason of Ishmael, one of the royal blood of Judah, as it is Jeremiah xli.

^a Josh. 6. 29. ^b 1 Chron. 6. 60. This Halmon is called Halemeth, whence they make a new city Almath, as if this tribe had given provinces to the Levites. ^c 1 Sam. 7. 15. ^d Junius in this place for Bethel, reads Domum Dei totius, and interprets it Kirjath-jeharim, where the ark abode: For, justit he, by the law, Exod. 23. 17. the greatest meetings in their annual feasts, were to be where the ark was; but this place doth not speak of festival, but of judicial meetings: and besides, the priests did use to bring the ark to their great meetings, wheresoever they were, as appears 1 Sam. 12. 11. and c. 14. 18. neither is it easy to expound Bethel, otherwise than for the city Bethel, tho' Junius also takes it for the place where the ark was, 1 Sam. 10. 3.

Near unto this Mitspa, the scripture mentioneth Beth-car, 1 Sam. vii. 11. after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the stone of help: where Samuel pitched up the pillar or stone, for a trophy against the Philistines.

Touching Bethel, which, as it seems, was the third place where Samuel held his chief meetings for the ministring of justice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the issue of Joseph (tho' it belonged to the portion of Benjamin, as it is Nehemiah xi. 31. and Joshua xviii. 22.) and how another city called Luz, Josh. xvi. 2. near adjoining to it, was built by the man of the city, which shewed the entrance to the spies, as it is Judges i. and of the occasion of the name from Jacob's vision; and how Jeroboam, by erecting one of his calves here, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it ^b Beth-aven, that is, the house of vanity, Hosea iv. 15. and x. 5. as also other memorable things of this place; they are so well known out of the histories of the scripture, that we may well pass them over.

The territory of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the kingdom of the ten tribes, from the time of the great victory of Abia against Jeroboam (of which 2 Chron. xiii.) was taken from them, and adjoined to the kingdom of Judah; and so it continued, as appears by the story of Josiah, which performed the prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2 Kings xxiii. whence those counts, 1 Mac. xi. 34.

are called Aphærema, which Greek word signifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the ten tribes. It was one of the three Seignories, or Presectures which Demetrius, in his epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Jews, out of the Samaritan country. A part of it, as appears 2 Chron. xiii. 19. was Hephraim, which Josh. xviii. 23. is called Hophram, belonging to this tribe of Benjamin.

Not far from this Bethel, in this tribe, we find three other cities often mentioned in the scriptures, Rama, Gibba, and Gebab. Of the name Rama, ^c it is noted already in the description of Ephraim, that there were many towns so high called, because of their high situation: but whereas they find out Rama in the tribe of Judah (as it seems, because Matthew ii. it appears that it bordered Bethlehem) and also out of Brochard and Breidenbach, make Silo to have been called Rama, and find yet another Rama in Zabulon; these three have no warrant in the scripture. Of Rama, in the tribe of Asher, as it seems, we have testimony, Josh. xix. 29. and of another in Nephthalim, Josh. xix. 36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in mount Ephraim, 1 Sam. xxv. 1. which more often is called ^d Ramatha, and 1 Sam. i. 1. Ramatbaim Tso-phim; for which the Septuagint have Aramatbaim-sophim, taking the article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they think Joseph of Arimathea, Matth. xxvii. 57. was denominated.

Of a fourth Rama, we read 2 Kings viii. 29. which is Ramoth in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Benjamin, seated, as we said, near Bethel, the uttermost south border of the kingdom of the ten tribes; for which cause Baasha, in the time of Asa, king of Judah fortified it, to hinder those that did fly from him to Asa. Of this Rama, or Ramatha, I should rather think Joseph was, that buried Christ, because it was nearer to Jerusalem, and after the captivity belonged to Judah, as it appears, Esd. ii. 26. wherein that it is joined with Gebab, it is plain, that he speaketh of that Rama, with whose stones (after Baasha had ceased to build it) Asa (as it is 1 Kings xxv. 22.) built Gebab adjoining to it, both being in Benjamin. And as Rama was the south border of the ten tribes, so was Gebab the north border of the kingdom of Judah; whence 2 Kings xxiii. 8. we read, that Josiah, thro' all his kingdom, even from Gebab, which was the north border to Beer-sheba, which was the south border, destroyed the places of idolatry.

The third city Gibba, which was the city of Saul (the wickedness of which city, in the time of the judges, had almost utterly rooted out this tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebab, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguished, Isaiah x. 27.) of which word ^e Gibba, in another form Gibbath, he imagineth Gibaath, another city in this tribe, making two of one. The vicinity of this city also to Rama of Benjamin, appears, Judg. xix. 13. where the Levite with his wife, not able to reach to Rama, took up his lodging at Gibba. By that place of 1 Sam. xxii. 6. it seems, that there was in this Gibba some tower or citadel, called Rama, where Junius reads, in excelsu, for in Rama:

^a It was no other than this Mitspa of Gilead, of which Josh. 11. 8. as appears by that which is added, versus orientem: for Joshua notes the three quarters, north, west, and east, to which he followed the Canaanites; tho' Adrichomius, and others, out of this place, imagine a Mitpa, or Mispha (as they write it) in the tribe of Asher. ^b Borrowing the name of a neighbour town in the confines of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel, between Hai and Bethel, Josh. 7. 2. and 18. 12. ^c See c. 9. 1etl. 1. ^d Of this Ramatha, I understand the place 1 Mac. 11. 34. where it is named for one of the three presectures, which Demetrius yields to the Jews out of the country of Samaria; this lying toward the east to Jericho, and Lydda toward the west; and Aphærema (of which even now we speak) lying in the midst, between the two other. A sixth Rama it seems there was in the tribe of Simeon, toward the south, and which Josh. 19. 7, 8. called Ramah of the south, and otherwise Bahalath-beer. ^e Gibba in construction, that is, governing a genitive case, is Gibbath, whence the Vulgar out of the Septuagint read Josh. 24. 33. Gabaath Phinees; for which Junius hath Collis Phineas (for this word is oft times an appellation, signifying a hill) but Adrichomius taking notice of this, builds his city Gabaath upon this text, and placeth it in Benjamin, when as the words adjoined note that this hill was in the mountains of Ephraim.

but it may be, that the name of the king's palace in this city was Rama, as it seems, that in Rama of Samuel, the name of the chief place where Samuel with the college of prophets abode, was Nai-oth. The great city of Hai, overthrown by Josbua, which Josb. vii. 2. is placed near Beth-aven, upon the east of Bethel, was in this tribe, as is proved, Nehemiah vii. x. xxx. tho' it be not named by Josbua xviii. for it was burned by him, and laid desolate, as it is, Josb. viii. 28. In solitudinem in tumulum perpetuum. Another city of chief note, reckoned Josb. xviii. 25. in this tribe, was Gibbon, the chief city of the Hivites, whose cunning, to bind the Israelites by oath to save their lives, is set down, Josb. ix. whence they were reckoned among the Nethinæi, or profelytes, and were bound to certain publick services in the house of God; which oath of saving these Gibeonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine, 2 Sam. xxi. 1. This Gibeon, or Gibbon, which Almon and Jebab (of both which we have spoken) and with Hanothoth, the native place of Jeremiah the prophet, were said, Josb. xxi. 28. to be given to the Levites by the Benjamites. Near to this Hanothoth was Nob, as appears 1 Kings ii. 26. where Abiathar the priest, which was of Nob, before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanothoth. It is reckoned in the tribe of Benjamin, Nehemiah ix. 31. and tho' in the time of Saul, the residing place of the ark was in Kirjath-jearim, yet by the the lamentable tragedy of bloodshed, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set down, 1 Sam. xxi. and xxii.) in the judgment of Junius, it is proved, that the tabernacle was there for a time.

Micmas also in this tribe, Nehemiah ix. 31. was a place of fame, of which Isaiah x. 28. where also he nameth Gallim and Migrom in this tribe. In Micmas, Saul had his camp, 1 Sam. xiii. 2. (when he left Gibba to Jonathan) and there also was Jonathan Maccabeus's abode, 1 Mac. ix. 73. Of Giscala in Galilee, Josephus often maketh mention; but of any here in Benjamin, which they make the native place of St. Paul, whence, they say, when it was taken by the Romans, he sailed with his parents to Tharsis: Of this I find no good warrant. Other places of less importance I omit, and come to the city of Jerusalem, and the princes and governours of this city; a great part whereof was in the tribe of Benjamin, whence Josb. xviii. 28. it is named among the cities of Benjamin.

SECT. II.

Of divers memorable things concerning Jerusalem.

AT what time Jerusalem was built (which afterwards became the princess of all cities) it doth not appear. Some there are, who imagine, that Melchisedec was the founder thereof in Abraham's time. But ^b according to others, that city out of which Melchisedec encountred Abraham (in his return from the overthrow of the Assyrian and Persian kings or captains, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the river of Jordan, in the half tribe of Manasseh, bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greeks, Solima.

Jerusalem (whensoever, or by whom built) was a principal city in Josbua's time; yet not so renowned as Flazor the metropolis (in those days and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek, whom Josbua slew, was then king of Jerusalem. That it was belonging to the Jebusites it is manifest: for how long soever they held it before Moses's time, they were masters and lords thereof almost four hundred years after him, even till David won it; and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Jebusæi (the children of Jebuseus, the son of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Jebus. And so much did that nation rely on the strength of the place, as when David attempted it, they bragg'd, that their lame, and blind, and impotent people should defend it.

David, after he had, by God's assistance, possess'd it, and turned out the Jebusites, gave it an exceeding great increase of circuit; strengthened it with a citadel or castle, and beautified it with many palaces, and other buildings, changing the name from Jebussalem, the city of the Jebusites, to Jerusalem, which the Greeks call Hierosolyma. After David's time, ^d*Solomon* amplified, beautified, and strengthened it exceedingly: for, besides the work of the temple, which was no less admirable than renowned among all nations; the palaces, gates and walls, could not any where in the world be exempl'd: and besides that, it had an hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had sixty foot of depth, cut out of the very rock, and two hundred fifty foot of breadth, whereof the like hath seldom been heard of either since or before.

After the death of Solomon, and that the kingdom of the Jews was cut asunder, ^e*Shishac* king of Egypt, and his predecessor, having bred up for that purpose Adad the Idumean, and Jeroboam, Solomon's servant; and both married to Egyptians; the state by the one disturbed, by the other broken, ^f*Shishac* first invaded the territory of Judah, entered Jerusalem and sack'd it; and became master, not only of the riches of Solomon, but of all those spoils which David had gotten from Adadazer, Tobu, the Ammonites and other nations. It was again sack'd, and a part of the wall thrown down by Joas king of Israel, while ^g*Amaziab* the twelfth king thereof governed Judah.

Not long after, Achaz, the 15th king of Juda, impoverished the temple, and presented Teglatphalassar with the treasures thereof. And ^h*Manasseh* the son of Ezekiah, the son of Achaz, by the vaunts made by Ezekiah to the ambassadors of Merodach, lost the remain, and the very bottom of their treasures. It was again spoiled by the Babylonians, Joachim then reigning. But this ungrateful, idolatrous, and rebellious nation, taking no warning by these God's gentle corrections and afflictions, but persisting in all kind of impiety, filling the city even to the mouth with innocent blood, God raised up that great ⁱ*Babylonian* king, Nabuchodonosor, as his scourge and revenger, who making this glorious city and temple, with all the palaces therein, and the walls and towers which embraced them, even and level with the dust, carried away the spoils with the princes and people, and crush'd them with the heavy yoke of bondage and servitude full seventy years; insomuch, as Zion was not only become as a torn and plowed up field, Jerusalem a heap of stone and rubble, the mountain of the temple as a grove, or wood of thorns and briars; but (as ^k*Jerome* speaketh) even the birds of the air scorn'd to fly over it, or the beasts to tread on that defiled soil.

^a The word Nethinim or Nethinæi, is as much as dati (as it were à Deo dati) or as Junius expounds it, dedititii, is used, 1 Chron. 9. 2. and in Eldras and Nehemiah often. ^b See in the latter half of Manasseh. ^c 2 Sam. 5. 6. ^d Jos. cont. App. 1. 1. Strabo, Geog. 1. 16. ^e 2 Chron. 12. ^f 2 Kings 14. ^g 2 Kings 16. ^h 1 Chron. 5. 16. ⁱ 2 Kings 25. ^j 2 Kings 19. 2 Par. 18. ^k Mich. 3. Hier. 25. 26. 29.

Then seventy years being expired, according to the prophecy of ^a*Daniel*, and the Jews, by the grace of Cyrus, returned, the temple was again built, tho' with interruption and difficulty enough, and the city meanly inhabited, and without walls, or other defences, for some sixty and odd years, till ^b*Nebe-miab*, by the favour of Artaxerxes, rebuilt them. Then again was the temple and city spoiled by Bago-fes, or Vagofes, lieutenant of Artaxerxes; after, by ^c*Ptolomeus I*; then by Antiochus Epiphanes; and again by Apollonius his lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed; tho' Crassus, in his Parthian expedition, took as much as he could of that which Pompey spared.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious tyrants, were commonly recompensed by the industry or bounty of good princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberality of strangers. Before the captivity, the people of the land, thro' the exhortation of godly kings, made many and large offerings to repair the temple of Solomon. The wrong done by Ptolomeus Lagi to the second temple, was requited by the bounty of his son Ptolomeus Philadelphus. The mischief wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes, and his followers, was amended partly by the great offerings which were sent to Jerusalem out of other nations. Finally, all the losses, which either the city or temple had endured, might well seem forgotten in the reign of ^d*Herod*, that usurping and wicked, but magnificent king, who amplified the city, new built the temple, and with many sumptuous works, did so adorn them, that he left them far more stately and glorious, than they had been in the days of Solomon.

SECT. III.

Of the destruction of Jerusalem, by the Romans.

IN this flourishing estate, it was, at the coming of our Saviour Christ Jesus; and after his death and ascension it so continued about forty years: but then did Titus the Roman, being stirred up by God to be the revenger of Christ's death, and to punish the Jews sinful ingratitude, encompass it with the Roman army, and became lord thereof. He began the siege at such time as the Jews, from all parts, were come up to the celebration of the passover; so as the city was then filled with many hundred thousands of all sorts, and no manner of provision or store for any such multitudes. An extreme famine, with the civil dissension, oppress'd them within the walls; a forcible enemy assailed them without. The Idumeans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Jews kingdom, thrust themselves into the city, on purpose to betray it, who also burnt the temple, when Nabuchodonosor took it. And to be short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging, to the consummation of the victory, ^eeleven hundred thousand souls; and the city was so beaten down, and demolished, as those which came afterwards to see the desolation thereof, could hardly believe that there had been any such place or habitation: only the three Herodian towers (works most magnificent, and overtopping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Roman garisons, as that thereby their victory might be the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and state remaining, after-ages might judge what the rest were; and their honour be the greater and more shining that there-over became victorious.

After this, such Jews as were scattered here and there in Judæa, and other provinces, began again to inhabit some part of the city; and by degrees to rebuild it, and to strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and tributaries to the Roman state; but after sixty-five years, when they again offered to revolt, and rebel, Ailius Adrianus the emperor, slaughtered many thousands of them, and overturned those three Herodian towers, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himself had foretold; That there should not stand one stone upon another, of that ungrateful city. Afterwards, when his fury was appeased, and the prophecy accomplished, he took one part without the wall, wherein stood Mount Calvary, and the sepulchre of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he again made it a city of great capacity, and called it after his own name, Ælia Capitolia. In the gate toward Bethel, he caused a fow to be cut in marble, and set in the front thereof, which he did in despite of the Jews nation; making an edict, that they should not from thenceforth ever enter into the city, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place overtopping it.

But the Christian religion flourishing in Palæstina, it was inhabited at length by all nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued five hundred years.

It was afterwards in the 636th year after Christ, taken by the ^f*Egyptian Saracens*, who held it 400 and odd years.

In the year 1099, it was regained by Godfrey of Bouillon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens; which ^g*Godfrey*, when he was elected king thereof, refused to be crowned with a crown of gold, because Christ, for whom he fought, was therein crowned with thorns. After this recovery, it remained under the successors of Godfrey eighty eight years: till in the year 1197, it was regained by Saladine of Egypt: and lastly, in the year 1517, in the time of Selim, the Turks cast out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzum-barec, or the Holy city. Neither was it Jerusalem alone, that hath so oftentimes been beaten down and made desolate, but all the great ages of the world have with their inhabitants, in several times and ages, suffered the same shipwreck. And it hath been God's just will, to the end others might take warning, if they would; not only to punish the impiety of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by slavery; but he hath revenged himself of the very places they possess'd; of the walls and building; yea, of the soil, and the beasts that fed thereon.

For, even that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect lost all her fertility, and fruitfulness; witness the many hundreds of thousands, which it fed in the days of the kings of Judah and Israel; it being at this time all over, in effect, exceeding stony and barren. It also pleased God, not only to consume with fire from heaven, the cities of the Sodomites; but the very soil it self hath felt, and doth feel, the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beasts that belonged to Amalek, no not any small number of them, to be sacrificed to himself; neither was it enough that Achan himself was stoned, but that his moveables were also consumed and brought to ashes.

SECT. IV.

Of the vain and malicious reports of heathen writers, touching the ancient Jews.

OF the original of the Jews, prophane writers have conceived diversly and injuriously. Quintilian speaks infamously of them, and of their leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Egyptians. Others affirm, that while Isis governed Egypt, the people were so increased, as Ierosolymus and Judas led thence a great multitude of that nation, with whom they planted the neighbour regions; which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidental, because he was taken up and saved out of the waters. But Justin, of all others most malicious, doth derive the Jews from the Syrian kings; of whom Damascus, saith he, was the first; and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He again supposeth (somewhat contrary to himself) that Israel had 10 sons, among whom he divided the land of Juda; so called of Judas his eldest, who had the greatest portion. The youngest of the sons of Israel he calleth Joseph; who being brought up in Egypt, became learned in magical arts, and in the interpretations of dreams, and signs prodigious, and this Joseph, saith he, was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foul diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished Egypt. Further, he telleth how these men thus banished, when in the desarts they suffered extream thirst and famine, and therein found relief the 7th day, for this cause ever after observed the 7th day, and kept it holy; making it a law among themselves, which afterwards became a branch of their religion. He addeth also, that they might not marry out of their own tribes, lest discovering their uncleanness, they might also be expelled by other nations, as they were by the Egyptians. These and such like fables hath Justin.

Cornelius Tacitus, doth as grossly belie them in affirming, that in the inmost oratory of their temple, they had the golden head of an ass, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himself, having in the 5th book of his own history truly confessed of the Jews, that they worshipped one only God: and thought it most prophane to represent the Deity by any material figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature; and they had therefore in their temples, no image or representation, no not so much as in any city by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus; who also makes Judas with Idumca, the first parents of the Jews.

Claudius Iolaus draws them from Judeus, whose parents were Sparton and Thebis; whence it came, that the Spartans or Lacedemonians, challenged kindred of the Hebrews: but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Josephus. Some of these reports seem to have been gathered out of divine letters; tho' wrested and perverted according to the custom of the heathen. For so they obscured and altered the story of the creation, of paradise, of the flood; and given new names to the children of Adam in the first age; to Noah and his sons, in the second; and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the rest of the fathers, and leaders of the Hebrews; all which feignings, as touching the Jews and their originals, Josephus against Appion, and Tertullian have sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrews were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and the Chaldeans originally taking name either of Heber, the son of Sale, or else, saith Montanus, of wandering, as is before remembred. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greek grammarian, derive the Hebrews or Jews, from Arabon; having mistaken the name of Abraham, who was the son of Heber, in the 6th descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abram; for after Jacob, otherwise Israel, the chief part were called Israel, another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being most of the tribe of Juda, honoured the name of Judas, the son of Jacob, and became Judeans or Jews; as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the son of Joseph, the chief of the patriarchs of the ten tribes; the rest of the ten tribes were comprehended, but were first rooted out when the kingdom of Israel fell. The Judeans continued their names, though they suffered the same servitude not long after, under Nabuchodonosor.

The government which this nation underwent, was first paternal: which continued till they served the Egyptians. They were secondly ruled by their captains and leaders, Moses and Joshua, by a policy divine. Thirdly, they subjected themselves to judges. Fourthly, they desired a king, and had Saul for the first: of whom and his successors, before we intreat, we are first to speak of their government under judges, after the death of Joshua; with somewhat of the things of fame in other nations about these times.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the memorable things that happened in the world, from the death of Joshua, to the war of Troy; which was about the time of Jephtha.

SECT. I.

Of the Inter-regnum after Joshua's death: and of Othoniel.

WHEN Joshua was now dead, who with the advice of the 70 elders, and the high priest, held authority over the people, and ordered that common-wealth: it pleased God to direct the tribe of Juda (in whom the kingdom was afterwards established) to undertake the war against the Canaanites, over whom (with God's favour, and the assistance of Simeon) they became victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they not only slew 10000, but made Adonibezek prisoner; the greatest and cruellest commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizzites. This tyrant's cruelty, as elsewhere hath been signified, they returned in the same kind upon his own head: and so by the torments which he now felt in his own person (before no otherwise known unto him, but by his malicious imagination) made him confess and acknowledge God's just judgment against himself.

The tribes of Juda and Simeon did also master and possess, during this Inter-regnum (or, as some think, before the death of Joshua) the cities of Azotus, Askalon, Ekron, and Jerusalem, which they burnt, and the Jebusites afterwards re-edified. They took also the cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriath-jepher, and Zephatb, afterwards Horma. And altho' it be not set down in express words, that any one person commanded in chief over the people, as Moses and Joshua did; yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authority amongst them, and that he with the advice of Phinees directed and ordered their wars. For if any think that they proceeded without a chief, the good success which followed their undertakings witnesseth the contrary. And it was Caleb, even while Joshua governed, as appears Josh. x. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the captains; for the performance of which enterprize, he promised his daughter Achafab: which he performed to Othoniel his younger brother after the conquest: whose behaviour in that service was such, as (next unto the ordinance of God) it gave him the greatest reputation among them, and it may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Judge soon after. But while those of Juda made war with their borderers, from whom they only recovered the mountainous countries (for they could not drive out the inhabitants of the vallies, ^a because they had chariots of iron.) The rest of the tribes sought also to enlarge and establish their own territories; in which war they laboured with variable success; for as the house of Joseph recovered ^b Bethel or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recover from Dan all the plain countries; and forc'd them to save themselves in the mountains. And now the Israelites unmindful of God's benefits, and how often he had miraculously afore-time defended them, and made them victorious over their enemies (the elders being also consumed, who better advised them in the Inter-regnum) did not only join themselves in marriage with the heathen nations; but (that which was more detestable) they served the idols of Baal, and Ashteroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God whom they had provoked with their idolatry, deliver them into the hands of the Aramites of Mesopotamia; whom Chusban Rishathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the smart of God's displeasure against them 8 years, it pleased him to have compassion on his people, and to raise up ^c Othoniel to be their judge and leader; who by God assisted, delivered his brethren from oppression, and inforc'd the Aramites to return into their own desarts, and into Mesopotamia adjoining; after which the Israelites had peace 40 years, during all the time of Othoniel's government. This Othoniel is thought by Tostatus to have been the younger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the book of Judges he is twice called Othoniel the son of Cenaz, Caleb's younger brother. Others do rather interpret those words (Caleb's younger brother) as if they signified the meanest of his kindred. Indeed it is not likely, that Caleb's daughter should marry with her own uncle; yet it follows not therefore, that Othoniel should have been the meanest of the kindred. Wherefore we may better think, that he was the nephew of Caleb (as some learned men expound it) and as the very words of scripture seem to enforce. For Caleb was the son of Jephunneh, and Othoniel the son of Cenaz, Caleb's younger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his younger brother's son; to whom it was not only lawful, but commendable, to marry with his cousin german Caleb's daughter.

How long it was from the death of Joshua, to the government of Othoniel, it cannot be found; but it seems to have been no short time: for many wars were made in that space against the people of the land. Laiſh was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best writers are of opinion, that between the times of Joshua and Othoniel, that civil war broke out between the Benjamites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Lewite's wife. For it is written, that in those days there was no king in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes. And as ^d Juda led the people against the Canaanites, during the Inter-regnum, so was he commanded to do against Benjamin, even by the Lord God, whose direction they craved, as wanting a judge to appoint what should be done, which sheweth it to have been when Joshua was dead, and before the government of Othoniel; especially, considering, that all other times wherein they wanted governours, were spent under such oppression of strangers, as would have given them no leave to have attended such a civil war; if their power had been as great, as it was in the managing of this action, wherein they so weakned the body of their estate, by effusion of blood, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such numbers, as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies.

SECT. II.

Of the memorable things of this age, of other nations; and of the difficulty in the computation of times.

There lived in this age of Othoniel, Pandion, or Pandareus, according to Homer, the 5th king of Athens; who began to rule in the 20th year of Othoniel, and governed 40 years. He was father to Erietheus: his daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes; of whose daughter Semele was born, Dionysius or Liber Pater; under whom Linus the musician lived. In his time also the cities of Melus, Paphus, and Tbarsus were built.

Ida and Daetylus flourished in this age, who are said to have found out the use of iron: but Genesis hath taught us the contrary, and that ^e Tubalcain wrought cunningly both in iron and brass. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus governed Thebes; whom divers chronologers find in Ehud's time. But St. Augustine making a repetition of these fables, which were devised among the Grecians, and other nations, during the government of the judges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is as little agreement. Vives, upon the 13th chapter of St. Augustine de Civitate Dei, and the 18th book, hath gathered all the opinions of this man's progeny, where he that desires his pedigree may find it. Lactantius and Eusebius make him native of Attica, and the son of Eleusius king of Eleusina: which Eleusius, by careful industry, had fed the people of that territory, in the time of a great famine. This, when upon the like occasion Triptolemus could not perform, fearing the fury of the people, he fled thence by sea in a kind of galley or long boat, which carried in her prow an engraven or carved serpent; who because he made exceeding great speed to return, and to relieve his people with corn, from some neighbour nation; it was feigned by the poets, that his coach was carried by serpents through the air.

Whether the times of these kings, which lived together with Othoniel, and after him with the rest of the judges, and kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set down, I cannot avow; for the chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars; to examine all which,

^a Judg. i. 19. ^b Judg. i. 25. Judg. i. 32. ^c Judg. 3. 10. ^d Judg. 17, 18, and 19. ^e Gen. 4. 22. B'cause some would would require the whole time of a long life ; and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I err with others of better judgment. For whether Eusebius, and all that follow him, or his opposites (who made themselves so conversant with these ancient kings, and with the very year when they began to rule) have hit the mark of time, of all other the farthest off, and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the authors themselves, from whom the ancientest chronologers have borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their own works, but conjecture : secondly, because their own disagreement and contention in those elder days, with that of our own age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any man's understanding, save his own, but that he is greatly distracted, after what pattern to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not only in the reigns of heathen kings and princes ; but even in the computation of those times, which the indisputable authority of holy scripture hath summed up, as in that of Abraham's birth ; and after in the times of the judges, and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression, to the building of Solomon's temple, in the Persian empire, the 70 weeks ; and in what not ? Wheresoever the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposite, and contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men have sought by so many ways to uncover the sun, that the days thereby are made more dark, and the clouds more condens'd than before : I can therefore give no other warrant, than other men have done in these computations ; and therefore that such and such kings and kingdoms took beginning in this or that year, I avow it no otherwise, than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least a private opinion ; which I submit to better judgments. Nam in priscis rebus veritas non ad unguem querenda ; In ancient things we are not to require an exact narration of the truth, says Diodore.

SECT. III.

Of Ehud's time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tityus, Admetus, and others that lived about these times.

AFTER the death of Othoniel, when Israel fell back to their former idolatry, God encouraged Moab to invade and suppress them ; to perform which, he joined the forces of Ammon, and Amalek unto his own, and so (as all kind of misery readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time withdrawn his help from, thereby to make them feel the difference between his grace and his displeasure) these heathen neighbouring nations, had an easy conquest over Israel ; whom God himself exposed to those perils ; within which they were so speedily folded up. In this miserable estate they continued full eighteen years, under Eglon king of the Moabites, and his confederates. Yet as the mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his ears from their crying repentance ; but raised up Ehud the son of Gera to deliver them ; by which weak man, tho' maimed in his right-hand, yet confident in the justness of his quarrel, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers, to contend with the head of those valiant nations ; he resolved to attempt upon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguish, he assured himself of the following victory ; especially giving his nation no time to re-establish their government, or to choose a king to command, and direct them in the wars. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an ambassador to Eglon, laden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining private access upon the pretence of some secret to be revealed ; he pierced his body with a poniard, made on purpose, with a double edge ; and shutting the doors of his closet upon him, escaped.

It may seem that being confident of his good success, he had prepared the strength of Israel in readiness. For suddenly after his return, he did repass Jordan, and invading the territory of Moab, overthrew their army consisting of 10000 able and strong men ; whereof not any one escaped. After which victory, and that Samgar his successor had miraculously slain 600 Philistines with an ox goad ; the land and people of Israel lived in peace, unto the end of 80 years, from the death of Othoniel ; which term expired in the world's year 2691.

In the days of Ehud, Naomi with Flimelech her husband, and with her two sons, travelled into Moab ; and so the story of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the 80 years which are given to Ehud, it was that Orcus king of the Molossians, otherwise Pluto, stole Proserpina, as she walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hipponium in Sicilia ; or (according to Pausanias in Att.) by the river Cephissus, which elsewhere he calleth Chemus, if he mean not two distinct rivers. This stealth being made known to Pyrrhus, with whom Hercules and Theseus joined themselves, they agreed together to recover her ; but Pluto or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had, as they say, a very huge dog, which fastned on Pyrrhus, and tore him in pieces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him ; and by strength took and mastered the dog Cerberus ; whereof grew the fable of Hercules's delivering of Theseus out of hell. But Zeuxis, as I take it, hath written this story, somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrrhus, saith he, attempted to steal Proserpina daughter to Aidonius, king of the Molossians, who had Ceres to wife, the mother of Proserpina. Proserpina being a general name also for all fair women. This purpose of theirs being known to Aidonius, Theseus and Pyrrhus were both taken ; and because Pyrrhus was the principal in this conspiracy, and Theseus drawn on by a kind of affection or inforcement, the one was given for food to Aidonius's great dog Cerberus, the other held prisoner ; till Hercules by the instigation of Euristheus delivered him by a strong hand. The Molossi which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a people of Epirus, inhabiting near the mountains of Pindus ; of which mountains, Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himself. The river of Acheron (which the poets describe to be in hell) riseth out of the same hills. There is another nation of the Molossi in Thessaly ; but these are neighbours to the Cassiopei, saith Plutarch in his Greek questions.

The rape of Orithya the daughter of Erietheus, king of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The poets ascribe this rape to the north-wind, because Thrace is situate north from Athens. In his time also Tereus ravished Philomela, of which the fable was devised of her conversion into a nightingale. For Tereus having married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her sister, tore'd her in the passage, and withal cut out her tongue that she might not complain ; persuading Progne's wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way ; all which her brother-in-law's merciless behaviour towards her, Philomela express'd by her needle upon on cloth, and sent it to Progne. In revenge whereof Progne caused her only son Itys to be cut in pieces, and set before Tereus her husband, so dress'd as it appear'd to be some other ordinary food; of which when he had eaten his fill, she caused his head, hands, and feet, to be presented unto him; and then fled away with such speed towards Athens, where her father Pandion yet lived, as the poets feigned, that she was turned into a swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo finds to be Daulis in Phocis; and the tomb of Tereus, * Pausanias hath built near the rocks Mergi, in the territory of Athens. By which, as also by the name Daulis, where these things are supposed to have been done (whence also Philomela is called Daulias ales) it appears that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digression in his ^b Peloponnesian war, that this Tereus was not king in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odrysæ (as the poets call him Odrysus) but that Phocis, a country in Greece not far from Attica, a city whereof is called Daulia, was in Pandion's time inhabited by Thracians; of which this Tereus was king: whence Pandion, to have amity with his neighbours, made him his son-in-law; as it is good to believe, saith Thucydides, that Pandion king of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour king from whom he might have succour, rather than with any Tereus, that should have held the kingdom of Odrysæ, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the poets chose a swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seem to have been, partly because, as Pausanias says, Daulide nec nidificant, dec habitant in tota circum regione birundines; As if a swallow remembring the wrong that was there done to her, and her sister, did for ever after hate that place.

Near this time Melampus (who is said to have understood the voices of birds and beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent physician. He restored to their former health the daughters of ^c Prætus king of the Argives, who (as the poets please) were made mad by Juno; and thinking themselves to be kine, fled into the woods, fearing to be constrained to the plough; for in those countries, where the ground was light, they did use often to plough with kine.

In the 47th year of Ebud, Tros began to reign in Dardania, and gave it his own name; about which time Phemone, the chief priest of ^d Apollo in Delphos, devised the heroical verse.

Of the same date was Tantalus, king of Lydia; whom Eusebius makes king of Phrygia; and also of that part of which the people were anciently Mæones. Of Tantalus was devised the fable, that some poets have applied to the passion of love, and some to the covetous that dare not enjoy his riches. ^e Eusebius calls this Tantalus the son of Jupiter, by the nymph Pleta; Diaconus and Didymus in Zeze, give him another mother. He was said to be the son of Jupiter, as some will have it; because he had that planet in his ascendent, betokening wisdom and riches. It is said that when he made a feast to the gods, having nothing more precious, he caused his own son to be slain and dress'd for the banquet; of whom Ceres eat part of one of the shoulders; whereby was signified, that those men which seek after divine knowledge, prefer nothing on earth before it; no not the care of their own children, of all else the most dearest. And where it was devised, that he had always water and fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that tho' he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacy of the world, yet his mind being otherwise, and to higher desires transported, he enjoy'd no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Ovid:

Querit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in water seeks for water, and doth miss,
The fleeting fruit he catcheth at, his long tongue brought him this,

This punishment, they say, was inflicted upon him, for that he discovered the secrets of the gods: that is, because he taught wisdom and virtue to mortal men; which story Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly express'd in verse. Others expound this fable otherwise, and say, that Tantalus, tho' he excelled in riches, yet being thirsty of more abundance, was never satisfied. Of whom Horace against covetousness:

Tantalus a labiis sitiens fugientia captat Flumina. Quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirsting Tantalus doth catch at streams that from him flee.
Why laughest thou? the name but chang'd,
the tale is told of thee.

Others conceive, where it is feigned of Tantalus, that he gave the Nectar and Ambrosia of the gods to vain and unworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus.

Immortalitatem quod furatus,
Coætaniis convivis
Nectar Ambrosiamque dedit.

Because that stealing immortality,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia give
To guests of his own age to make them live.

Whereby it was meant, that the secrets of divinity, ought not to be imparted to the unpure Vulgar. For as the cleanest meats in a foul stomach, are therein corrupted; so the most high and reserved mysteries are often perverted, by an unclean and defiled mind.

To you it is given (saith Christ in St. Mark iv. 11.) to know the mystery of the kingdom of God, but unto them that are without all things be done in parables. So is it said of him in Mark iv. 34. that he expounded all things to his disciples apart. And therefore doth Gregory Nazianzen infer upon a place of St. Paul; ^f Quod si Paulo licuisset effari ea, quorum ipsi cognitionem cælum tertium & usque ad illud progressio suppeditavit, fortasse de Deo nobis aliquid amplius conslaret; If Paul might have uttered the things, the knowledge whereof the third heavens, and his going thither, did bring unto him, peradventure we might know somewhat more of God.

Pythagoras, saith Reuclin, thought it not the part of a wise man, Asino lyram exponere, aut mysteria, quæ ita reciperet, ut suis tubam, & fidem græculus, & unguenta scarabæus; quare silentium indixit discipulis, ne vulgo divinorum arcana patefacerent, quæ meditando facilius, quam loquendo apprehendantur; To set an ass to a harp, or to learn mysteries, which he would handle as a swine cloth a trumpet, or a jay a vial, or scarabees and unclean flies sovereign ointment: wherefore he commanded silence to his disciples, that they should not disclose divine mysteries to the common sort, which are easier learnt by meditation, than by babbling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their mysteries among their priests in certain hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might be hidden from the vulgar; and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of their covered meanings.

But to proceed with the cotemporaries of Aod, or Ehud, with him it is also said, that Tityus lived whom Apollo slew, because he sought to force his mother Latona. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the son of Elara, the daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloved of Jupiter, to avoid Juno's revenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where she was delivered of Tityus; whose mother dying, and himself therein nourished, he was therefore called the son of the earth. Pausanias speaking of the grave of this giant, affirms that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his stature out of Homer.

Porrectusque novem Tityus per jugera terræ, Assiduas atro viscere pascit aves.

Nine furlongs stretch'd lies Tityus, who for his wicked deeds
The hungry birds with his renewing liver daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruel and wicked tyrant of Panopea, a city in Phocis, it was feigned by the poets to the terror of others, that he was still eaten in hell by birds, and yet still lived, and had his flesh renewed.

Admetus king of Theffaly lived also in this age, whom, it is said, that Apollo first served as a herdsman, and afterwards for his excellent wit was by him advanced; but having slain Hyacinthus, he cross'd the Hellepont, and fled into Phrygia; where, together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in brick, for building of the walls of Troy, not by making the bricks leap into their places by playing on his harp; according to him in Ovid which saith:

Ilion aspicias, firmataque turribus altis, Maenia Apollinæ strueta Canore lyræ.

Strong Ilion thou shalt see with walls and towers high,
Built with the harp of wife
Apollo's harmony.

Thus the poets; but others, that he laboured with his hands, as hired in this work. And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megarians witness, saith Pausanias.

In these days also of Ehud, or (as some find it) in the days of Deborah, lived Perseus the son of Jupiter and Danae, by whose soldiers (as they failed out of Peloponnesus to seek their adventure on Africa side) Medusa the daughter and successor of Phorcus, being weakly accompanied as she hunted near the lake Triton, was surpriz'd and slain; whose beauty when Perseus beheld, he caused her head to be embalmed, and carried into Greece: the beauty whereof was such, and so much admired, and the beholders so astonished which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Medusa's head, were turned into stones.

Cecrops, the second of that name, and 7th king of Athens, and Acrisius the 13th, or after Eusebius the 14th king of the Argives, began also their reigns, as it is said, in the time of this judge; of which the first ruled 40 years; and the second, 31 years. Also Bellerophon lived in this age, being the son of Glaucus, the son of Sisyphus; who incited by Antea or Sthenobia the wife of Prætus of the Argives, to accompany her, but refusing it, she accused him to her husband that he offered to force her: whereupon Prætus sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affairs of weight, between him and his son-in-law Jobates; giving secret order to Jobates to dispatch him: but Jobates thinking it dishonourable to lay violent hands on him, employed him against Chymæra, a monster, vomiting or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pitying his innocency, sent him the wing'd horse Pegasus, sprung up of the blood of Medusa, formerly slain by the soldiers of Perseus in Africa, to transport; a horse that none other could master or bridle but Minerva: upon which beast Bellerophon overcame Chymæra, and performed the other services given him in charge; which done, as he returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to have slain him; but being victorious also over all these, he arrived to Jobates in safety; whom Jobates for his eminent virtues honoured, first, with one of his daughters, and afterward with his kingdom: after which he grew so insolent, as he attempted to fly up to heaven upon his Pegasus; whose pride Jupiter disclaiming, caused one of his stinging flies so to vex Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophon from his back, into the valley of Cilicia, where he died blind, of which burthen Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew back to heaven; and being fed in Jupiter's own stable, Aurora begg'd him of Jupiter to ride on before the sun. This tale is diversely expounded, as first by some, That it pleaseth God to relieve men in their innocent, and undeserved adversity, and to cast down those which are too high-minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon; that when he was exposed to extremum hazard, or rather certain death, he found both deliverance and honour; but waxing over-proud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, he was again thrown down into the extremity of sorrow and ever-during misery. Secondly, By others, That under the name of Chimæra, was meant a cruel pirate of the Lycians, whose ship had in her prow a lion, a goat in the mid-ship, and a dragon in the stern, of which three beasts this monster Chymæra was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon pursued with a kind of galley of such swiftness, that it was called the flying horse; to whom the invention of sails (the wings of a ship) are also attributed. Many other expositions are made of this tale by other authors; but it is not unlikely, that Chymæra was the name of a ship, for so Virgil calleth one of the greatest ships of Aineas.

Ion also, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquity of their parent Javan) derive their name from Iones, is said to have been about Ehud's time: Homer calls them laones, which hath a near resemblance to the word Javan. Perhaps it might be so, that Ion himself took name from Javan; it being a custom observable in the histories of all times, to revive the ancient name of a forefather, in some of the principal of his issue.

The invasion of India by Liber Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: But St. Augustine makes him far more ancient; placing him between the coming out of Egypt, and the death of Joshua.

About the end of the 80 years, ascribed to Ehud, and Samgar, Pelops flourished: who gave name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morea.

SECT. IV.

Of Deborah, and her contemporaries.

AFTER Israel had lived in peace and plenty to the end of these 80 years, they again began to forget the Giver of all goodness, and many of those being worn out, which were witnesses of the former misery, and of God's deliverance by Ehud, and after him by Samgar, the rest began to return to their former neglect of God's commandments. For as plenty and peace are the parents of idle security; so is security as fruitful in begetting and bringing forth both danger and subversion; of which all estates in the world have tasted by interchange of times. Therefore, when their sins were again ripe for punishment, Jabin king of Hazor, after the death of Ehud, invaded the territory of Israel, and having in his service 900 iron chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subjection twenty years, till it pleased God to raise up Deborah, the prophetess, who encouraged Barac to levy a force out of Nephthalim, and Zabulon, to encounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nephthalim were more forward than the rest in this action, it may seem to have proceeded, partly from the authority that Barac had among them, being of the same tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievances, which in them was more sensible, than in others, because Hazor and Haroseth the chief holds of Jabin, were in Nephthalim. So in the days of Jephtha, the Gileadites took the greatest care, because the Ammonites, with whom the war was, press'd most upon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehud to deliver Israel from the Moabites; and by the counsel and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisera by Jael the Kenite's wife: so was it his will at other times, to work the like great things by the weakest means. For the mighty Affyrian Nabuchodonosor, who was a king of kings, and resistless, he overthrew by his own imaginations the causers of his brutish melancholy; and changed his matchless pride into the base humility of a beast. And to prove that he is the Lord of all power, he sometimes punisheth by invisible strength, as when he slaughtered the army of Sennacherib by his angel; or as he did the Egyptians in Moses's time: sometimes by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharaoh by the waves of the sea, and the Canaanites by hail-stones in the time of Joshua: sometimes by the ministry of men, as when he overthrew the four kings of the east, Chedorlaomer and his companions, by the household servants of Abraham. He caused the Moabites and Ammonites to set upon their own confederates the army of the Edomites; and having slain them to kill one another in the sight of Jehoshaphat; and of the like to these a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the prophetess speak unto Barac in these words: ^b But this journey that thou takest, shall not be for thine honour, for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hand of a woman. In which victory all the strength of the Canaanite Jabin fell to the ground, even to the last man: in the end of which war, it seemeth that Jabin himself also perished, as appeareth by Judges iv. 24.

After all which Deborah giveth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgment of all his powerfulness, and great mercies, she sheweth the weak estate whereunto Israel was brought for their idolatry by the Canaanites, and other bordering nations in these words: ^c Was there a shield or spear seen among forty thousand in Israel? She also sheweth how the Israelites were severed and amazed, some of them confined over Jordan, and durst not join themselves to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead; that the Asherites kept the sea-coast, and forsook their habitations towards the land; and the children of Dan who neighboured the sea, crept into their ships for safety, shewing thereby that all were dispersed, and all in effect lost. She then curieth the inhabitants of Meroz, who dwelling near the place of the battle (belike fearing the success) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesteth Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her tent; shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For tho' the family of Heber were enforced in that miserable time of subjection, to hold correspondence with Jabin the Canaanite; yet when occasion offered them means, they witnessed their love and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, She derideth the mother of Sisera, who promised her son the victory in her own hopes; and fancied to herself, and described the spoils both of garments and maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, she directeth her praises and thanks to God only victorious.

From the beginning of Jabin's oppression, to the end of that peace which Deborah and Barac purchased unto Israel, there passed 40 years. In which time the kingdom of Argos, which had continued 544 years was translated to Mycenae. The translation of this kingdom, Vives, out of Pausanias, writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lynceus succeeded in Argos, after whom the children of Abas the son of Lynceus divided the kingdom; of which Acrisus, being eldest, held Argos itself: Prætus his brother possess'd Ephyra or Corinth, and Tyrinthos, and other cities, with all the territory towards the sea, there being many monuments in Tyrinthos which witness Prætus's possession, faith ^d Pausanias.

Now Acrisus was foretold by an oracle, that he should be slain by the son of his daughter Danae; whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a tower, to the end that no man might accompany her. But the lady being exceeding fair, it is feigned that Jupiter turned himself into a golden shower, which falling into her lap, begat her with child: the meaning whereof was, that some king's son, or other worthy man, corrupted her keepers with gold, and enjoyed her, of whom Perseus was born; who, when he grew to man's estate, either by chance (faith Ctesias) or in shewing his grandfather the invention of the Discus, or leaden ball, slew him unwillingly. After this, Perseus, to avoid the infamy of parricide in Argos, changed kingdoms with his uncle Prætus; and built Mycenae. This imprisonment of Danae Sophocles reporteth otherwise; and says, that she was enclosed in a brazen vault, under the king's hall, with her nurse and keepers. Upon this close custody Horace hath this witty observation.

Inclusam Danaen, turris abenea,

The first kings of the Argives were these :

Inachus the first king, who began to reign in the first year of Jacob, and the sixty-first of Isaac; from which time, to the end of Sthenelus, Castor mis-reckoneth 400 years. This kingdom before the translation, Eusebius accounteth to have stood 544 years, others but at 417. Io was the daughter of this Inachus, whom the Egyptians called Isis.

The cotemporaries of Barac and Deborah, were Midas, who reigned in Phrygia; and Ilus, who built Ilium; with others mentioned in our chronological table, as cotemporaries with Deborah.

SECT. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that lived in this age.

DE DEBORAH and Barac being dead; the Midianites assisted by the Amalekites infested Is- rael. For: when under a judge, who had held them in the fear of the Lord, they had enjoyed any quiet or prosperity; the judge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious idolatry. Therefore now the neighbouring nations did so master them in a short time (the hand of God being withheld from their defence) as to save themselves, they crept into caves of the mountains, and other the like places of hardest access: their enemies possessing all the plains and fruitful vallies; and in harvest time by themselves, and the multitude of their cattle, destroying all that grew up, covering the fields as thick as grasshoppers; which servitude lasted seven years.

Then the Lord by his angel stirred up ^b Gideon the son of Joash, afterwards called Jerubbaal; whose fear and unwillingness, and how it pleased God to hearten him in his enterprize, it is both largely and precisely set down in the holy scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, ^c namely 300 out of 32000 men, to make them know that he only was the Lord of hosts: each of these 300, by Gideon's appointment, carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terror than force, with which he gave the great army of their enemies an alarm; who hearing so loud a noise, and seeing (at the crack of so many pitchers broken) so many lights about them, esteeming the army of Israel to be infinite, and stricken with a sudden fear, they all fled without a stroke stricken; and were slaughtered in great numbers, two of their princes being made prisoners and slain. In his return the Ephraimites began to quarrel with Gideon, because he made war without their assistance, being then greedy of glory, the victory being gotten; who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprize) would no doubt have held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appeasing them with a mild answer, followed after the enemy, in which pursuit being tired with travel, and weary even with the slaughtering of his enemies, he desired relief from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end that (his men being refreshed) he might overtake the other two kings of the Midianites, which had saved themselves by flight. For they were four princes of the nations which had invaded and wasted Israel; to wit, Oreb and Zeeb, which were taken already, and Zebah and Zalmunna which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, sought the like relief from the inhabitants of Penuel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatened therefore the revenge, which in his return from the prosecution of the other two princes he performed; to wit, that he would tear the flesh of those of Succoth with thorns and briars, and destroy the inhabitants and city of Penuel. Now why the people of these two cities should refuse relief to their brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a victory, if I may presume to make conjecture; it seems likely, first, that those cities set over Jordan, and in the way of all invasions to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites, and Midianites into Israel, had either made their own peace with those nations, and were not spoiled by them: or else they knowing that Zebah and Zalmunna were escaped with a great part of their army, might fear their revenge in the future. Secondly, It may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men, as it is not rare to find of the like humour in all ages. For their are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow the wars, that both envy and malign others, if they perform any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safety of their own country, tho' themselves may be assured to bear a part of the smart of contrary success. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their prince and country should suffer hazard and want, than that such men as the mil-like, should be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

Now Gideon, how or wheresoever it were that he refreshed himself, and his weary and hungry soldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and pursued his former victory to the utmost: and finding Zeba and Zalmunna in ^b Karkor (suspecting no farther attempt upon them) he again surprized them, and slaughtered those 15000 remaining; having put to the sword in the former attempt 120000, and withal he took Zeba and Zalmunna prisoners; whom, because themselves had executed Gideon's brethren before at Tabor, he caused to be slain: or (as it is written) at their own request slew them with his own hands: his son, whom he first commanded to do it, refusing it; and in his return from the consummation of this marvellous victory, he took revenge of the elders of Succoth, and of the citizens of Peniel: forgiving no offence committed against him, either by strangers or by his brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his own children found soon after his death, according to that which hath been said before. The debts of cruelty and mercy are never left unsatisfied; for as he slew the seventy elders of Succoth, with great and unusual torments, so were his own seventy sons, all but one, murdered by his own bastard Abimelech. The like analogy is observed by the Rabines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought upon the Egyptians, who having caused the male children of the Hebrews to be slain, others of them to be cast into the river and drowned: God rewarded them even with the like measure, destroying their own first-born by his angel, and drowning Pharaoh and his army in the Red sea. And hereof a world of examples might be given, both out of the scriptures, and other histories.

In the end so much did the people reverence Gideon in the present for this victory, and their own deliverance, as they offered him the sovereignty over them, and to establish him in the government; which he refused, answering, I will not reign over you, neither shall my child reign over you, but the Lord shall, &c. But he desired the people, that they would bestow on him the golden ear-rings, which every man had gotten. For the Ismaelites, neighbours, and mix'd with the Midianites, used to wear them: the weight of all which was a thousand and seven hundred shekles of gold, which makes of ours, 2380 pounds, if we follow the account of the shekle vulgar. And because he converted that gold into an ephod, a garment of gold, blew silk, purple, scarlet, and fine linen, belonging to the high priest only, and set up the same in his own city of Ophra, or Ephra, which drew Israel to idolatry, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his house.

There was another kind of ephod besides this of the high priests which the Levites used, and so did David when he danced before the ark; and Samuel while he was yet young, which was made of linen only.

Now if any man demand, how it was possible for Gideon with 300 men to destroy 120000 of their enemies; and afterwarpe 15000 which remained, we may remember, that altho' Gideon with 300 gave the first alarm, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder: yet all the rest of the army came into the slaughter, and pursuit; for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out of Nephtali, and out of Asher, and out of Manasseh, pursued after the Midianites: for this army Gideon left in the tents behind him, when he went down to view the army of his enemies, who with the noise of his 300 trumpets came after him to the execution.

There lived with Gideon, Ægeus the son of Pandion, who reigned in Athens; Euristheus king of Mycenæ, Atræus and Thyestes the sons of Pelops, who bare dominion over a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Euristheus the kingdom of Mycenæ fell into the hand of Atræus. This is that Atræus who holding his brother in jealousy, as an attempter both of his wife and crown, slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be dress'd did therewith feast their father. But this cruelty was not unrevenged. For both Atræus and his son Agamemnon were slain by a base son of Thyestes, yea the grand-children, and all the lineage of Atræus died by the same sword.

In Gideon's time also those things were supposed to have been done, which are written of Dædalus and Icarus. Dædalus, they say, having slain his nephew Attalus, fled to Minos king of Crete for succour, where for his excellent workmanship he was greatly esteemed, having made for Minos a labyrinth like unto that of Egypt. Afterwards he was said to have framed an artificial cow for Pasiphaë the queen, that she, being in love with a fair bull, might, by putting herself into the cow, satisfy her lust, a thing no less unnatural than incredible, had not that shameless emperor Domitian, exhibited the like beastly spectacle openly before the people of Rome in his amphitheatre; on purpose as may seem to verify the old fable. For so it appears by those verses of Martial, wherein the flattering poet magnifieth the abominable shew as a goodly pageant in those vicious times.

*Junctam Pasiphaën Dilecto credite tauro
Vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.
Nec se miratur Cæsar, longæva vetustas
Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.*

But concerning that which is reported of Pasiphaë, Servius makes a less dishonest construction of it, thinking that Dædalus was of her counsel, and her pandar for the enticing of a secretary of Minos called Taurus, which signifieth a bull, who begat her with child, and that she being delivered of two sons, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was feigned that she was delivered of the monster Minotaur half a man, and half a bull. But this practice being discovered, and Dædalus appointed to be slain, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus king of Sicily; in which passage he made such expedition, as it was feigned that he fashioned wings for himself, and his son to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with boats, which had oars only, Dædalus framed sails both for his own boat, and for his sons, by which he out-went those that had him in chase. Upon which new invention, Icarus bearing himself overbold, was over-borne and drowned.

It is also written of Dædalus, that he made images that could move themselves, and go, because he carved them with legs, arms, and hands; whereas those that preceded him, could only present the body and head of those men, whom they carved to counterfeit, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarch, who had seen some of those that were called the images of Dædalus, found them exceeding rude.

With ^a Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the son of Apollo, and Terpsichore, who instructed Thamaris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the creation, of the sun and moon's course, and of the generation of living creatures, but in the end he was slain by Hercules his scholar with his own harp.

Again, in this age those things spoken of ^b Sphinx and Oedipus are thought to have been performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Corinthian army, led by Oedipus, overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles to those whom she mastered, was meant by the rocky and inaccessible mountain near Thebes which she defended, and by Oedipus dissolving her problem, his victory over her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the body of a lion for her cruelty. But that which Palephatus reports of Sphinx were more probable, did not the time disprove it, for he calls her an Amazonite, and the wife of Cadmus; who when by her help he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despicable part, with her own troop she held the mountain by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharp war upon the Thebans, till by Oedipus overthrown. About this time did Minos thrust his brother out of Crete, and held sharp war with the Megarians and Athenians, because his son Androgeus was slain by them. He possess'd himself of Megara by the treason of Scylla, daughter of Nisus the king. He was long master of the sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of delivering him every year seven of their sons; which tribute Theseus released, as shall be shewed when I come to the time of the next judge Thola. In the end he was slain at ^c Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia by Cocalus the king, while he pursued Dædalus; and was esteemed by some to be the first law-giver to those islands.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Antæus the giant, who was said to have 60 and odd cubits of length, which tho' Plutarch doth confirm, reporting that there was such a body found by Sertorius the Roman in Libya, where Hercules slew Antæus; yet for my self I think it but a loud lye. That Antæus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler, ^d Eusebias affirmeth; and because he cast so many men to the ground, he was feigned to be the son of the earth. Pliny saith, that he inhabited near the gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. ^e St. Augustine affirms, that this Hercules was not of Greece; but of Libya; and the ^f Hydra also which he overcame, Plato expoundeth to be a subtil sophister.

SCET. VI.

Of the expedition of the Argonauts.

ABout the 11th year of Gideon, was that famous expedition of the Argonauts; of which many fabulous discourses have been written, the sum of which is this.

Pelias the son of Neptune, brother by the mother's side to Aison, who was Jason's father, reigning in Iolcus, a town of Theffaly, was warned by the oracle of Apollo to take heed of him that wore but one shoe. This Pelias afterwards sacrificing to Neptune, invited Jason to him, who coming hastily, lost one shoe in passing over a brook: Whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course he would take (supposing he was able) against one of whom an oracle should advise him to take heed? To which question when Jason had briefly answered, that he would send him to Colchus, to fetch the golden fleece: Pelias immediately commanded him to undertake that service. Therefore Jason prepared for the voyage, having a ship built by Argus, the son of Phryxus, by the counsel of Pallas: wherein he procured all the bravest men of Greece to sail with him: as Typhis the master of the ship, Orpheus the famous poet, Castor and Pollux the sons of Tyndarus, Telamon and Peleus sons of Æacus, and fathers of Ajax and Achilles, Hercules Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two-winged sons of Boreas, Amphiaraus the great sooth-sayer, Meleager of Calidon that slew the great wild boar, Ascalaphus and Jalmenus or Almenus the sons of Mars, who were afterwards at the last war of Troy, Laertes the father of Ulysses, Atalanta a warlike virgin, Idas and Lynceus the sons of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Castor and Pollux slew Castor and wounded Pollux, but were slain themselves, Lynceus by Pollux, Idas by Jupiter with lightning.

These and many other went with Jason in the ship Argo; in whose prow was a table of the beech of Dodona, which could speak. They arrived first at Lemnos; the women of which island, having slain all the males, purposing to lead an Amazonian life, were nevertheless contented to take their pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the country about Cyzicus, where dwelt a people called Doliones, over whom then reigned one Cyzicus, who entertained them friendly; but it so fell out, that loosing thence by night, they were driven by contrary winds back into his port, neither knowing that it was the same haven, nor being known by the Doliones, to be the same men; but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies, by which means they fell to blows, insomuch that the Argonauts slew the most part of the Doliones, together with their king Cyzicus; which when by day-light they perceived, with many tears they solemnized his funeral. Then departed they again, and arrived shortly in Mysia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the son of Elates, who went to seek Hyllas the darling of Hercules, that was ravished by the nymphs.

Polyphemus built a town in Mysia, called Cios, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos: from Mysia the Argonauts sailed into Bitynia, which then was peopled by the Bebryces the ancient inhabitants of the country, over whom Amycus the son of Neptune was then king. He being a strong man, compelled all strangers to fight with him, at whorl-batts, in which kind of fight he had slain many, and was now himself slain by Pollux. The Bebryces in revenge of his death slew all upon Pollux, but his companions rescued him, with great slaughter of the people. They sailed from hence to Salmydessus, a town in Thrace (somewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a sooth-sayer dwelt, who was blind and vexed with the harpyes. The harpyes were said to be a kind of birds, which had the faces of women and soul long claws, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furnished for Phineus, came flying in, and devouring or carrying away the greatest part of the victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured.

When therefore the Argonauts craved his advice and direction for their voyage: you shall do well (quoth he) first of all to deliver me from the harpyes, and then afterwards to ask my counsel. Whereupon they caused the table to be covered, and meat set on; which was no sooner set down, than that presently in came the harpyes, and played their accustomed pranks; when Zetes and Calais the winged young men saw this, they drew their swords, and pursued them thro' the air; some say, that both the harpyes and the young men died of weariness in the fight, and pursuit. But Apollonius saith, that the harpyes did covenant with the youths, to do no more harm to Phineus, and were thereupon dismissed. For this good turn Phineus gave them informations of the way, and advertised them withal of the dangerous rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of winds running together, did shut up the passage; wherefore he willed them to put a pigeon before them in the passage; and if that passed safe, then to adventure after her; if not, then by no means to hazard themselves in vain. They did so, and perceiving that the pigeon had only lost a piece of her tail, they observed the next opening of the rocks, and then rowing with all their might, passed thro' safe, only the end of the poop was bruised.

From thenceforward (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades have stood still; for the Gods, say they, had decreed that after the passage of a ship, they should be fixed. Thence the Argonauts came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabiting about the mouth of the river Parthenius, where Lycus the king entertained them courteously. Here Idmon a sooth-sayer of their company was slain by a wild boar; also here Typhis died, and Anceus undertook to steer the ship. So they passed by the river Thermodon, and mount Caucasus, and came to the river Phasis, which runs thro' the land of Colchus. When they were entred the haven, Jason went to Æetes the king of Colchus, and told him the commandment of Pelias, and cause of his coming; desiring him to deliver the golden fleece, which Æetes, as the fable goeth, promised to do, if he alone would yolk together two brazen-hoof'd bulls, and ploughing the ground with them, sow dragons teeth, which Minerva had given to him, being part of those which Cadmus did sow at Thebes. These bulls were great and fierce, and breathed out fire; Vulcan had given them to Æetes.

Whilst Jason was in a great perplexity about this task, Medæa, the daughter of Æetes, fell into a most vehement love of him, so far forth, that being excellent in magic, she came privily to him, promising her help, if he would assure her of his marriage. To this Jason agreed, and confirmed his promise by oath. Then gave she to him a medicine, wherewith she bad him to anoint both his body and his armour, which would preserve him from their violence; further she told him, that armed men would arise out of the ground, from the teeth which he should sow, and set upon him. To remedy which inconvenience, she bid him throw stones amongst them, as soon as they came up thick, whereupon they would fall together to blows, in such wise that he might easily slay them. Jason followed her counsel; whereto when the event had answered, he again demanded the fleece. But Æetes was so far from approving such his desire, that he devised how to destroy the Argonauts, and burn their ship; which Medæa perceiving, went to Jason, and brought him by night to the fleece, which hung upon an oak in the grove of Mars, where they say it was kept by a dragon, that never slept. This dragon was by the magic of Medæa cast into a sleep: so taking away the golden fleece, she went with Jason into the ship Argo: having with her, her brother Abfyrtus.

Æetes understanding the practices of Medæa, provided to pursue the ship; whom when Medæa perceived to be at hand, she slew her brother, and cutting him in pieces, she scattered his limbs in divers places; of which Æetes finding some, was fain to seek out the rest, and suffer his daughter to pass: the parts of his son he buried in a place, which thereupon he called Tomi; the Greek word signifieth division. Afterwards he sent many of his subjects to seek the ship Argo, threatening that if they brought not back Medæa, they should suffer in her stead. In the mean while the Argonauts were driven about the seas, and were come to the river Eridanus, which is Po in Italy.

Jupiter offended with the slaughter of Abfyrtus, vexed them with a great tempest, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the islands Abfyrtides, there the ship Argo (that there might want no incredible thing in this fable) spake to them, and said, that the anger of Jupiter should not cease, till they came to Ausonia, and were cleansed by Circe from the murder of Abfyrtus. Now they thereupon sailing between the coasts of Libya, and Gallia, and passing thro' the sea of Sardinia, and along the coast of Heitruvia, came to the isle of Æea, wherein Circe dwelt, who cleansed them. Thence they sailed by the coast of the Syrens, who sung to allure them into danger; but Orpheus on the other side sung so well that he stay'd them. Only Butes swam out unto them, whom Venus ravished, and carried to Lylibæum in Sicily to dwell.

Having pass'd the Syrens, they came between Scylla and Charybdis, and the stragling rocks which seemed to cast out great store of flames and smoke. But Thetis and the Nereides, convey'd them safe thro' at the appointment of Juno. So they coasted Sicily where the beeves of the sun were, and touched at Corcyra the island of the Phæaces, where king Alcinous reigned. Mean while the men of Colchus, that had been sent by Æetes in quest of the ship Argo, hearing no news of it, and fearing his anger if they fulfilled not his will, betook themselves to new habitations; some of them dwelt in the mountains of Corcyra, others in the islands Abfyrtides, and some coming to the Phæaces, there found the ship Argo, and demanded Medæa of Alcinous, whereunto Alcinous made answer, that if she were not Jason's wife they should have her, but if she were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arete, the wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: wherefore they of Colchus not daring to return home, stay'd with the Phæaces; so the Argonauts departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this island Minos reigned, who had a man of brass given to him (as some of the fablers say) by Vulcan. This man had one vein in his body reaching from the neck to the heel, the end whereof was closed up with a brazen nail, his name was Talus, his custom was to run thrice a day about the island for the defence of it. When he saw the ship Argo pass by, he threw stones at it; but Medæa with her magic destroy'd him. Some say, that she slew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promising to make him immortal, she drew out the nail that stop'd his vein, by which means all his blood ran out, and he died; others there are that say, he was slain by Pæan, who wounded him with an arrow in the heel. From hence the Argonauts sailed to Ægina, where they were fain to fight for fresh water. And lastly from Ægina they sailed by Eubæa and Le- cris home to Iolcos, where they arrived, having spent four whole months in the expedition.

Some there are, that by this journey of Jason, understand the mystery of the philosopher's stone, called the golden fleece; to which also other superfine chymists draw the 12 labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks, that by the golden fleece, was meant a golden book of parchment, which is of sheep's-skin, and therefore called golden, because it was taught therein how other metals might be transmuted. Others would signify by Jason, wisdom, and moderation, which overcometh all perils; but that which is most probable is the opinion of Dercilus, that the story of such a passage was true, and that Jason with the rest went indeed to rob Colchos, to which they might arrive by boat. For not far from Caucasus there are certain steep falling torrents, which wash down many grains of gold, as in many other parts of the world, and the people there inhabiting use to set many fleeces of wool in those descents of waters, in which the grains of gold remain, and the water passeth thro'; which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many rocks, straits, sands, and currents, in the passage between Greece and the bottom of Pontus, are poetically converted into those fiery bulls, the armed men rising out of the ground, the dragon cast asleep, and the like. The man of brass, the Syrens, Scylla and Charybdis, were other hazards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediterranean sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, under poetical morals; all which Homer afterwards used (the man of brass excepted) in the description of Ulysses's travels on the same inland seas.

Of Abimelech, Tholan, and Jair, and of the Lapythæ, and of Theseus, Hippolytus, &c.

AFTER the death of Gideon, Abimelech's base son, begotten on a concubine of the Sechemites, remembering what offers had been made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his their perpetual princes; and, as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his father's religious modesty) that some of his brethren might take on them the sovereignty, practised with the inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himself, who being easily moved with the glory, to have a king of their own, readily condescended; and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed^a 70 pieces of silver of their idol Baalberith, with which treasure he hired a company of loose and desperate vagabonds, to assist his first detestable enterprise, to wit, the slaughter of his 70 brethren the sons of Gideon, begotten on his wives, of which he had many, of all which none escaped but ^b*Jotham* the youngest, who hid himself from his present fury; all which he executed on one stone, a cruelty exceeding all that hath been written of in any age. Such is human ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (tho' all-powerful, and whose revenges are without date and for everlasting) neither hath it respect to nature, which laboureth the preservation of every being; but it rageth also against her, tho' garnished with beauty which never dieth, and with love that hath no end. All other passions and affections, by which the souls of men are tormented, are by their contraries oftentimes resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth every vice, and is it self the child and darling of Satan, looketh only towards the ends by it self set down, forgetting nothing (how fearful and inhuman soever) which may serve it; remembering nothing, whatsoever justice, piety, right or religion, can offer and alledge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the error or weakness of the undertakers, and rather praiseth the adventure than feareth the like success. It was the first sin that the world had, and began in angels, for which they were cast into hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient than man, and therefore no part of his natural corruption. The punishment also preceded his creation, yet hath the devil, which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one, as out of date, and to practise the other, as besitting every age and condition.

Jotham, the youngest of Gideon's sons, having escaped the present peril, sought by his best persuasions to alienate the Sechemites, from the assisting of this merciless tyrant, letting them know, that those which were virtuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happy estate of moderate subjection, had refused to receive as unlawful, what others had not power to give, without direction from the King of kings; who from the beginning (as to his own peculiar people) had appointed them by whom and how to be governed. This he taught them by the olive, which contented it self with its fatness, the fig-tree with sweetness, and the vine with the good juice it had; the bramble only, who was most base, cut down all the rest, and accepted the sovereignty. He also foretold them by a prophetic spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the bramble, and consume the cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an easy matter to call those men back, whom rage without right led on) Gaal the son of Ebed withdrew the citizens of Sechem, from the service of Abimelech; who therefore after some assaults entred the place, and mastered it; and in conclusion fired the town, wherein their idol Baalberith was worshipped, and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the castle or tower of Teber, himself was wounded in the head with a stone thrown over the wall by a woman, and finding himself mortally bruised, he commanded his own page to pierce his body, thereby to avoid the dishonour of being slain by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech usurped the government, the Lapithæ and Centaurs made war against the Thebans. These nations were descended of Apollo, and were the first in those parts that devised to manage horses, to bridle and to fit them: insomuch as when they first came down from the mountains of Pindus, into the plains, those which had never seen horsemen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Mexicans when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard first invaded that empire.

After the death of Abimelech, Thola of Issachar governed Israel 23 years, and after him Jair the Gileadite 22 years, who seemeth to be descended of Jair, the son of Manasseh, who in Moses's time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his own name, ^d*Ilaboth Jair*. For to this Jair there remained ^ethirty of those cities, which his ancestor had recovered from the Amorites. Of these judges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument, that during all their times, Israel lived without disturbance and in peace.

When Jair judged Israel, Priamus began to reign in Troy, who at such time as Hercules sack'd Ilium, was carried away captive with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterwards redeemed for ransom, he rebuilt and greatly strengthened, and adorned Troy; and so far enlarged his dominions, as he became the supream lord in effect of all Asia the less. He married Hecuba the daughter of Cisseus king of Thrace, and had in all (saith ^a Cicero) fifty sons, whereof seventeen by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recover his aunt Hesione, took Helena the wife of Menelaus, the cause of the war which followed.

Theseus, the 10th king of Athens, began likewise to reign in the beginning of Jair: some writers call him the son of Neptune and Aethra; but Plutarch, in the story of his life, finds him begotten of Aegeus, of whom the Grecian sea between it and Asia the less took name. For when Minos had mastered the Athenians, so far as he forced them to pay him seven of their sons every year for tribute, whom he inclosed within a labyrinth, to be devoured by the monster Minotaur; because belike the sons of Taurus, which he begat on Pasiphae the queen, had the charge of them: among these seven Theseus thrust himself, not doubting by his valour to deliver the rest, and to free his country of that slavery, occasioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos's son.

And having possess'd himself of Ariadne's affection, who was Minos's daughter, he received from her a bottom of thread, by which he conducted himself through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the labyrinth, made in all like that of the city of crocodiles in Egypt; by means whereof having slain the Minotaur, he found a ready way to return. But whereas his father Aegeus had given order, that if he came back with victory and in safety, he should use a white sail in sign thereof, and not that mournful black sail, under which they left the port of Athens. This instruction being either forgotten or neglected, Aegeus descrying the ship of Theseus with a black sail, cast himself over the rocks down into the sea, afterwards called of his name Aegeum.

One of the first famous acts of Theseus, was the killing of Scyron, who kept a passage between Megara and the Peloponnesian Isthmus, and threw all whom he mastered into the sea, from the high rocks. Afterwards he did the like to Cercyon, by wrestling, who used by that art to kill others. He also rid the country of Procrustes, who used to bend down the strong limbs of two trees, and fastened by cords such as he took, part of them to one, and part to the other bough, and by their springing up tore them asunder. So did he root out Periphetes, and other mischievous thieves and murderers. He overthrew the army of the Amazons, who after many victories and vastations, entred the territory of Athens. Theseus having taken their queen Hippolyta prisoner, begat on her Hippolytus; with whom afterwards his mother-in-law Phaedra falling in love, and he refusing to abuse his father's bed, Phaedra perswaded Theseus that his son offered to force her; after which it is feigned, that Theseus besought Neptune to revenge this wrong of his son's, by some violent death. Neptune, taking a time of advantage, sent out his sea-calves, as Hippolytus passed by the sea-shore, and so affrighted his horses, as casting the coach over, he was (by being intangled therein) torn in pieces; which miserable and undeserved destiny, when Phaedra had heard of, she strangled her self. After which it is feigned, that Diana entreated Aesculapius to set Hippolytus's pieces together, and to restore him to life; which done, because he was chaste, she led him with her into Italy, to accompany her in her hunting and field sports.

It is probable that Hippolytus, when his father sought his life, thinking to escape by sea, was affronted thereat, and received many wounds in forcing his passage and escape, which wounds Aesculapius, to wit, some skillful physician or chirurgeon, healed again; after which he pass'd into Italy, where he lived with Diana, that is, the life of a hunter, in which he most delighted. But of those ancient profane stories, Plutarch saith well, that as cosmographers in their descriptions of the world, where they find many vast places, whereof they knew nothing, fill the same with strange beasts, birds, and fishes, and with mathematical lines; so do the Grecian historians and poets imbroider and intermix the tales of ancient times with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Theseus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom he made his pattern, and was the first that gathered the Athenians from being dispersed in thin and ragged villages: in recompence whereof, and for devising them laws to live under, and in order, he was, by the beggarly, mutable, and ungrateful multitude, in the end banished. Some say, per ostracismum, by the law of lots, or names written on shells, which was a device of his own.

He stole Helen (as they say) when she was 15 years old, from Aphidna, which Cyllar and Pollux overturned, when they followed after Theseus, to recover their sister. ^b Strabo and Pausanias write, that Theseus begat her with child at Argos, where she erected a temple to Luctina; but her age makes the tale unlikely to be true, and so doth Ovid, Non tamen ex facio praedictum tantum petitum, &c. The rape ^c Eusebius finds in the list of ^d Jair, who governed Israel 22 years, to whom succeeded Jephtha or Jepte 6 years, to whom Ibzan, who ruled 7 years, and then Habdon 3 years; in whose time was the fall of Troy. So as, if Theseus had a child by her in the 1st of Jair (at which time we must count her no less than 15 years old; for the women did not commonly begin so young as they do now) she was then at least 52 years old, at the destruction of Troy; and when she was stolen by Paris 38; but herein the chronologers do not agree. Yet ^e Eusebius and Bunting, with Italicarnassus do in effect consent, that the city was entred, and burnt in the first year of Demophon king of Athens, the successor of Mnestheus, the successor of Theseus, 17 days before the summer tropick; and that about the 11th of September following, the Trojans cross'd the Hellepont into Thrace, and wintered there; and in the next spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second year, the next summer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But ^f St. Augustine hath it otherwise, that when Polyphides governed Sicyon, Mnestheus Athens, Tautanes Assyria, Habdon Israel, then Aeneas arrived in Italy, transporting with him in 20 ships the remainder of the Trojans; but the difference is not great; and hereof more at large in the story of Troy at hand.

In Sicyona Phaestus the two and twentieth king, reigned eight years, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His successors, Adrastus, who reigned four years, and Polyphides, who reigned thirteen, are accounted to the time of Jair; so is also Mneſtheus king of Athens, and Atreus, who held a great part of Peloponnesus. In Aſſyria, during the government of theſe two peaceable judges, Mitreus, and after him Tautanes, reigned. In Egypt Amenophis, the ſon of Ramſes, and afterwards Annemenes.

SECT. VIII.

Of the war of Thebes which was in this age.

IN this age was the war of Thebes, the moſt ancient that ever Greek poet or hiſtorian wrote of. Wherefore the Roman poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly againſt the Peripateticks) that the world had a beginning, urgeth them with this objection.

— — — *Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Rerumque & mundi, ſemperque æterna fuere;
Cur ſupra bellum Thebanum, & funera Trojæ,
Non alias alii quoque res cecinere poetæ.*

If all this world had no original,
But things have ever been as now they are:
Before the ſiege of Thebes or Troy's laſt fall,
Why did no poet ſing ſome elder war.

It is true, that in theſe times Greece was very ſavage, the inhabitants being often chaced from place to place, by the captains of greater tribes; and no man thinking the ground whereon he dwelt, his own, longer than he could hold it by ſtrong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourſe they uſed little, neither did they plant many trees, or ſow more corn than was neceſſary for their ſuſtenance. Money they had little or none; for it is thought that the name of money was not heard in Greece, when Homer did write, who meaſures the value of gold and braſs by the worth in cattle; ſaying, that the golden armour of Glaucus, was worth 100 beeves, and the copper armour of Dicomedes worth nine.

Robberies by land and ſea were common and without ſhame, and to ſteal horſes or kine was the uſual exerciſe of their great men. Their towns were not many, whereof thoſe that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycenæ the principal city in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought, that the reſt were proportionable; briefly, Greece was then in her infancy, and tho' in ſome ſmall towns of that half iſle of Peloponnesus, the inhabitants might have enjoyed quietneſs within their narrow bounds; as likewise did the Athenians, becauſe their country was ſo barren, that none did care to take it from them; yet that the land in general was very rude, it will eaſily appear to ſuch as conſider what Thucydides the greateſt of their hiſtorians hath written to this effect, in the preface to his hiſtory. Wherefore, as in theſe latter times, idle chroniclers uſe, when they want good matter, to fill whole books with reports of great froſts, or dry ſummers, and other ſuch things which no man cares to read; ſo did they, who ſpoke of Greece in her beginnings, remember only the great floods which were in the times of Ogyges, and Deucalion; or elſe rehearſe ſables of men changed into birds, of ſtrange monſters, of adultery committed by their Gods, and the mighty men which they begat; without writing ought that favoured of humanity, before the time of the war of Thebes; the brief whereof is this.

Oedipus the ſon of Laius king of Thebes, having been caſt forth when he was an infant, becauſe an oracle foretold what evil ſhould come to paſs by him, did afterwards in a narrow paſſage contending for the way, ſlay his own father, not knowing either then, nor long after, who he was. Afterwards he became king of Thebes, by marriage of the queen Jocasta, called by Homer, Od. 11. Epicaſte; on whom, not knowing her to be his mother, he begat two ſons, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in proceſs of time, finding out by good circumſtances, who were his parents, he underſtood the grievous murder and inceſt he had committed, he tore out his own eyes for grief, and left the city. His wife and mother did hang herſelf. Some ſay, that Oedipus having his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly curling his ſons, becauſe they ſuffered their father to be caſt out of the town, and aided him not. Howſoever it were, his two ſons made this agreement, that the one of them ſhould reign one year, and the other another year, and ſo by courſe reign interchangeably; but this appointment was ill obſerved. For when Polynices had, after a year's government, reſigned the kingdom to his brother; or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the firſt year, he reſuſed to give over the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fled unto Argos, where Adrastus the ſon of Talaas then reigned, unto whoſe palace coming by night, he was driven to ſeek lodging in an out-houſe on the back-ſide.

There he met with Tydeus the ſon of Oeneus, who was fled from Calydon; with whom ſtriving about their lodging, he fell to blows. Adrastus hearing the noiſe, came forth and took up the quarrel. At which time perceiving in the ſhield of Tydeus a boar, in that of Polynices a lion, he remembered an old oracle, by which he was adviſed to give his two daughters in marriage to a lion and a boar; and accordingly he did beſtow his daughter Argia upon Tydeus, and Deipyle upon Polynices, promiſing to reſtore them both to their countries. To this purpoſe levying an army, and aſſembling as many valiant captains as he could draw to follow him, he was deſirous, among others, to carry Amphiaraus, the ſon of Oicleus, a great ſoothſayer and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiaraus, who is ſaid to have foreſeen all things, knowing well that none of the captains ſhould eſcape, ſave only Adrastus, did both utterly reſuſe to be one in that expedition, and perſuaded others to ſtay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the wife of Amphiaraus, offering unto her a very fair bracelet, upon condition that ſhe ſhould cauſe her husband to aſſiſt him. The ſoothſayer knowing what ſhould work his deſtiny, forbade his wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the bracelet was in her eyes ſo precious a jewel, that ſhe could not reſuſe it. Therefore, whereas a great controverſy, between Amphiaraus and Adrastus, was by way of compromise put unto the deciſion of Eriphyle, either of them being bound by ſolemn oath to ſtand to her appointment: ſhe ordered the matter ſo, as a woman ſhould, that loved a bracelet better than her husband. He now finding that it was more eaſy to foreſee than avoid deſtiny, ſought for ſuch comfort as revenge might afford; giving in charge to his ſons, that when they came to full age, they ſhould kill their mother, and make ſtrong war upon the Thebans.

Now had Adrastus aſſembled all his forces, of which the ſeven chief leaders were, himſelf, Amphiaraus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (inſtead of whom ſome name Mecisteus) all Argives, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Aetolian, and Parthenopeus the Arcadian, ſon of Meleager and Atalanta. When the army came to the Nemean wood, they met a woman, whom they deſired to help them to ſome water, ſhe having a child in her arms, laid laid it down, and led the Argives to a spring ; but ere she returned, a serpent had slain the child. This woman was Hyppipyle the daughter of Thoas the Lemnian, whom she would have saved when the women of the isle slew all the males by conspiracy, intending to lead an Amazonian life. For such her piety, the Lemnian wives did sell her to pirates, and the pirates to Lycurgus lord of the country about Nemæa, whose young son Opheltes, or Archemorus, she did nurse, and lost, as is shewed before. When upon the child's death she hid herself for fear of her master, Amphiaraus told her sons where they should find her ; and the Argives did both kill the serpent which had slain the child, and in memory of the chance, did institute solemn funeral games called Nemæan, wherein Adrastus won the prize with his swift horse Arion, Tydeus with whorlbat, Amphiaraus at running and quoiting, Polynices at wrestling, Parthenopæus at shooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the first institution of the Nemæan games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are who think, that they were ordained in honour of one Ophellus, a Lacedemonian. Some say by Hercules, when he had slain the Nemæan lion : but the common opinion agrees with that which is here set down.

From Nemæa, the Argives marching onwards, arrived at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them sent ambassador to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of covenants between him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was thoroughly resolved to hold what he had, as long as he could : which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to try what mettle was in the Thebans, he made many challenges, and obtained victory in all of them, not without much envy and malice of the people, who laid fifty men in ambush, to intercept him at his return to the army, of which fifty he slew all but one, whom he sent back to the city, as a reporter and witness of his valour. When the Argives understood how resolved Eteocles was, they presented themselves before the city, and encamped round about it. Thebes is said to have had at that time seven gates, which belike stood not far asunder, seeing that the Argives (who afterward when they were very far stronger could scarce muster up more thousands than Thebes had gates) did compass the town. Adrastus quartered before the gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygean, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiaraus at Proetis, Hippomedon at Anchais, Parthenopæus at Electra, and Polynices at Hyppista. In the mean season, Eteocles having armed his men, and appointed commanders unto them, took advice of Tiresias the soothsayer, who promised victory to the Thebans, if Menæcius the son of Creon, a principal man of the city, would vow himself to be slain in honour of Mars the God of war. So full of malice and pride is the devil, and so envious at his Creator's glory, that he not only challengeth honours due to God alone, as oblations and sacrifices, with all divine worship, but commandeth us to offer our selves, and our children unto him, when he hath sufficiently clouded mens understandings, and bewitched their wills with ignorance and blind devotion. And such abominable sacrifice of men, maids, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gauls, Germans, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all nations, when thro' ignorance or fear they were most filled with superstition. But as they grew more wise, so did he wax less impudent in cunning, tho' not less malicious in desiring the continuance of such barbarous inhumanity. For king Dipphilus in Cyprus, without advice of any oracle, made the idol of that country rest contented with an ox instead of a man. Tiberius forbade human sacrifices in Africk ; and crucified the priests in the groves where they had practised them. Hercules taught the Italians to drown men of hay instead of the living, yet among the savages in the West-Indies, these cruel offerings have been practised of late ages ; which as it is a sufficient argument, that Satan's malice is only covered and hidlen by this subtilty among civil people : so may it serve as a probable conjecture of the barbarisms then reigning in Greece. For Menæcius, as soon as he understood that his death might purchase victory to his people, bestowed himself (as he thought) upon Mars, killing himself before the gates of the city. Then was a battle fought, wherein the Argives prevailed so far at the first, that Capaneus advancing ladders to the walls, got up upon the rampart ; whence, when he fell, or was cast down, or (as writers have it) was stricken down by Jupiter with a thunder-bolt, the Argives fled. Many on each part were slain in this battle, which caused both sides to desire that Eteocles and Polynices might try out the quarrel in single fight ; where the two brethren accordingly slew each other.

Another battle was fought after their deaths, wherein the sons of Astacus behaved themselves very valiantly : Ismarus, one of the sons, slew Hippomedon, which was one of the seven princes ; Parthenopæus being another of the seven (who was said to have been so fair, that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slain by Amphidicus, or, as some say, by Periclymenus the son of Neptune ; and the valiant Tydeus by Menalippus ; yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought unto him by Amphiaraus, which he cruelly tore open, and swallowed up the brains. Upon which fact, it is said, that Pallas who had brought from Jupiter such remedy for his wounds, as should have made him immortal, refused to bestow it upon him ; whereby, perhaps, was meant, that his honour, which might have continued immortal, did perish through the beastly rage that he shewed at his death.

The host of the Argives being wholly discomfited, Adrastus and Amphiaraus fled ; of whom Amphiaraus is said to have been swallowed quick into the earth, near to the river Ismenus, together with his chariot, and so lost out of mens sight, being peradventure overwhelmed with dead carcases or drowned in the river ; and his body never found, nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arion, and came to Athens ; where sitting at an altar, called the altar of mercy, he made supplication for their aid to recover their bodies. For Creon having obtained the government of Thebes, after the death of Eteocles, would not suffer the bodies of the Argives to be buried ; but caused Antigona, the only daughter then living of Oedipus, to be buried quick, because she had sought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creon's edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send forth an army under the conduct of Theseus, which took Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argives to sepulchre ; at which time Evadne the wife of Capaneus, threw herself into the funeral fire, and was burnt willingly with her husband. But it little contented the sons of those captains which were slain at Thebes, that any less revenge should be taken of their fathers death, than the ruin of the city ; wherefore ten years after having levied forces, Aegialeus the son of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tydeus,
Pro-

Promachus of Parthenopæus, Sibnelus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Euripylus of Mecisteus, marched thither under the conduct of Alcæon the son of Amphiaraus; with whom also went his brother Amphilochus. Apollo promised victory if Alcæon were their captain, whom afterwards by another oracle he commanded to kill his own mother.

When they came to the city, they were encountered by Laodamas the son of Eteocles, then king of the Thebans (for Creon was only tutor to Laodamas) who tho' he did valiantly in the battle, and slew Ægialeus, yet was he put to the worst, and driven to fly, or (according to Apollodorus) slain by Alcæon. After this disaster the citizens began to desire composition; but in the mean time they convey'd themselves with their wives and children away from thence by night, and so began to wander up and down, till at length they built the town called Esiæa. The Argives, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the town, entering into it, sacked it, threw down the walls, and laid it waste; howbeit it is reported by some, that the town was saved by Thersander, the son of Polynices, who causing the citizens to return, did there reign over them. That he saved the city from utter destruction, it is very likely, for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the war of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

SECT. IX.

Of Jephtha, and how the three hundred years which he speaketh of, Judg. xi. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Acts xiii. 20. 1 Kings vi. 1. together with some other things touching chronology about these times.

AFTER the death of Jair (near about whose times these things happened in Greece, and during whose government, and that of Thola, Israel lived in peace and in order) they revolted again from the law and service of God, and became more wicked and idolatrous than ever. For whereas in the former times they worshipped ^a*Baal* and Asteroth, they now became followers of all the heathen nations adjoining, and imbraced the idols of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites, and Ammonites; with those of the Philistines. And as it before pleased God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites; so now he scourged them by the ^b*Ammonites*, and afterwards by the Philistines.

Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppress'd, because they bordered upon the Ammonites, they were forc'd to seek Jephtha, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base born; but he (notwithstanding those former injuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of devilish hatred and revenge, was content to lead the Gileadites to the war, upon condition that they should establish him their governour after victory. And when he had disputed with Ammon for the land, disproved Ammon's right, and fortified the title of Israel by many arguments, the same prevailing nothing, he began the war; and being strengthened by God, overthrew them; and did not only beat them out of the plains, but forc'd them over the mountains of Arabia, even to ^c*Minnith*, and Abel of the vineyards, cities express'd heretofore in the description of the holy land. After which victory it is said, that he performed the vain vow, which he made, to sacrifice the first living creature he encountered, coming out of his house to meet him; which happened to be his own daughter, and only child, who with all patience submitted herself, and only desired two months time to bewail her virginity on the mountains of Gilead; because in her the issues of her father ended; but the other opinion that she was not offered, is more probable, which ^d*Borraus* and others prove sufficiently.

After these things the children of Israel, of the tribe of Ephraim, either envious of Jephtha's victory, otherwise making way to their future calamity, and to the most grievous slavery that ever Israel suffered, quarrelled with Jephtha, that they were not called to the war, as before-time they had contested with Gideon. Jephtha hereupon forc'd to defend himself against their fury, in the encounter slew of them ^e42000, which so weaken'd the body of the land, as the Philistines had an easy conquest of them all not long after: Jephtha, after he had judged Israel 6 years died; to whom succeeded Ibzan, who ruled 7 years: after him Elon was their judge 10 years: in all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius finds not Elon, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this judge was omitted.

Now before I go on with the rest, it shall be necessary upon the occasion of Jephtha's account of the times Judg. xi. 28. (where he says that Israel had then possess'd the east side of Jordan 300 years) to speak somewhat of the times of the judges, and of the differing opinions among the divines and chronologers: there being found three places of scripture, touching this point, seeming repugnant, or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute between Jephtha and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of St. Paul, Acts xiii. the third is that which is in the 1st of Kings. Jephtha here challengeth the possession of Gilead for 300 years: St. Paul giveth to the judges, as it seems, from the end of Joshua, to the last of Heli, 450 years. In the 1st of kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Solomon's temple, there were consumed 480 years. To the first, Beroaldus findeth Jephtha's 300 years to be but 266 years, to wit, 18 of Joshua, 40 of Othoniel, 80 of Aod and Samgar, 40 of Deborah, 40 of Gideon, 3 of Abimelech, 23 of Thola, and 22 of Jair: but Jephtha (saith Beroaldus) putteth or proposeth a certain number, for an uncertain: Sic ut dicat annum agi prope trecentesium, ex quo nullus litem ea de removerit Israeli; So he speaketh (saith he) as meaning, that then it was about or well nigh the three hundredth year, since Israel possessed those countries, no man making question of their right. Codoman on the contrary finds more years than Jephtha named by 65, to wit, 365, whereof 71 were spent in Israel's captivity, at several times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Jephtha forbore to repeat the whole sum, or any great part, lest the Ammonite should have justly objected, that 71 of those years, the Israelites were in captivity and vassals to their neighbour princes, and therefore knowing that to name 300 years, it was enough for prescription, he omitted the rest.

To justify this account of 365 years, besides the 71 years of captivity or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus's 266, he addeth also 28 years more, and so maketh up the sum of 365. These 28 years he findeth out thus; 20 years he gives to the seniors between Joshua and Othoniel; and where ^a Judg. 10. ^b The persecution of the Ammonites lasted 18 years, and ended in the year of the world 2820, in which year Jephtha began. Judg. 11. ^c Judg. 11. 33. ^d Bor. in Judg. ^e Judg. 12. ^f Id facit numero cento pto incerto proposito.

Beroaldus alloweth but 18 years to Joshua's government, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26 according to Josephus; whereas St. Augustine and Eusebius give him 27, Melanchthon 32. The truth is, that this addition of 28 years is far more doubtful than the other of 71. But tho' we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the years of affliction (to wit, 34 years of the 71) if we add them to the 266 years of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, we have the just number of 300 years. Neither is it strange, that Jephtha should leave out more than half of these years of affliction: seeing, as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against these 71 years, and say, that during these years, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the countries in question. Martin Luther is the author of a third opinion, making those 300 years remembred by Jephtha, to be 306, which odd years, saith he, Jephtha omitteth. But because the years of every judge as they reigned, cannot make up this number of 306, but do only compound 266, therefore doth Luther add to this number, the whole time which Moses spent in the deserts of Arabia Petraea; which 40 years of Moses, added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266, make indeed 306.

But I see nothing in the text to warrant Luther's judgment herein; for in the dispute between Jephtha and Ammon for the land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon in these words: ^a Because Israel took my land, when they came up from Egypt, from Arnon unto Jaboc, &c. now therefore restore those lands quietly or in peace. So by this place it is plain, that the time is not to be accounted from Moses's departure out of Egypt; but from the time that the land was posses'd. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram meam; Because Israel took my land; and therefore the beginning of this account, is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Jephtha's answer also confirmeth in these words; ^a When Israel dwelt in Heshbon and in her towns, and in Aroer and in her towns, and in all the cities that are by the coast of Arnon, 300 years: why did ye not then recover them in that space? So as this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the cities of Gilead 300 years; and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents, that Israel had to possess it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me; for we do not use to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Junius nevertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and says, that this time of 300 years hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Jephtha's narration; when he makes a brief repetition of Moses's whole journey; to wit, at the 16th verse of the xith chapter of Judges in our translation in these words; ^b But when Israel came up from Egypt, &c. And therefore Moses's 40 years (as he thinks) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305 years; and not only the time in which Israel posses'd Gilead, according to the text, and Jephtha's own words; of which I leave the judgment to others; to whom also I leave to judge, whether we may not begin the 480 years, from the deliverance out of Egypt to the temple, even from the first departure out of Egypt, and yet find a more probable reconciliation of St. Paul's and Jephtha's account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet have been signified. For first, touching Jephtha's 300 years of possession of the east side of Jordan, it is to be remembered, that for a good while before the Israelites possessed it, Sehon and Og had dispossessed Moab and Ammon thereof; so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession, which they had, passed to Israel; and so Jephtha might say, that they had possessed those countries 300 years, reckoning 266 years of their own possession, and the rest of the possession of the two kings Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

The second place disputed is this of St. Paul, Acts xiii. that from the end of Joshua, to the beginning of Samuel, there pass'd 450 years. And this place Luther understandeth also besides the letter, as I find his opinion cited by Funclius Krentseuius, and Beza, for I have not read his commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last year of Heli, but 357 years; and this he doth the better to approve the times from the egression out of Egypt to the building of the temple, which in 1 Kings vi. is said to be 480 years.

Now for as much as St. Paul (as it seems) finds 450 years from the death of Joshua, to the last of Heli, and leaves but 30 years for Saul and Samuel, who governed 40, for David who ruled 40, and for Solomon who wore the crown three whole years ere the foundation of the temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was an error in the scribe, who wrote out this piece of scripture of St. Paul, to wit, ^c Then afterwards he gave unto them judges about 450 years, unto the time of Samuel the prophet; the words then afterwards, being clearly referred to the death or after the death of Joshua, as shall be hereafter proved. But where St. Luke, rehearsing the words of St. Paul, wrote 350 years (saith Luther) the scribe in the transcription being deceived, by the affinity of those two Greek words, whereof the one signifieth 300, and the other 400, wrote Tetracosiois for Triacosiois 400 years for 300 years, and 450 for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments; to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary judgment to this hath Codoman; where Luther and Beza begin at Moses's death, he takes his account from the death of Joshua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430 years, to wit, of the judges (not reckoning Sampson's years) 319, and of years of servitude and affliction under strangers 111. The reason why he doth not reckon Sampson's 20 years, is, because he thinks that they were part of the 40 years, in which the Philistines are said to have oppressed Israel. For it is plain, that during all Sampson's time, they were lords over Israel. So then of the judges, besides the 111 years of servitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I have said) 319 years, which two sums put together make 430 years, and whereas St. Paul nameth 450 years, he finds 20 years to make up St. Paul's number, to have been spent after the death of Joshua by the seniors, before the captivity of Chusban, or the election of Othniel; which 20 years added to 430, make 450, according to St. Paul. To approve this time of elders, he citeth two places of scripture, namely, the xxivth of Joshua, and the 2d of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that over-lived Joshua, so as to these times of the elders, Codoman giveth 20 years, which make as before 450, according to St. Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficulty in this opinion, if here also the 20 years of the seniors, between Joshua and Othniel, should be deny'd. For they which deny these years, and make Othniel's 40 to begin presently upon the death of Joshua, as in the beginning of this reckoning they have 20 years less than Codoman, so towards the end of it (when they reckon the years of affliction, apart from the years of the judges) in the number of Sampson's years, and of the 40 years of the Philistines oppressing the Israelites, they have 20 years more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40 years of oppression, all of them apart from Sampson's 20, but Codoman as is said makes Sampson's 20 to be the one half of the 40 of the Philistines oppressions; so that if the 20 years of the seniors be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the text seems to enforce) that the Philistines in an Inter-regnum, before Sampson judged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40 years, besides the 20 while Sampson was their judge, and so the reckoning will come to 450 years between the end of Joshua, and the beginning of Samuel, tho' we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the seniors, between Joshua and Othniel: for if the times of their affliction be sum'd, they make 111 years, to which if we add the years of the judges, which are 339, we have the just sum of 450. And this computation, either one way or other, may seem to be much more probable, than theirs that correct the text, altho' we should admit of their correction thereof, and read with them 350 for 450. For whereas they conceive that this time of 350 years, is to begin immediately, or soon after the death of Moses; certainly the place of St. Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, tho' it be received for true, that there was vitium scriptoris in the rest. For these be St. Paul's words; And about the time of 40 years, God suffered their manners in the wilderness; and he destroyed seven nations in the land of Canaan, and divided their land to them by lot. Then afterwards he gave unto them judges about 450 years, unto the time of Samuel the prophet. So as first in the 18th verse he speaketh of Moses, and of his years spent in the wilderness, then in the 19th verse he cometh to the acts of Joshua; which were that he destroy'd 7 nations in the land of Canaan, and divided their land to them by lot. In the 20th verse it followeth; Then afterwards he gave them judges about 450 years, &c. And therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of St. Paul's meaning, so far as my weak understanding can pierce it. The only inconvenience of any weight in the opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is that it seems irreconcilable with the account 1 Kings vi. 11. For if indeed there were spent 450 years between the end of Joshua, and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480 years between the beginning of the Israelites journeying from Egypt, and the foundation of the temple by Solomon. To this difficulty Codoman answereth, that these 480 years 1 Kings vi. 1. must begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their journeying from Egypt, which he makes to be 25 years after the beginning of Othniel's government; from whence if we cast the years of the judges, with the years of servitude (which sums according to his account, of which we have already spoken, make 397 years) and so to these years add the 40 of Samuel and Saul, and the 40 of David, and the 3 of Solomon, we shall have the just sum of 480 years. Neither is it hard, saith he, that the An-nus egressionis, 1 Reg. vi. 1. should be understood Egressionis non incipientis sed finitæ, the year of their coming out of Egypt (for so it is in the original) or the year after they came out of Egypt, may well be understood for the year after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandering from thence. For so we find that things, which were done 40 years after they had set foot out of Egypt, are said to have been done in their going out of Egypt, as Psalms cxiv. When Israel came out of Egypt, Jordan was driven back. And Deut. iv. 45. These are the testimonies which Moses spake when they came out of Egypt. And thus far it seems we may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the words ab exitu, to be as much as quum exivissent, or ab exitu finito: for if Junius, Deut. iv. 45. do well read quum exivissent, for in exitu, as it seems that herein he doth well, why may not we also, to avoid contradiction in the scripture, expound ab exitu to be postquam exivissent?

^a Judg. 11. 28. ^b Junius in the 11th of Judg. note. ^c Read the 24th of Joshua, and 2 Judg. 7. Funcl. Chron. fol. 4. Beza in his annotations upon the 13th of the Acts, ver. 20. ^d Acts 13. 20. ^e Judg. 13. Judg. 15. 11.

The next point to be cleared is, how their journeying should be said, not to have had end until the 25th year after the victory of Othniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end till when all the tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not until this time; at which time the Danites at length seated themselves, as it is declared, Judg. xviii. For doubtless to this time the expedition may most conveniently be referred. And thus without any great inconvenience to him appearing, doth Codoman reconcile the account of Jephtha, Judg. xviii. 1. and St. Paul, with that in 1 Kings vi. Now whereas it is said, that the expedition of the Danites was, when there was no king in Israel: To this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that we should suppose that Othniel lived all those 40 years of rest, of which Judg. iii. 11. So that by the 25 years after his victory, either he might have been dead, or at least, as Gideon did, he might have refused all sovereignty; and so either way it might truly be said, that at this time (to wit, the 25th year after Othniel's victory) there was no king in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other chronologers grounding their opinions on the plain text, where it is indisputable, as it is in it self round enough and coherent, might perhaps be received as good; especially considering that the speeches of St. Paul have not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they found and are set down. But seeing that he wanteth all help of authority, we may justly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Laiſh, by the tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth year of Othniel? Or what other probability hath he than his own conjecture, to shew that Othniel did so renounce the office of a judge after five and twenty years, that it might then be truly said there was no king in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes.

Now concerning the rehearsal of the law by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeed be properly said to have been, when Israel came out of Egypt; like as we say, that king Edward I. was crowned when he came out of the Holy Land; for so all journies with their accidents commonly take name from the place, either whence or whither they tend. But I think he can find no such phrase of speech in scripture, as limiteth a journey by an accident, or saith, by converting the proposition, when Jordan was turning back, Israel came out of Egypt. Indeed most improper it were to give date unto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before; namely to say, that king Edward, at his arrival out of Palæstina, did win Scotland, or died at Carlisle. How may we then believe, that enterprize performed so many years after the division of the land (which followed the conquest at the journey's end) should be said to have been at the time of the departure out of Egypt? Or who will not think it most strange, that the most notable account of time, serving as the only guide for certain ages in sacred chronology, should not take name and beginning, from that illustrious deliverance out of Egypt, rehearsed often by God himself among the principal of his benefits to Israel, whereof the very day and month are recorded in scripture (as likewise are the year and month wherein it expired) and the form of the year upon that occasion changed; but should have reference to the surprizing of a town by 600 men, that robb'd a chappel by the way, and stole from thence idols to be their guides, as not going to work in God's name? For this accident, whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time given to it, or a time far different from that which he supposeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a year, because it best stood with his interpretation so to have it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing itself.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirm, that the apostle St. Paul did not herein labour to set down the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but only to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, delivered them out of bondage, and ruled them by judges and prophets, unto the time of Saul; did raise up our Lord Jesus Christ out of the seed of David the king, in whose succession the crown was established, and promise made of a kingdom that should have no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much, which tended as a preface to the declaration following (wherein he sheweth Christ to have been the true Messias) the apostle was so far from labouring to make an exact calculation of time (the history being so well known, and believed of the Jews to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40 years consumed in the wilderness, whereof no man doubted; saying, that God suffered their manners in the wilderness about 40 years. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the division of the land unto the days of Samuel the prophet, in whose time they required to have a king, there passed about 450 years. Neither did he stand to tell them, that 111 years of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339 years of the Judges; for this had been an impertinent digression from the argument which he had in hand. Wherefore it is a work not so needful as laborious, to search out of this place, that which the apostle did not here intend to teach, when the sum of 480 years is so expressly and purposefully set down.

Now that the words of St. Paul (if there be no fault in the copy thro' error of some scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of chronology, but must be taken as having reference to the memory and apprehension of the vulgar, it is evident by his ascribing in the same place 40 years to the reign of Saul; whereas it is manifest, that those years were divided between Saul and Samuel, yea, that far the greater part of them were spent under the government of the prophet, howsoever they are here included in the reign of the king. As for those, that with so much cunning forsake the general opinion, when it favoureth not such exposition, as they bring out of a good mind, to help where the need is not over great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The words of St. Paul were sufficiently justified by Beroaldus, as having reference to a common opinion among the scribes in those days, that the 111 years of servitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339 years ascribed to the judges; which account the apostle would not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speak as the vulgar, qualifying it with a Quasi, where he saith, Quasi quadringentis & quinquaginta annis; As it were four hundred and fifty years. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs have it to be so indeed; and therefore disjoins the members to make the account even. In so doing he dasheth himself against a notable text; whereupon all authors have builded (as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth cast up the years from the departure out of Egypt, unto the building of Solomon's temple, not omitting the very month itself.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) having already given saith to his own interpretation of St. Paul, he thinketh it more needful to find some new exposition for that, which is of itself most plain, than to examine his own conjecture, upon a place that is full of controversy. Thus by expounding, after a strange method, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he loseth himself in those ways, wherein before him never man walked. Surely if one should urge him to give reason of these new opinions, he must needs answer, that Othoniel could not govern above 25 years, because then was the taking of Laiſh, at which time there was no king in Israel: that the Danites must needs have taken Laiſh at that time, because else we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the temple, to any action that might be termed the coming of Israel out of Egypt, without excluding the years of servitude; and that the years of servitude must needs be included, for that otherwise he himself should have spent his time vainly, in seeking to pleasure St. Paul with an exposition. Whether this ground be strong enough to uphold a paradox, I leave it to the decision of the judicious reader.

And now to proceed in our story. To the time of Jephthah are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the provisions which her husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon king of Mycenæ, made for her recovery. Others refer this rape of Helen to the fourth year of Ibzan; from which time, if the war of Troy (as they suppose) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elon, yet the Greeks had six years to prepare themselves; the rule holding not true in this war, Longa preparatio belli celerem affert victoriam; That a long preparation begets a speedy victory; for the Greeks consumed 10 years in the the attempt; and Troy as it seems was entred, sack'd and burnt in the third year of Habdon.

Three years after Troy was taken, which was in the sixth year of Habdon, Aeneas arrived in Italy. Habdon in the eighth year of his rule died, after he had been the father of 40 sons and 30 grand-children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40 years of Israel's oppression by the Philistines (of which Judg. xiii. 1.) took beginning from the ninth year of Jair, and ended with the last of Habdon; I see no great reason for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrel against Jephtha, for not calling them to war over Jordan, if the Philistines had held them in servitude in their own territories; and if Ephraim could have brought 42000 armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppress'd; and had it been true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather have fought against the Philistines, with so powerful an army, for their own deliverance, than against their own brethren the Israelites? But Ammon being overthrown, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore these 40 years must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Sampson, and afterwards; or else they must be referred to the Inter-regnum between the death of Habdon, and the deliverance of Israel by Sampson, such as it was.

C H A P. XIV.

Of the war of Troy.

S E C T. I.

Of the genealogy of the kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient poets how they have observed historical truth.

TH E war at Troy, with other stories hereupon depending (because the ruin of this city, by most chronologers is found in the time of Habdon, judge of Israel, whom in the last place I have mentioned) I rather choose here to intreat of in one intire narration, beginning with the lineal descent of their princes, than to break the story into pieces, by rehearsing a-part in divers years the diversity of occurrents.

The history of the ancient kings of Troy is uncertain, in regard both of their original, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Teucer and Dardanus were the two founders of that kingdom. This is the opinion of Virgil; which if he (as Reineccius thinks) took from Berosus, it is the more probable; if Annius borrowed it of him, then it rests upon the authority of Virgil, who saith thus:

 Creta Jovis magni medio jacet insula ponto:
Mons Idaeus ubi, & gentis cunabula nostrae.
Centum urbes habitant magnas, uberrima regna:
Maximus unde pater (si rite audita recordor)
Teucus Rhæteas primum est advectus ad oras:
Optavitque locum regno. Nondum Ilium & arces
Pergamæ steterant; habitabant vallibus imis.
Hinc mater cultrix Cybele, Corybantiaque æra, Idæumque nemus.*

In the main sea the isle of Crete doth lie:
Where Jove was born, thence is our progeny.

There is mount Ida; there in fruitful land
An hundred great and goodly cities stand.
Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
Teucer the eldest of our grand-fires came To the Rhætean shores; and reigned there Ere yet fair Ilium was built, and ere The towers of Troy; their dwelling-place they fought
In lowest vales. Hence Cybel's rights were brought:
Hence Corybantian cymbales did remove:
And hence the name of our Idæan grove.

Thus it seems by Virgil, who followed surely good authority, that Teucer first gave name to that country, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus; of which Dardanus in the same book he speaks thus:

*Est locus Hesperiam Graii cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque ubere glebæ.
Oenotrii coluere viri, nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.
Hæ nobis propriæ sedes, hinc Dardanus ortus:
Jasiusque pater, genus a quo principe nostrum.*

Hesperia the Grecians call the place;
An ancient fruitful land, a warlike race.
Oenotrians held it, now the latter progeny
Gives it their captain's name, and calls it Italy.
This seat belongs to us, hence Dardanus,
Hence came the author of our stock, Jasius.

*^b Atque equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis) Auruncos ita ferre senes, his ortus ut agris
Dardanus Idæas Phrygiæ penetravit ad urbes, Threiciamque Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrheni ab sede profectum
Aurea nunc folio stellantis regia cæli Accipit, &c.*

Some old Auruncans, I remember well (Though time have made the same obscure) would tell
Of Dardanus, how born in Italy;
From hence he into Phrygia did flee.
And leaving Tuscaine (where he erst had place)
With Corytus did sail to Samothrace;
But now enthronized he sits on high,
In golden palace of the starry skie.

But contrary to this, and to so many authors, approving and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that these names, Troes, Teuceri, and Thracæ, are derived from Tiras or Tbiras the son of Japhet; and that the Dardanians, Mysians, and Ascanians, mix'd with the Trojans, were German nations, descended from Asbkenaz, the son of Gomer: of whom the country, lake, and river of Ascanius in Asia took name. That Asbkenaz gave name to those places and people, it is not unlikely; neither is it unlikely that the Ascanii, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times pass into Europe; that the name of Teucer came of Tiras, the conjecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Strabo makes him an Athenian, I find none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reporteth him to be of Crete, whose authority is the more to be regarded, because he had good means to find the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow; seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus and others, that think him a Phrygian, by which report he was the son of Scamander and Ida, lord of the country, not founder of the city; and his daughter or niece Batia, was the second wife of Dardanus, founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks, that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gave his daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus; and that these were parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise, and the common tradition of poets makes Dardanus the son of Electra by Jupiter, which Electra was the daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus king of Hetruria, to whom she bare Jasius. Annius out of his Berosus finds the name of Camboblascon, to whom he gives the addition of Coritus, as a title of dignity, making him father of Dardanus and Jasius; and further telling us very particularly of the faction between these brethren, which grew to such heat, that finally Dardanus killed his brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obscurity of the history gives leave to Annius of saying what he list. I that love not to use such liberty, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the son of Jupiter, it must have been of some elder Jupiter, than the father of those that lived about the war of Troy. So it is likewise probable, that Atlas the father of Electra, was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often been said) there were many Jupiters, and many of almost every name of the gods; but it was the custom to ascribe to some one the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my self, with making any narrow search into these fabulous antiquities, but set down the pedigree according to the general fame; allowing to Teucer such parents as Diodorus gives, because others give him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

* Aeneid. 3.

* Boccace. de gen. Deor. l. 4. c. 31.

Concerning the beginning and continuance of the Trojan kingdom, with the length of every king's reign, I have chosen good authors to be my guides, that in a history, whereon depends the most ancient computation of times among the Greeks, I might not follow uncertainties, ill cohering with the consent of writers, and general passage of things elsewhere done. And first for the destruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that city whilst it stood, it is reckoned by ^a*Diodorus* to be 780 years more ancient than the beginning of the 94th olympiad. Whereas therefore 372 did pass between the beginning of the olympiads, the first year of the 94th, it is manifest, that the remainder of 780, that is 408 years went between the destruction of Troy, and the first institution of those games by Iphitus, if the authority of ^b*Diodorus* be good proof, who elsewhere tells us, that the return of the Heraclidae, which was eighty years after the fall of Troy, was 328 years before the first olympiad.

^a Diod. l. 14 ^b Diod. in pref.

Hereunto agrees the authority of ^a*Dionysius Halicarnassensis*, who placing the foundation of Rome in the first of the seventh olympiad, that is four and twenty years after the beginning of those games, accounts it 432 later than the fall of Troy. ^b*Solinus* in express words makes the institution of the olympiads by Iphitus, whom he calleth Iphiclus, 408 years later than the destruction of Troy. The sum is easily collected by necessary inference out of divers other places in the same book. Hereunto doth ^c*Eusebius*, reckoning exclusively agree: and Eratostratus (as he is cited by ^d*Clemens Alexandrinus*) makes up out of many particulars, the same total sum, wanting but one year, as reckoning likewise exclusively.

The other collections of divers writers that are cited by Clemens in the same place, do neither cohere any way, nor depend upon any collateral history, by which they may be verified.

The destruction of Troy being in the year before the olympiads four hundred and eight, we must seek the continuance of that from the beginning to the end out of Eusebius, who leads us from Dardanus onwards thro' the reigns of four kings, by the space of two hundred and five and twenty years, and after of Priamus, with whom also at length it ended. As for the time which passed under Laomedon, we are fain to do as others have done before us, and take it upon trust from Amnius's authors; believing Minotus so much the rather, for that in his account of the former kings reigns, and of Priamus, he is found to agree with Eusebius, which may give us leave to think that Amnius hath not herein corrupted him. But in this point we need not to be very scrupulous: for seeing that no history or account of time depends upon the reigns of the former kings, but only upon the ruin of the city under Priamus, it may suffice that we are careful to place that memorable accident in the due year.

True it is, that some objections appearing weighty, may be alledged in maintenance of different computations, which, with the answers, I purposely omit, as not willing to dispute of those years, wherein the Greeks knew no good form of a year; but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorable, and acknowledged by all writers, whereof this destruction of Troy was one of the most renowned.

The first enterprize that was undertaken by general consent of all Greece was the last war of Troy, which hath been famous even to this day, for the numbers of princes and valiant commanders there assembled: the great battles fought with variable success: the long indurance of the siege; the destruction of that great city; and the many colonies planted in sundry countries; as well by the remainder of the Trojans, as by the victorious Greeks after their unfortunate return. All which things, with innumerable circumstances of special note, have been delivered unto posterity, by the excellent wits of many writers, especially by the poems of that great Homer, whose verses have given immortality to the action, which might else perhaps have been buried in oblivion, among other worthy deeds done both before and since that time. For it is true which Horace saith:

*Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona
Multi, sed omnes illachrimabiles
Urgentur, ignotique longa
Nocte: carent quia vate sacro.*

Many by valour have deserv'd renown

Ere Agamemnon: yet lie all oppress'd

Under long night, unwept for and unknown:

For with no sacred poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilst these writers have with strange fables, or (to speak the best of them) with allegories far strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble undertakers: they have both drawn into suspicion that great virtue which they sought to adorn, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the history, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that we seek for the knowledge of such actions, in histories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of poets, in whose works are both profit and delight: yet small profit to those which are delighted otherwise; but such as can either interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall find matter in poems, not unworthy to be regarded of historians. For those things excepted, which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of authors, written of this great war. All writers consent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris, the son of Priamus, was the cause of taking arms: but how he was hereunto emboldened, it is doubtful.

S E C T. II.

Of the rape of Helen: and strength of both sides for the war.

H*erodotus* fetcheth the cause of this rape from very far: saying, that whereas the Phenicians had ravished Io, and carried her into Egypt, the Greeks to be revenged on the Barbarians, did first ravish Europa whom they brought out of Phenicia into Creta, and afterwards Midea, whom they fetch'd from Colchus, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfy'd for the rape of Io. By these deeds of the Greeks, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirms) was emboldened to do the like; not fearing such revenge as ensued. But all this narration seems frivolous. For what had the king of Colchus to do with the injury of the Phenicians? or how could the Greeks, as in revenge of Io, plead any quarrel against him, that never had heard the name of Phenicians? Thucydides, a writer of unquestionable sincerity, maketh it plain, that the name of Barbarians was not used at all in Homer's time, which was long after the war of Troy; and that the Greeks themselves were not then called all by one names Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were unreasonable to think, that they should have sought revenge upon all nations as barbarous, for the injury received by one: or that all people else should have esteemed of the Greeks, as of a people opposed to all the world; and that even then when as the Greeks had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the re-delivery of Hesione, king Priamus's sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and given to Telamon. This may have been true. For Telamon (as it seems) was a cruel man, seeing his own son Teucer durst not come in his sight, after the war of Troy, but fled into Cypri, only because his brother (Ajax which Teucer could not remedy) had slain himself. Yet, were it so that Hesione was ill intreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely, that Priamus her brother would seek to take her from her husband, with whom she had lived about thirty years, and to whom she had born children, which were to succeed in his dominion. Whereupon I think that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medea, or Hesione: but was merely incited by Venus, that is, by his lust, to do that which in those days was very common. For not only Greeks from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greeks, as Herodotus discourseth, but all people were accustomed to steal women and cattel, if they could by strong hand or power get them; and having stollen them, either to sell them away in some far country, or keep them to their own use. So did Theseus and Pirithous attempt Proserpina; and so did Theseus (long before Paris) ravish Helen. And these practices, as it appears in Thucydides, were so common, that none durst inhabit near unto the sea, for fear of piracy, which was accounted a trade of life no less lawful than merchandise: wherefore Tyndareus the father of Helen, considering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Theseus had made, caused all her wooers, who were most of the principal men in Greece, to bind themselves by solemn oath, that if she were taken from her husband, they should with all their might help to recover her. This done, he gave free choice of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus, brother to Agamemnon: So the cause which drew the Greeks unto Troy, in revenge of Helen's rape, was partly the oath which so many princes had made unto her father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping; for Agamemnon, besides his great dominions in Peloponnesus, was lord of many islands: he was also rich in money, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he embarked for Troy in his own ships, which were more than any other of the Greek princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by the reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon and Menelaus; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise; take arms against the Trojans. The Greeks fleet was (by Homer's account) 1200 sail, or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build ships with decks; only they used (as Thucydides saith) small ships, meet for robbing on the sea; the least of which carried fifty men, the greatest 120, every man (except the captains) being both a mariner and a soldier. By this proportion it appears that the Grecian army consisted of 100000 men, or thereabouts. This was the greatest army that ever was raised out of Greece: and the greatness of this army, doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which ten whole years did stand out against such forces: yet were the Trojans which inhabited the city not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the 2d of Homer's Iliads; but their followers and aids were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Mysia, and the greatest part of Asia the less, took part with the Trojans, the Amazons also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (tho' some think out of Ethiopia) came to their defence.

SECT. III.

Of the Grecians journey, and embassy to Troy; and of Helena's being detained in Egypt; and of the sacrificing of Iphigenia.

Wherefore the Greeks, unwilling to come to trial of arms, if things might be compounded by treaty, sent Menelaus and Ulysses ambassadors to Troy; who demanded Helen and the goods that were taken with her out of Menelaus's house. What answer the Trojans made hereunto it is uncertain. Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian priests makes it very probable that Helen was taken from Paris before his return to Troy. The sum of his discourse is this:

Paris, in his return with Helena, being driven by foul weather upon the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken sanctuary. Proteus, then king of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. When therefore the Greeks demanding Helen had answer, that she was in Egypt: they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the war, which ended in the ruin of Troy. But when after the city taken, they perceived indeed she had not been there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to ask his wife of Proteus. Homer, and the whole nation of poets (except Euripides) vary from this history, thinking it a matter more magnificent and more graceful to their poems, for their retaining of a fair lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to deliver her. Yet in the fourth of his Odyssey, Homer speaks of Menelaus's being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily believed, that he made for pleasure: and if he were driven thither by contrary winds, much more may we think that Paris was likely to have been driven thither by foul weather. For Paris, immediately upon the rape committed, was enforced to fly, taking such winds as he could get, and rather enduring any storm, than to commit himself to any haven in the Greek seas; whereas Menelaus might have put into any port in Greece, and there have remained with good entertainment, until such time as the wind had come about, and served for his navigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirm the saying of the Egyptian priests, which is, that if Helen had been at Troy, it had been utter madness for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him during the war, and so many of his sons slain for the pleasure of one, who neither was heir to the kingdom (for Hector was elder) nor equal in virtue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seem that Lucian spake not more pleasantly than truly, when he said that Helen, at the war of Troy, was almost as old as queen Hecuba, considering that she had been ravished by Theseus the companion of Hercules, who took Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was sister to Castor and Pollux (she and Pollux being said by some to have been twins) who sailed with the Argonauts, having Telamon the father of Ajax in their company before the time that Hesione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Ajax, that was a principal commander in the Trojan war. But whether it were so, that the Trojans could not, or would not, restore Helen, so it was that the ambassadors returned ill contented, and not very well intreated; for there wanted not some that advised to have them slain. The Greeks

hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom some say to have been a runagate Trojan, tho' no such thing be found in Homer) filled the captains and all the host with many troublesome answers and divinations. For he would have Agamemnon's daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger he said withstood their passage. Whether the young lady was sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the goddess was contented with a hind, it is not needful here to be disputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the devil which awaits for all opportunities, is never more importunate than where mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greeks, that the taking of Troy was impossible till some fatal impediments were removed: and that till ten years were pass'd, the town should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding, the Greeks proceeded in their enterprize, under the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his brother Meneleus, Achilles the most valiant of all the Greeks, his friend Patroclus, and his tutor Phoenix; Ajax and Teucer the sons of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Meriones; Nestor, and his sons Antilochus, and Thrasymedes; Ulysses; Mnestheus, the son of Petereus, captain of the Athenians; Dionides the son of Tydeus, a man of singular courage; the wise and learned Palamedes; Ascalaphus, and Ialmenus, the sons of Mars, who had sailed with the Argonauts; Philoctetes also, the son of Pæan, who had the arrows of Hercules, without which Calchas said that the city could not be taken; Ajax the son of Oileus, Peneleus, Thoas, Eumelus, Tisandrus, Eurypilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolamus, the son of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Machaon, the sons of Esculapius: Epeus, who is said to have made the wooden horse, by which the town was taken; and Protesilaus, who first leap'd on shore, neglecting the oracle that threatned death to him that landed first.

SECT. IV.

Of the acts of the Grecians at the siege.

THESE and many other of less note, arriving at Troy, found such sharp entertainment, as might easily persuade them to think that the war would be more than one year's work. For in the first encounter they lost Protesilaus, whom Hector slew, and many others, without any great harm done to the Trojans; save only that by their numbers of men, they won ground enough to incamp themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principal impediment which the Greeks found, was want of victuals, which grew upon them by reason of their multitude, and the smallness of their vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an army. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the ground in Cheroneſſe: others to rob upon the sea for the relief of the camp. Thus was the war protracted nine whole years, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the town receive little loss by them, having equal numbers to maintain the field against such Greeks as continued the siege, and a more safe retreat, if the enemy got the better.

Wherefore Ovid saith, that from the first year till the tenth, there was no fighting at all: and Heraclides commends as very credible the report of Herodotus: That the Greeks did not lie before Troy the first nine years; but only did beat up and down the seas, exercising their men, and enriching themselves, and so by wasting the enemy's country, did block up the town, unto which they returned not until the fatal time drew near, when it should be subverted.

This is confirmed by the enquiry which Priamus made, when the Greek princes came into the field, the tenth year, for he knew none of them, and therefore sitting upon an high tower (as Homer, Iliad. 3. tells) he learned their names of Helen: which tho' it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all have been supposed that he should be ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the town so many years together. Between these relations of Thucydides and Herodotus, the difference is not much, the one saying that a few of the Greeks remained in the camp before Troy, whilst the rest made purveyance by land and sea: the other, that the whole army did spend the time in wasting the sea-coasts. Neither do the poets greatly disagree from these authors: for they make report of many towns and islands wasted, and the people carried into captivity; in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the army could not well, nor would have spared, if any service of importance had been to be performed before the city. Howsoever it was, this is agreed by general consent, that in the beginning of that summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the camp, and a great pestilence arose among the Greeks: which Homer saith, that Apollo sent in revenge of his priest's daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let go for any ransom: but Heraclides, interpreting the place, saith, that by Apollo was meant the sun: who raised pestilent fogs, by which the army was infected, being lodged in a moorish piece of ground. And it might well be that the camp was over-pestered with those who had been abroad, and now were lodged all close together: having also grounded their ships within the fortifications.

About the same time much contention arose between Agamemnon and Achilles about the booty, whereof Agamemnon, as general, having first chosen for his part, a captive woman, and Achilles, in the second place, chosen for himself another, then Ajax, Ulysses, and so the rest of the chief captains in order. When the soothsayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnon's woman should be restored to her father, Apollo's priest, that so the pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage, and say, that he alone would not lose his part of the spoil, but would either take that which had been given to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Ajax, or to Ulysses. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was fain to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his concubine by strong hand, nor to revenge her loss, otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his companies. But the Greeks, encouraged by their captains, presented themselves before the city without him and his troops.

The Trojans were now relieved with great succours, all the neighbour countries having sent them aid: partly drawn to that war by their commanders, who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the war began (as appears by his words in Homer) or for love of himself and his sons, or hope of marriage with some of his many and fair daughters; partly also (as we may well guess) incited by the wrongs received of the Greeks, when they wasted the countries adjoining unto Troy: so that when Hector issued out of the town, he was little inferior to his enemies in numbers of men, or quality of their leaders. The principal captains in the Trojan army, were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helonus, and the other sons of Priamus:

Priamus: Aeneas, Antenor, and his sons Polydamus, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Astus, and the sons of Pantheus, besides Rhesus, who was slain the first night of his arrival, Memnon, queen Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the war. Between these and the Greeks were many battles fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tomb of king Ilus upon the plain; and another at the very trenches of the camp, wherein Hector brake thro' the fortifications of the Greeks, and began to fire their ships; at which time Ajax, the son of Telamon, with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the only men of note, that remaining unwounded, made head against Hector when the state of the Greeks was almost desperate.

Another battle (for so antiquity calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who having obtained leave, drew forth Achilles's troops, relieving the weary Greeks with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Ulysses, and the rest of the princes, tho' sore wounded, yet were driven to put on armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled the Trojans very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought back into the camp; the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torn from him by Hector. It was the manner of those wars, having slain a man, to strip him and hale away his body, not restoring it without ransom, if he were one of mark. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, slightly armed, and commonly followed the success of their captains; who rode not upon horses, but in chariots, drawn by two or three horses, which were guided by some trusty followers of theirs, which drove up and down the field, as they were directed by the captains, who by the swiftness of their horses presenting themselves where need required, threw first their javelins, and then alighting fought on foot, with swords and battle-axes, retiring into the ranks of the footmen, or else returning to their chariots when they found cause, and so began again with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were lost or broken. Their arms defensive were helmets, breast-plates, boots of brass or other metal, and shields commonly of leather, plated over. The offensive were swords and battle-axes at hand; and stones, arrows or darts when they fought at any distance. The use of their chariots (besides the swiftness) was to keep them from weariness, whereto the leaders were much subject, because of their armour, which the strongest and stoutest wore heaviest: also that from them they might throw their javelins downwards with the more violence. Of which weapon I find not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driven to return to their tents for a new one, when the old was gone. Likewise of armours they had little change or none; every man (speaking of the chief) carried his own compleat, of which if any piece were lost or broken, he was driven to repair it with the like if he had any fitting, taken from some captain whom he had slain and stripped: or else to borrow of them that had by such means gotten some to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his armour which Hector (as is said before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was fain to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might revenge the death of Patroclus his dear friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himself unto Achilles, not only restoring his concubine Briseis, but giving him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next battle Achilles did so behave himself, that he did not only put the Trojans to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be believed) he chased three times about the walls of Troy. But great question may be made of Homer's truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the city (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Trojans were fled into it: nor that he could leap over the rivers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must have done in that flight: nor that the Trojans perceiving Hector in such an extremity, would have forbore to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported only to grace Achilles, who having (by what means soever) slain the noble Hector, did not only carry away his dead body, as the custom then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrusting leathern thongs into them, tied him to his chariot, and dragg'd him shamefully about the field, selling the dead body to his father Priamus for a very great ransom. But his cruelty and covetousness were not long unrevenged; for he was shortly after slain with an arrow by Paris, as Homer says, in the Scean gate, or as others in the temple of Apollo, whither he came to have married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too far in love, having slain so many of her brethren, and his body was ransomed (as Lycophron saith) at the self-same rate that Hector's was by him sold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea queen of the Amazons arrived at Troy; who, after some proof given of her valour, was slain by Pyrrius the son of Achilles.

S E C T. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden horse, the book of Dares and Dictys, the colonies of the relicks of Troy.

Finally, after the death of many worthy persons, on each side, the city was taken by night, as all writers agree: but whether by the treason of Aeneas and Antenor; or by a wooden horse as the poets, and common fame (which followed the poets) have delivered, it is uncertain. Some write, that upon one of the gates of Troy called Scean, was the image of a horse, and that the Greeks entering by that gate, gave occasion to the report, that the city was taken by an artificial horse. It may well be, that with some wooden engine which they called an horse, they either did batter the walls, as the Romans in after-times used to do with the ram: or scaled the walls upon the sudden, and so took the city. As for the hiding of men in the hollow body of a wooden horse, it had been a desperate adventure, and serving to no purpose. For either the Trojans might have perceived the deceit, and slain all those princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintain this report they are said to have thought upon) or they might have left it a few days without (for it was unlikely that they should the very first day both conclude upon the bringing it into the town, and break down their walls upon the sudden to do it) by which means they who were shut into it, must have perished for hunger, if they had not by issuing forth unseasonably discovered the invention. Whereas further it is said, that this horse was so high and great, that it could not be brought into the town thro' any of the gates, and that therefore the Trojans were fain to pull down a part of their wall, to make way for it, thro' which breach the Greek did afterwards enter: it is hereby manifest, that the inclosing of so many principal men was altogether together needfuls, considering that without their help there was way sufficient for the army, so that the surprizing of any gate by them was now to no purpose.

John Baptista Gramay, in his history of Asia, discouraging of this war, saith, that the Greeks did both batter the wall with a wooden engine, and were also let into the city by Antenor, at the Scæan gate: the townsmen sleeping and drinking without fear or care, because the fleet of the Grecians had hoisted sail, and was gone the day before to the isle of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Trojans into security. That the city was betrayed, the books of Dares and Dictys must prove, which whether we now have the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they, who have made mention of these writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, have followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictory in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they, having served in that war, made against the common report: had it not been that either those books were even in those times thought frivolous; or else contained no such repugnancy to the other authors as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of men slain in this war which Dares and Dictys say to have been above 600000 on the Trojan side, and more than 800000 of the Greeks, it is a report merely fabulous; forasmuch as the whole fleet of the Greeks was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their army and deeds as much as he could, to be somewhat less than 1200 sail, and the army therein transported over the Greek seas, not much above 100000 men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of men to extol the deeds of their ancients: for which cause both Homer magnified the captains of the Greeks, that served in the war; and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Trojans and their city, from which the Romans descended. Yea, the Athenians long after, in the war which Xerxes the Persian king made against all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Mnestheus the son of Peteus had shewed, in marshalling the Grecian army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had been a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yield unto Gelon, king of almost all Sicily, the admiralty of their seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200 good fighting ships, and 30000 men for their defence.

The like vanity possessed many other cities of Greece, and many nations in these parts of the world, which have striven to bring their descent from some of the princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or unlikelihoods in such their pedigree notwithstanding. But those nations which indeed, or in most probability came of the Trojans, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romans, brought into that country by Aineas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the country adjoining by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the son of king Priamus. To which Hellenicus addeth that the posterity of Hector did resemble such of the Trojans as were left, and reigned over them about Troy.

SECT. VI.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greeks returning from Troy.

Concerning the Greek, they tasted as much misery as they had brought upon the Trojans. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode in the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their countries by faction: some were slain anon after their arrival: others were debarred from the sovereignty among their people, by such as had staid at home. The cause of all which may seem to have been the dispersion of the army which weakened much by the calamities of that long war, was of little force to repel injuries, being divided into so many pieces under several commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising upon the division of the booty, and the like occasions) at the time when they should have set sail, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediately, the other to stay and perform some sacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, half the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailing to the isle of Tenedos; where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned back to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his own course. But the whole fleet was sore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be persuaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor, and Pyrchus, whom Crestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus and Philoctetes, who nevertheless, as Virgil tells, were driven soon after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italy. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slain by his wife, and by the adulterer Egyffbus, who for a while after usurped his kingdom. Menelaus wandering long upon the seas, came into Egypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seem) to fetch her. Ulysses, after ten years, having lost all his company, got home in poor estate, with much ado recovering the mastership of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and fain to seek out new habitations.

Ajax, the son of Oileus, was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to king Daunus, who was lord of the Iapyges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driven into Asiick, others into Italy, all the east part whereof was called Magna Grecia, by reason of so many towns which the Greeks were driven to erect upon that coast. Finally it appears in Homer, that the Grecian ladies, whose husbands had been at the war of Troy, were wont to call it, the place where the Greeks suffered misery, and the unlucky city not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy, and those that warred there: the overthrow of which city, as hath been said, happened in the time of Abaddon judge of Israel, whom Samson after a vacancy or Inter-regnum for certain years succeeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of Samson, Eli and Samuel.

SECT. I.

Of SAMSON.

THE birth and acts of Samson are written at large in the 13, 14, 15, and 16th of Judges; and therefore I shall not need to make a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that story. First, That the angel of God forbade the wife of Manoah the mother of Samson, to drink wine or strong drink, or to eat any unclean meat, after she was conceived with child, because because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrink the child in the mother's womb. Tho' this were even the counsel of God himself, and delivered by his angel, yet it seemeth that many women of this age have not read, or at least will not believe this precept; the most part forbearing nor drinks, nor meats, how strong or unclean soever, filling themselves with all sorts of wines, and with artificial drinks far more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are born into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, It is to be noted, that the angel of God refused the sacrifice which Manoah would have offered him, commanding him to present it unto the Lord: and therefore those that profess divination by the help of angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are devils who accept thereof, and not good angels, who receive no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, This Samson was twice betrayed by his wives, to wit, by their importunity and deceitful tears: by the first he lost but a part of his goods: by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas evertit; Whom no force could overthrow, voluptuousness overturned.

Fourthly, We may note, that he did not in all deliver Israel from the oppression of the Philistines; tho' in some sort he revenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slain 30 of them in his first attempt, burnt their corn in harvest time, and given them a great overthrow instantly upon it: yet so much did Israel fear the Philistines, as they assembled 3000 men out of Judah to besiege Samson in the rock or mountain of Etam, using these words: Knowest thou not that the Philistines are rulers over us? After which they bound him, and delivered him unto the Philistines, for fear of their revenge; tho' he was no sooner loosened, but he gave them another overthrow, and slew 1000 with the jaw-bone of an ass.

Lastly, Being made blind, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, he was content to end his own life, to be avenged of his enemies, when he pulled down the pillars of the house at the feast whereto they sent for Samson, to deride him, till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly said of Seneca; Patientia sæpe læsa vertitur in furorem; Patience often wounded is converted into fury: neither is it at any time so much wounded by pain and loss, as by derision and contumely.

SECT. II.

Of Eli, and of the ark taken, and of Dagon's fall, and the sending back of the ark.

THE story of Eli the priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickedness of his sons, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: * whose sins were horrible, both in abusing the sacrifice, and profaning and polluting the holy places: tho' Levi Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the women by the sons of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to cast the Israelites under the swords of the Philistines; of whom there perished in the first encounter 4000, and in the second battle 50000 footmen; among whom the sons of Eli being slain, their father (hearing the lamentable success) by falling from his chair, brake his neck. He was the first that obtained the high-priesthood of the stock of Ithamar the son of Aaron, before whose time it continued successively in the race of Eleazer the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazer the second, Phinees the son of Eleazar the third, Abisue the son of Phinees the fourth, his son Bocci the fifth, Ozi the son of Bocci the sixth, and then Eli, as Josephus and Lyranus out of divers Hebrew authors have conceived. In the race of Ithamar the priesthood continued after Eli to the time of Solomon who cast out Abiathar, and established Zadok and Abimaaz and their successors. The ark of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battle taken by the Philistines. For as David witnesseth, Psal. lxxviii. God greatly abhorred Israel, so that he forsook the habitation of Shilo: even the tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and delivered his power into captivity, &c.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the ark whereby himself was represented, should fall into the hands of the heathen, for the offences of the priests and people: so did he permit the Chaldeans to destroy the temple built by Solomon; the Romans to overthrow the second temple; and the Turks to overthrow the Christian churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the sacrament, or representation, which was the ark, than in God himself, they would have observed his laws, and served him only: which whensoever they did, they were then victorious. For after the captivity they had no ark at all, nor in the times of the Maccabees; and yet for their piety it pleased God to make that family as victorious, as any that guarded themselves by the sign instead of the substance. And that the ark was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an ensign, David witnessed when he fled from Abisalom. For when the priests would have carried the ark with him; he forbade it, and caused it to be returned into the city, using these words. If I shall find favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again: if not, let him do to me as seemeth good in his eyes.

The Trojans believed, that while their Palladium, or the image of Minerva, was kept in Troy, the city should never be overturned: so did the Christians in the last fatal battle against Saladine, carry into the field, as they were made believe, the very cross whereon Christ died, and yet they lost the battle, their bodies and the wood. But Chrysostom upon St. Matthew (if that be his work) giveth a good judgment, speaking of those that wore a part of St. John's gospel about their necks, for an amulet or preservative. Si tibi ea non profunt in auribus, quomodo proderunt in collo? If those words do not profit men in their ears (to wit, the hearing of the gospel preached) how should it profit them by hanging it about their necks? For it was neither the wood of the ark, nor the wood of the cross, but the reverence of the father, that gave the one for a memory of his covenant: and the faith in his son, which shed his blood on the other for redemption, that could or can profit them and us, either in this life or after it.

The Philistines returning with the greatest victory and glory which ever they obtained, carried the ark of God with them to Azotus, and set it up in the house of Dagon their idol: but that night the idol fell out of his place, from above to the ground, and lay under the ark. The morning following they took it up, and set it again in his place, and it fell the second time, and the head brake from the body, and the hands from the arms, shewing that it had nor power nor understanding in the presence of God; for the head fell off, which is the seat of reason and knowledge, and the hands (by which we execute strength) were sundred from the arms. For God and the devil inhabit not in one house, nor in one heart. And if this idol could not endure the representation of the true God, it is not to be marvelled, that at such time as it pleased him to cover his only begotten with flesh, and sent him into the world, that all the oracles wherein the devil derided and betrayed mortal men, lost power, speech, and operation at the instant. For when that true light, which had never beginning of brightness, brake thro' the clouds of a virgin's body, shining upon the earth, which had been long obscured by idolatry, all those foul and stinking vapours vanished. Plutarch rehearseth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great god Pan, as he stileth him; where (as ignorant of the true cause) he searcheth his brains for many reasons of so great an alteration: yet finds he none out but frivolous. For not only this old devil did then die as he supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Jupiter, Diana, and the whole rabble became speechless.

Now while the Philistines triumphed after this victory, God struck them with the grievous disease of the Hemorrhoides of which they perished in great numbers: for it is written the Lord destroyed them. It was therefore by general consent ordered, that the ark should be removed from Azotus to Gath or Geth, another of the five great cities of the Philistines; to prove, as it seemeth, whether this disease were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediately: but when it was brought to Gath, and received by them, the plague was yet more grievous and mortal. ^a*For the hand of the Lord was against the city with a very great destruction, and he smote the men of the city both small and great, &c.* And being not yet satisfied, they of Gath sent the ark to Ekron or Accaron, a third city of the Philistines: but they also felt the same smart, and cried out that themselves and their people should be slain thereby; For there was a destruction and death throughout all the city. In the end, by the advice of their priests, the princes of the Philistines did not only resolve to return the ark, but to offer gifts unto the God of Israel, remembering the plague which had fallen on the Egyptians, when their hearts were hardened to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his service by strong hand. Wherefore confessing the power of the God of Israel to be almighty, and that their own idols were subject thereunto, they agreed to offer a sin-offering, using these words; So ye shall give glory to the God of Israel, that he may take hand from you, and from your gods, and from your land, 1 Sam. vi. 5. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an enemy doth approve our cause? according to Aristotle; Pulchrum est testimonium, quo nostra probantur ab hostibus. So did Pharaoh confess the living God, when he was plagued in Egypt: and Nabuchodonosor, and Darius, when they had seen his miracles by Daniel.

This counsel therefore of the priests being imbraced, and the golden Hemorrhoides, and the golden mice prepared, they caused two milch kine to be chosen, such as had not been yoked, and a new cart or carriage to be framed: but they durst not drive or direct it to any place certain, thereby to make trial whether it were indeed the hand of God that had stricken them. For if the ark of God were carried towards Bethshemesb, and into the territory of Israel: then they should resolve that from God only came their late destruction. For the Philistines knew that the milch kine which drew the ark could not be forced from their calves, but that they would have followed them wheresoever; much less when they were left to themselves, would they travel a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the world, if calves be removed from their dams, the kine will follow them thro' woods and desarts by the foot, till they find them. But the kine travelled directly towards Bethshemesb; and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, of one Joshua of the same city, they stood still there; which when the princes of the Philistines perceived, they returned to Ekron: after which, God spared not his own people the Bethshemites, in that they presumed to look into the ark. And because they knew God and his commandments, and had been taught accordingly, he struck them more grievously than he did the heathen, for there perished of them fifty thousand and seventy. From hence the ark was carried to Kirjath-jearim, and placed in the house of Abinadab; where it is written, that it remained twenty years in the charge of Eleazar his son, until David brought it to Jerusalem.

Now whereas it is said, that in the mean while the ark was in Nob, Mispah, and Galgala, it was the tabernacle, which was at this time severed from the ark: or at least, it was for the present occasion brought to these places, and anon returned to Kirjath-jearim.

SECT. III.

Of Samuel, and of his government.

THESE tragedies overpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while he was yet a child, became now judge and governour of Israel. He was descended of the family of ^d*Chore* or Korach. For Levi had three sons; Gerson, Cheath, and Merari: Cheath had Amram, and Izaar: of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Izaar, Chore: and of the family of Chore, Samuel. His father Elcana a Levite, was called an Ephratean, not that the Levites had any proper inheritance, but because he was of mount ^e*Ephraim*, like as Jeſſe, David's father was called an Ephratean, because born at Ephrata, or Bethlehem. Hannah his mother being long fruitless, obtained him of God by prayers and tears: it being an exceeding shame to the Jewish women to be called barren, in respect of the blessing of God both to Abraham, that his seed should multiply as the stars of heaven, and the sands of the sea, as in the beginning to Adam, Increase and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomy vii. There shall be neither male nor female barren among you.

Samuel was no sooner born, but that his mother, according to her former vow, dedicated him to God, and his service, to which she delivered him even from the dug. For as the first-born of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were 5 years old for 5 sheckles, between 5 years and 20 for 20 sheckles: so was it not required by the law that any of the race of the Levites should be called to serve about the tabernacle, till they were 25 years old.

St. Peter reckons in the Acts the prophets from Samuel, who was the first of the writers of holy scriptures, to whom usually this name of a prophet was given, and yet did Moses account himself such a one, as in Deuteronomy xviii. 15. The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet like unto me, &c. But he is distinguished from those that preceded him, who were called seers; as 1 Sam. ix. Before time in Israel, when a man went to seek an answer of God, thus he spake; come and let us go to the seer: for he that is now called a prophet, was in old time called a seer. And altho' it pleased God to appear by his angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that God had altogether withdrawn his grace from Israel: but as the Chaldean paraphrast hath it, those revelations before Samuel's time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel judged were Maspha or Mitspha, seated on a hill in Benjamin near Juda: also Gilgal, and Bethel, of which we have spoken elsewhere.

The Philistines taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation for war at Mitspha in the beginning of Samuel's government, gathered their army and marched towards the city: at whose approach the Israelites stricken with fear, and with the memory of their former slaughters and servitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them: who was ^b then performing his sacrifice when the Philistines were in view. But God being moved with Samuel's prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia) it pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beat down the army of the Philistines, according to the prophecy of Hanna, Samuel's mother. ^c The Lord's adversaries shall be destroyed, and out of heaven shall he thunder upon them, &c. Josephus affirms, that a part of the Philistines were swallowed with an earth-quake: and that Samuel himself led the Israelites in the prosecution of their victory. After which Samuel erected a monument in memory of this happy success obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Josephus called lapidem sortem: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunity and advantage of the victory, the Israelites recovered divers cities of their own formerly lost, and held long in possession of the Philistines, who for a long time after did not offer any invasion or revenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts, the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the north of them, that they might not be assaulted from divers parts at once; having the Philistines towards the west and sea-coast, the Canaanite towards the north and east, and the Idumite on the south. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gave audience and judgment in divers places by turns, as hath been elsewhere said.

C H A P. XVI.

Of SAUL.

S E C T. I.

Of the deliberation to change the government into a kingdom.

BUT when age now began to overtake Samuel, and that he was not able to undergo the burthen of so careful a government, he put off from himself the weight of the affairs on his sons, Joel and Abijah, who judged the people at Beerseba, a city, the very utmost towards the south of Judea. And as the place was inconvenient and far away, so were themselves no less removed from the justice and virtue of their father. For the thirst of covetousness the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gain; to recover which they set the law at a price, and sold justice and judgment to the best chapmen. Which when the elders of Israel observed, and saw that Samuel as a natural man (tho' a prophet) could not so well discern the errors of his own, they pray'd him to consent to their change of government, and to make them a king, by whom they might be judged as other nations were; who might also lead them to the war, and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable success which followed the rule of Eli his sons, when those of Samuel by their first blossoms promised to yield fruit no less bitter, they saw no way to put the government from out his race, whom they so much revered, but by the choice of a king.

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsel from God: which surely he did not for the establishing of his own sons; who being as they were, God would not have approved his election. Now as it appears by the text, this speech or motion displeasing him, he used his best arguments to dehort them: which when he perceived to be over-feeble, he delivered unto them from God's revelation, the inconveniencies and miseries which should befall them. And yet all which he foresaw'd was not intolerable, but such as hath been borne, and is so still by free consent of the subjects towards their princes. For first he makes them know that the king will use their sons in his own service to make them his horse-men, charioteers, and footmen; which is not only not grievous, but by the vassals of all kings according to their birth and condition desired: it being very agreeable to subjects of the best quality to command for the king in his wars; and to till the ground no less proper and appertaining to those that are thereto bred and brought up: so are likewise the offices of women-servants to dress meat, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatned: He will take up your fields, and your vineyards, and your best olive trees, and give them to his servants, with other oppressions; this hath given, and gives daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their own discretion, to affirm that Samuel describeth here unto them the power of a king, governed by his own affections, and not a king that feareth God. But others upon further examination construe this text far otherwise, as teaching us what subjects ought with patience to bear at their sovereign's

^a 1 Sam. 13. See in this book, chap. 12. sect. 1. ^b Plutarch reports of Numa the 2d king of Rome, that when as he was at sacrificing, he saw a multitude of the enemies approached, he nothing dismay'd, answered, Ego autem sacrifico ^c 1 Sam. 2. 10.

hand. The former opinion is grounded first upon that place of Deuteronomy xvii. where God sheweth this change of government from judges to kings, and after he had forbidden many things unto the kings, as many wives, covetousness, and the like, he commandeth that the kings, which were to reign over Israel, should write the law of Deuteronomy, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the king should honour the law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life: that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, and to keep all the words of this law and these ordinances for to do them: that he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he and his sons. But to take away any other man's field, say they, is contrary to the laws of God, in the same book written. For it is said, Deut. vi. That which is just and right shalt thou follow, that thou mayst live. Now if it be not permitted to carry away ^a grapes more than thou canst eat out of another man's vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much less lawful to take the vineyard it self from the owner, and give it to another. Neither are the words of the text ^b (say they) such as do warrant the kings of Israel, or make it proper unto them, to take at will any thing from their vassals. For it is not said that it shall be lawful for the king, or the king may do this or that: but it is written, that the king will take your sons: and again, this shall be the manner of the king that shall reign over you. God thereby foreshewing what power, severed from piety (because it is accountable to God only) will do in the future. And hereof we find the first example in Achab, who took from Naboth both his vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of governing well his people. For God commanded, Deut. xvi. That his people shall be judged with righteous judgment. Wherefore tho' the king had offer'd unto Naboth composition, as a vineyard of better value, or the worth in money, which he refused: yet because he was falsely accused and unjustly condemned (tho' by colour of law) how grievously Achab was punished by God, the scriptures tell us. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the elders, but to the king, who is called a living law, even as David testifieth of himself. Posuisti me in caput gentium: for this of St. Augustine is very true; Simulata innocentia non est innocentia: simulata equitas non est equitas: sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas & simulatio; Feigned innocence, and feigned equity are neither the one or the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquity and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disputation who think this place to contain the description of a tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well known to all; being excellently handled in that princely discourse of The true law of free monarchies, which treatise I may not presume to abridge, much less here to insert. Only, thus much I will say, that if practice do shew the greatness of authority, even the best kings of Juda and Israel were not so tied by any laws, but that they did whatsoever they pleased in the greatest things; and commanded some of their own princes, and of their own brethren to be slain without any trial of law, being sometimes by prophets reprehended, sometimes not. For tho' David confess'd his offence for the death of Uriah, yet Solomon killing his elder brother, and others, the same was not imputed unto him as any offence.

That the state of Israel should receive this change of government, it was not only foretold by Moses in Deuteronomy, but prophesied of by Jacob in this scripture: ^c The sceptre shall not depart from Juda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing. For it was not only assured that his issues should in number equal the stars in heaven, but that kings should proceed of him. Which state seeing it is framed from the pattern of his sole rule, who is Lord of the universal: and the excellency thereof in respect of all other governments, hath been by many judicious men handled and proved, I shall not need to over-paint that which is garnished with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the judges every man hath observed what civil war Israel had: what outrageous slaughters they committed upon each other: in what miserable servitude they lived for many years: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their own territories, or recover some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the country. The Ammonites held much of Gilead over Jordan: the Philistines the sea-coasts: and the Jebusites Jerusalem it self, till David's time: all which that king did not only conquer and establish, but he mastered and subjected all the neighbour nations, and kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moved by those reasons, which allure the most of all nations to live under a monarch, or whether by this means they sought to be cleared from the sons of ^e Samuel, they became deaf to all the persuasions and threats which Samuel used, insisting upon this point, that they would have a king, both to judge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, he sent every man to his own city and abiding.

SECT. II.

Of the election of Saul.

AFTER that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Mizpah, he forbore the election of a king, till such time as he was therein directed by God: who foretold him the day before, that he would present unto him a man of the land of Benjamin, whom he commanded Samuel to anoint. So Samuel went unto Ramath Sophim, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of God's promises) and Saul also having wandered divers days to seek his father's asses, at length by the advice of his servant travelled towards Ramath, to find out a seer or a prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to find his beasts. In which journey it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages and persons) to elect Saul, who sought an ass, and not a kingdom: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheep of Jthro; and after to make choice of ^f David the youngest of eight sons, and by the scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beasts, and changed his sheep-hook into a sceptre, making him of all other the most victorious king of Juda and Israel. So John and Jacob were taken from calling their nets, to become fishers of men, and honoured with the titles of apostles, a dignity that died not in the grave, as all worldly honours do: but permanent and everlasting in God's endless kingdom.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the king, whom he expected, and staid his arrival at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom he had foretold him of, that he should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, tho' a prophet and judge of Israel, much less knowing the honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the city the seer dwelt; Samuel answered, that himself was the man he sought, and pray'd Saul to go before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, above all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affairs of the kingdom, and of God's graces to be bestowed on him, and the morning following anointed him king of Israel.

After this, he told him all that should happen to him in the way homeward; that two men should encounter him, by Rahel's sepulchre, who should tell him that his asses were found; and that his father's cares were changed from the fear of losing his beasts, to doubt the loss of his son: that he should then meet three other men in the plain of Tabor; then a company of prophets; and that he should be partaker of God's spirit and prophesy with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar into that which became a king elected and favoured by God.

But the prophets here spoken of, men indued with spiritual gifts, were not of the first and most revered number, who by divine revelation foretold things to come, reprehended without fear the errors of their kings, and wrought miracles; of which number were Moses, Joshua, Samuel, and after them Gad, Nathan, Abias, Elias, Eliseas, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the rest; for these prophets, faith * St. Chrysostome, Omnia tempora percurrunt, præterita, præsentia & futura: but they were of those of whom St. Paul speaketh, 1 Cor. xiv. 15. who, enriched with spiritual gifts, expounded the scriptures and the law.

At Mispeth Samuel assembled the people that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his own uncle therewith, when he asked him what had pass'd between him and Samuel: for either he thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reveal it, till he were confirmed by general consent. When the tribes were assembled at Mispeth, the general opinion is, that he was chosen by lot. Cibimbi thinks by the answer of Urim and Thummim: that is, by the answer of the priest, wearing that mystery upon his breast when he asked counsel of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not only much used among the Jews, but by many others, if not by all nations. The land of promise was divided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two goats, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christ's suffering, and our deliverance, for whose garments the Jews also cast lots. * Cicero, Plautus, * Pausanias, and others, have remembered divers sorts of lots, used by the Romans, Grecians, and other nations: as in the division of grounds or honours; and in things to be undertaken: the two first kinds were called diversory; the third divinatory; and unto one of these three all may be reduced: all which kinds howsoever they may seem chancelous, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Proverbs; The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the kingdom of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by God's ordinance, who gave Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul withdrew himself in modesty, as both Josephus construe it, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when he acknowledged himself the least of the least tribe. But Samuel, enlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that he was the chosen king of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him king, and pray'd for him; yet some there were that envied his glory (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him presents as the manner was; of whom Saul, to avoid sedition, took no notice.

SECT. III.

Of the establishing Saul by his first victories.

N O sooner was Saul placed in the kingdom, but that he received knowledge that Nabas king of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Jabes Gilead: which nation since the great overthrow given them by Jephtha, never durst attempt any thing upon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul's rule. And altho' the Ammonites did always attend upon the advantage of time, to recover those territories which first the Amorite, and then Israel dispossessed them of, which they made the ground of their invasion in Jephtha's time; yet they never persuaded themselves of more advantage than at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new king: secondly, they were remembered that the Philistines had not long before slain 34000 of their men of war: and besides had used great care and policy that they should have no smiths to make them swords or spears: neither was it long before that of the Bethshemeshites and places adjoining, there perished by the hand of God more than 50000, and therefore in these respects, even occasion it self invited them to enlarge their dominions upon their borderers: Jabes Gilead being one of the nearest. Besides, it may further be conjectured that the Ammonites were emboldened against Jabes Gilead, in respect of their weakness, since the Israelites destroy'd a great part of them, for not joining with them against the Benjamites: at which time they did not only slaughter the men and male-children, but took from them their young women, and gave them to the Benjamites: and therefore they were not likely to have been increased to any great numbers: and if they had recovered themselves of this great calamity, yet the Ammonite might flatter himself with the opinion, that Israel having for long time been disarmed by the Philistines, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroy'd. But contrariwise when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would give them no other condition to ransom themselves, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they should be utterly disabled for the war, as elsewhere hath been spoken: Saul, both to value himself in his first year's reign, and because perchance he was descended of one of those 400 maids taken from the Gileadites, and given to the Benjamites, gave order to assemble the forces

* Chrys. in Psal. 43. b The Urim and Thummim in the ornaments of the high priest were inserted within the pectoral, which therefore was duplicatum, they were placed in the pectoral over against the breast of the high priest. of Israel: hewing a yoke of oxen into pieces, and sending them by messengers over all the coasts, protesting thus, That whosoever came not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so should his oxen be served: threatening the people by their goods, and not by their lives at the first. Seven days had Saul to assemble an army, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these 7 days to give Nabas the Ammonite an answer: who, could they have obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to have severed themselves from Israel, and to become vassals and tributaries to the heathen. In the mean while Saul assembled the forces, which repaired unto him at Bezek, near Jordan, that he might readily pass the river; which done, he might in one day with a speedy march arrive at Jabes, under the hills of Gilead.

The army by ^a Saul led, consisting of 330000: he returned an answer to those of Jabes, that they should assure themselves of succour by the next day at noon. For as it seemeth Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning-watch he surpris'd the army of Nabas the Ammonite. And to the end that he might set on them on all sides, he divided his forces into 3 parts, putting them to the sword, until the heat of the day, and the weariness of Saul's troops, forc'd them to give over the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more careless and secure, in that those of Jabes promised the next morning to render themselves and their city to their mercy. After this happy success, the people were so far in love with their new king, that they would have slain all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himself forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent lovers of the prosperous, and base vassals of the time that flourisheth: and as despightful and cruel without cause against those, whom any misadventure, or other worldly accident, hath thrown down.

After the army removed, ^b Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and, as some commentators affirm, anointed king: and here Samuel used an exhortation to all the assembly, containing precepts, and a rehearsal of his own justice during the beginning of his government to that day. After ^c Saul had now reigned one year before he was established in Gilgal or Galgala, he strengthened himself with a good guard of 3000 chosen men, of which he assigned 1000 to attend on Jonathan his son at Gibeah, the city of his nativity: the rest he kept about his own person in Macmas, and in the hill of Bethel.

S E C T. IV.

Of Saul's disobedience in his proceedings in the wars with the Philistines and Amalekites, which caused his final rejection.

Jonathan, with his small army or regiment that attended him, taking a time of advantage, surpris'd a garrison of Philistines: the same, as some think, which Saul pass'd by, when he came from Rama, where he was first anointed by Samuel, which they think to have been Cariatb-jearim: because a place where the Philistines had a garrison, ¹ Sam. x. is called the hill of God, which they understand of Cariatb-jearim: but Junius understands this garrison to have been at Gabah, in Benjamin near Gibba, where Jonathan abode with his thousand followers. Howsoever, by this it appeareth, that the Philistines held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the territory of Israel: and now being greatly enraged by this surprize they assembled ^d 30000 armed chariots, and 6000 horse, wherewith they invaded Judea, and incamped at Macmas or Michmas, a city of Benjamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Jerusalem, and in the midst of the land between the sea and Jordan. With this sudden invasion the Israelites were stricken in so great a fear, as some of them hid themselves in the caves of the mountains, others fled over Jordan in Gad and Gilead: Saul himself, with some 2000 men of ordinary, and many other people, staid at Galgala in Benjamin, not far from the passage of Joshua when he led Israel over Jordan. Here Saul by Samuel's appointment was to attend the coming of Samuel seven days: but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place, ¹ Sam. xiii. 9.) to exercise the office which appertained not unto him, and to offer a burnt-offering and a peace-offering unto God, contrary to the ecclesiastical laws of the Hebrews, and God's commandments: others expound the word, obtulit, in this place, by obtulit per sacerdotem, and so make the sin of Saul not to have been any intrusion into the priests office, but first a disobedience to God's commandment, in not staying according to the appointment, ¹ Sam. x. 8. secondly, a diffidence or mistrust in God's help, and too great relying upon the strength of the people, whose departing from him he could not bear patiently; and lastly, a contempt of the holy prophet Samuel, and of the help which the prayers of so godly a man might procure him. But whatsoever was his sin, notwithstanding his excuses, he was by ^e Samuel reprehended most sharply, in terms unfitting his estate, had not extraordinary warrant been given to Samuel so to do, from God himself, at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the kingdom should be conferred to another (a man after God's own heart) both from ^f Saul and his posterity.

After this Samuel and Saul returned^g to Gibeah, where Saul, when he had taken view of his army, found it to consist of 600 men: for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea, among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or spear, but Saul and his son Jonathan only. For the Philistines had not left them any smith in all Israel, that made weapons; besides, they that came to ^h Saul came hastily, and left such weapons and armour as they had, behind them in the garrisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should be able the year before, or in some part of this very year, to succour Jabes Gilead with 330000 men, if there had not now been any iron weapon to defend themselves withal, save only in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his son. But howsoever all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistines, and all those craftsmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left unto the Israelites only files to sharpen and amend such stuff as served for the plough, and for nought else: yet that they had some kind of arms it is manifest, or else they durst not have attempted upon the Philistines as they did. And it is not said in the text, that there was not any sword in all Israel, but only that there was not any found amongst those 600 soldiers which stay'd with ⁱ Saul after Samuel's departure: and it seemeth that when Samuel had sharply reprehended Saul, that his own guards forsook him, having but 600 remaining of his 3000 ordinary foldiers, and of all the rest that repaired unto him, of which many were fled from him before Samuel arrived.

With this small troop he held himself to his own city of Gibeab, as a place of more strength and better assured unto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to pass that the Philistines should thus disarm the most part of the Israelites, howsoever in the time of Samuel much had been done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by sword or spear, but by thunder from heaven: and when these craftsmen were once rooted out of the cities of Israel, no marvel if they could not in a short peace under Samuel, be replanted again. For this tyranny of the Philistines is to be understood, rather of the precedent times, than under Samuel: and yet under him it is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policy, not suffering their artificers to teach the Israelites, and so even to the times of Saul kept them from having any store of armour. The same policy did Nabuchodonosor use after his conquest in Judea: Dionysius in Sicily; and many other princes elsewhere in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repair in Gilead, for over Jordan the Philistines had not invaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquity used, and their present necessity ministered unto them; to wit, clubs, bows, and slings. For the Benjamites exceeded in casting stones in slings: and that these were the natural weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in Chronicles i. 12. it is written of those that came to succour David against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were weaponed with bows, and could use the right and the left hand with stones; and with a sling it was, that David himself slew the giant Goliath.

While the state of Israel stood in these hard terms, the Philistines having parted their army into three troops, that they might spoil and destroy many parts at once; Jonathan, strengthened by God, and followed with his esquire only, scaled a mountain, whereon a company of Philistines were lodged: the rest of their army (as may be gathered by the success) being incamped in the plain adjoining. And tho' he were discovered before he came to the hill top, and in a kind of derision called up by his enemies: yet he so behaved himself, as with the assistance of God, he slew 20 of the first Philistines that he encountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarm, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, fear, and jealousy, they slaughtered one another instead of enemies: whereupon those Hebrews which became of their party, because they feared to be spoiled by them, took the advantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly, Saul himself taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that shrouded themselves in mount Ephraim, set upon them, and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happy and glorious victory over them. Here was that prophecy in Deuteronomy fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and two of them ten thousand.

This done, the small army of Israel made retreat from the pursuit. And tho' Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food till the evening, yet his son Jonathan being intebled with extreme labour and emptiness, tasted a drop of honey in his passage: for which Saul his father would have put him to death, had not the people delivered him from his cruelty.

The late miraculous victory of Saul and Jonathan seems to have reduced unto the Philistines remembrance of their former overthrow likewise miraculous in the days of Samuel; so that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the mean while Saul being now greatly encouraged, undertook by turns all his bordering enemies; namely the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobah, against all which he prevailed. He then assembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000 men, and receiving the commandment of God by Samuel, he invaded Amalec, wasting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petraea, and the desert, belonging to the Amalekites, from Havilah towards Tigris unto Sbur, which bordereth Egypt; in which war he took Agag their king prisoner. But whereas he was instructed by Samuel to follow this nation without compassion, because they first of all attempted Israel, when they left Egypt in Moses's time: he notwithstanding did not only spare the life of Agag, but reserved the best of the beasts and spoil of the country, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the living God. Therefore did Samuel now a second time make him know, that God would cast him from his royal estate to which he was raised, when he was of base condition, and as the text hath it, little in his own eyes. And tho' the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voice of God by Samuel, had there been no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not be ignorant how severely it pleased God to injoin the Israelites to revenge themselves upon that nation, he was in all inexcusable. For God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amalec from under heaven. For the cruelty which the predecessors of this Agag used against the Israelites, especially on those which were overwearied, sick, faint and aged people, was now to be revenged on him and his nation above 400 years afterwards; and now he was to pay the debt of blood, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himself having also sinned in the same kind, as these words of Samuel witness: As thy sword hath made other women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among other women; at which time Samuel himself (after he had been by many bootless intreaties persuaded to stay awhile with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, and soon after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul, until the day of his death.

SECT. V.

Of the occurrents between the rejection of Saul and his death.

NOW while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a king for Israel, among the sons of Isbair: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to perform, till it pleased God to direct him how he might avoid both the suspicion, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the providence of God, that by his cautious care and wisdom he sought to avoid the inconvenience or dangers of this life, then do those men mistake the nature of his divine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath given them, do no otherwise avoid the perils and dangers thereof, than as men stupified in the opinion of fate or destiny, neglecting either to beg counsel at God's hand, by prayer, or to exercise that wisdom or foresight, wherewith God had enriched the mind of man, for his preservation. Neither did the all-powerful God (who made, and could destroy the world in an instant) disdain here to instruct Samuel, to avoid the fury of Saul by the accustomed cautious ways of the world.

Of the sons of Isai, Samuel, by God directed, made choice of David the youngest, having refused Eliab the first-born; who, tho' he were a man of a comely person and great strength, yet unto such outward appearance the Lord had no respect. For, as it is written, a God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He also refusing the other six brethren, made choice of one whom his father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flock, for of him the Lord said to Samuel, arise and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to seek the life of David: in which bloody mind he continued till he died, overcome in battel by the Philistines.

The Philistines having well considered (as it seems) the increase of Saul's power through many victories by him obtained, while they had sitten still and forbore to give impediment to his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new trial of their fortune, as justly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Israel, might be repay'd with advantage, if ever opportunity should serve their often injured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the quality of their soldiers, and all warlike provisions, the Philistines had reason to think themselves equal, if not superior, to Israel. The success of their former wars had for the most part been agreeable to their own wishes; as for late disasters, they might, according to human wisdom, impute them to second causes, as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarm, whereby their army possessed with a needless fear had fallen to rout. Having therefore mustered their forces and taken the field, encamping so near to the army which king Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the trial of a battel, each part kept their ground of advantage for a while, not joining in gross, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to pass the valley that lay between their camps. Just causes of fear they had on both sides; especially the Philistines, whose late attempts had been confounded by the angry hand of God. Upon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one man's person, whether any stroke from heaven were to be feared. Goliath of Gath a strong giant, fearing neither God nor man, undertook to defy the whole host of Israel, provoking them with despightful words, to appoint a champion that might fight with him hand to hand, offering condition, that the party vanquished in champion, should hold it self as overcome in gross, and become vassal to the other. This gave occasion to young David, whom Samuel by God's appointment had appointed, to make a famous entrance into publick notice of the people. For no man durst expose himself to encounter the great strength of Goliath, until David (sent by his father on an errand to the camp) accepted the combat, and obtained the victory, without other arms offensive or defensive than a sling, wherewith he overthrew that haughty giant, and after with his own sword struck off his head. Hereupon the Philistines, who should have yielded themselves as subjects to the conqueror, according to the covenant on their own side propounded, fled without stay; and were pursued and slaughtered even to their own gates. By this victory the Philistines were not so broken, that either any of their towns were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the territories of Israel. But David, by whom God had wrought this victory, fell into the grievous indignation of his master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well deserving. For after such time as the Spirit of God departed from Saul and came upon David, he then became a cruel tyrant, faithless and irreligious^b. Because the high-priest Abimelech fed David in his necessity with hallowed bread, and armed him with the sword of his own conquest taken from Goliath; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doeg murdered this Abimelech, and 85 priests of Nob, but also he destroyed the city, c and smote with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both child and suckling, both ox and ass, and sheep. And he that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preserved the best of his cattel, contrary to the commandment and ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercy in store, for the innocent, for the Lord's servants the priests of Israel. Yea, he would have slain his own son^d Jonathan, for pitying and pleading David's innocency, as also once before for tasting the honey, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his father's unreasonable commination. The companions of cruelty are breach of faith towards men, and impiety towards God. The former he shewed in denying David his daughter, whom he had promised him: and again in taking her away from him, to whom he had given her; also in that when as David had twice spared his life in the territory of Ziph, and Saul twice sworn to do him no hurt, and confessed his errors, yet he sought still to destroy him, by all the means he could. His impiety towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsel of the witch of Endor, which was the last preparative for his destruction. For whereas when he sought counsel from God he had been always victorious: from the oracle of the devil this success followed, that both himself, and his three sons, with his nearest and faithfullest servants, were all slaughter'd by the Philistines: his body with the bodies of his sons (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung over the walls of Bethsan: and there had remained till they had found burial in the bowels of ravenous birds, had not the grateful Gileadites of Jabes stolen their carcases thence and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had governed Israel, together with Samuel, 40 years, and by himself after Samuel 20 years, according to^e Cedrenus, Theophilus, and Josephus. But yet it seemeth to me that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long. For in the beginning of the 25th chapter, it is written that Samuel died: and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of David, Nabal and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gave a fair entrance to all those victories which David afterwards obtained, for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring nations; crush'd the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistines.

SECT. VI.

Of such as lived with Samuel and Saul; of Hellen and Hercules, and of their issues: upon occasion of the Doræ, with the Heraclidæ, entering Peloponnesus about this time.

IN the second year of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was David born; after Codoman later, and in the ninth year: after Bunting in the tenth. For David, saith he, was thirty years old when he began to reign: whence it followeth, that he was born in the tenth of the 40 years, which are given to Samuel and Saul. About the eleventh of Samuel, Aeneas Silvius the son of Posthumus began his reign over the Latines in Alba, who governed that state 31 years. There are who place before him Latinus Silvius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from Aeneas, and the fourth king of Alba, whereof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleventh of Samuel, Dercilus sat in the throne of Affyria, being the one and thirtieth king; he ruled that empire 40 years. In this age of Samuel the Doræ obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraclidæ, who then led and commanded the nation, possess'd a great part thereof 328 years before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratosthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by 3 tribes or kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Æolians: at length it was called Hellas, and the people Hellenes, of Hellen, the son of Deucalion, lord of the country Phthiotis in Theffaly. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the land, partly by the plantation of many colonies, and sundry great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the country under their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet every several nation after some one of the posterity of Hellen, who had reigned over it. And because this is the furthest antiquity of Greece, it will not be amiss to recount the pedigree of her first planters.

Iapetus (as the poets fable) was the son of heaven and earth, so accounted, either because the names of his parents, had in the Greek tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in astronomy and philosophy.

Iapetus begat Prometheus, and Epimetheus: of whom all men have read that have read poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion: and Epimetheus, Pyrrrha. Deucalion and his wife Pyrrrha reigned in Theffaly, which was then called Pyrrrha (as Cretensis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrrha the queen. In Deucalion's time was that great flood, of which we have spoken elsewhere. Deucalion begat Hellen: whose sons were Xuthus, Dorus and Æolus, of Dorus and Æolus, the Doræ and Æolians had name. The Æoles inhabited Bœotia. The Doræ having first inhabited sundry parts of Theffaly, did afterwards seat themselves about Parnassus: and finally became lords of the countries about Lacedæmon: Xuthus the eldest son of Hellen, being banish by his brethren, for having diverted from them to his own use some part of their father's goods, came to Atbens: where marrying the daughter of king Erichtheus, he begat on her two sons, Achæus and Ion. Of these two Achæus, for a slaughter by him committed, fled into Peloponnesus: and seating himself in Laconia, gave name to that region: from whence

No. 17.

(as some write) he afterwards departed; and levying an army recovered the kingdom of his grandfather in Theffaly.

Ion being general for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtain a great victory, and thereby such love and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their state into his hands. He divided the citizens into tribes, appointing every one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied he planted colonies in Sycionia, then called Ægialos, or Ægialia: In which country Solinus then reigning, thought it safer to give his daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his heir, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a town called by his wife's name in Ægialia, where he and his posterity reigned long, and (tho' not obliterating the old name) gave to that land denomination. But in after-times the Doræ assisting the nephews of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus, and overcoming the Achæans possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achæi had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achæi driven to seek a new seat, came unto the Iones, desiring to inhabit the Ægialia with them, and alledging in vain, that Ion and Achæus had been brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they fought by force to expel the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their king Tisamenus, the son of Orestes, in that war.

Thus were the Iones driven out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remove into Attica, from whence after a while they sailed into Asia, and peopled the western coast thereof, on which they built 12 cities, inhabited by them, even to this day, at the least without any universal or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Iones into Asia hath been mentioned by all which have written of that age, and is commonly placed 140 years after the war of Troy, and 60 years after the descent of the Heraclidæ into Peloponnesus. These Heraclidæ were they of whom the kings of Sparta issued; which race held that kingdom about 700 years. Of their father Hercules many strange things are delivered unto us by the poets, of which some are like to have been true, others perhaps must be allegorically understood. But the most approved writers think that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greeks ascribed to the son of Alcmena, who is said to have performed these twelve great labours.

First, he slew the Nemean lion: secondly, he slew the serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: the third was the overtaking a very swift hart: the fourth was the taking of a wild boar alive, which haunted mount Erymanthus in Arcady: the fifth was the cleansing of Atgeas's ox-stall in one day, which he performed by turning the river Alpheus into it: the sixth was the chasing away of the birds from the lake Stymphalis: the seventh was the fetching a bull from Crete: the eighth was the taking of the mares which Diomedes king of Thrace fed with human flesh: the ninth was to fetch a girdle of the queen of the Amazons: the three last were, to fetch Geryon's bees from Gades; the golden apples of the Hesperides; and Cerberus from hell. The mythological interpretation of these I purposely omit, as both over-long to be here set down, and no less perplexed than the labours themselves. For some by Hercules understand fortitude, prudence, and constancy, interpreting the monsters, vices. Others make Hercules the sun, and his travels to be the twelve signs of the zodiac. There are are others who apply his works historically to their own conceits; as well assured, that the exposition cannot have more unlikelihood, than the fables: that he took Elis, Pylus, Oechalia, and other towns, being assisted by such as either admired his virtues, or were beholden unto him. Also that he slew many thieves and tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of poetical vanity. His travels through most parts of the world are, or may seem, borrowed from Hercules Libycus. But sure it is that many cities of Greece were greatly bound to him: for that he (bending all his endeavours to the common good) delivered the land from much oppression. But after his death no city of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the virtue and deserts of Hercules, with constant protection of his children, persecuted by the king Eurystheus. This Eurystheus was son of Sthenelus, and grandchild of Perseus; he reigned in Mycene, the mightiest city then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard tasks upon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as poets report) for the expiation of that murder, which in his madness he had committed upon his own children; but as others say, because he was his subject and servant: wherefore there are who commend Eurystheus for employing the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is generally agreed by the best writers, that Hercules was also of the stock of Perseus, and holden in great jealousy by Eurystheus, because of his virtue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous services wherein he was employed, so that he grew great in reputation through all Greece, and had by many wives and concubines above 60 children. These children Eurystheus would fain have got in his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled unto Ceyx king of Thracinia, and from him (for he durst not withstand Eurystheus) to Athens. The Athenians not only gave them entertainment, but lent them aid, wherewith they encountred Eurystheus. Iolaus the brother's son of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his travels, was captain of the Heraclidae. It is said of him, that being dead, he obtained leave of Pluto to live again till he might revenge the injuries done by Eurystheus: whom he when had slain in battel, he died again. It seems to me, that whereas he had led Colonies into Sicily, and abode there a long time forgotten: he came again into Greece to assist his cousins, and afterwards returned back. When the Peloponnesians understood that Eurystheus was slain, they took Atreus the son of Pelops to their king: for he was rich, mighty, and favoured of the people. Against him the Heraclidae marched under Hyllus the son of Hercules. But to avoid effusion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Lichenus king of the Tegeatæ a people of Arcadia, who assisted Atreus, with condition that if Hyllus were victor, he should peaceably enjoy what he challenged as his right: otherwise the Heraclidae should not enter Peloponnesus in 100 years. In that combat Hyllus was slain, and the Heraclidae compelled to forbear their country, till the third generation: at which time they returned under Aristodemus (as the best authority shews, tho' some have said, that they came under the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dores, whom they planted in that country, as is before shewed, having expelled the Achai, over whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurystheus four generations.

SECT. VII.

Of Homer and Hesiod, and many changes in the world, that happened about this age.

ABOUT this time that excellent learned poet Homer lived, as many of the best chronologers affirm. He was by race of the Mæones, descended (as Funclius imagineth) of Berosus's Anamæon, who gave name to that people. But this Funclius imagineth Homer the poet to have been long after these times, rashly framing his Æra according to Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus; and makes seven more of this name to have flourished in divers cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, sprang the diversity of opinions, both of the time and of the native city of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Funclius finds Homer about the time of Manasseh king of Judah, and Numa of Rome. He was called Melesigenes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, because blind men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the verb ὁμαρῶν: for this Homer in his latter time was blind. Clemens Alexandrinus recites many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer lived. So also Aulus Gellius, and Tatianus Assyrius, in his oration Ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flourished 950 years before the consulship of Marcus Vinutius: which Mercator casteth up in the world's year 3046, and after Troy taken, about 260 years: and about 250 years before the building of Rome, making him to have flourished about the time of Jehosaphat king of Judah. But Clemens Alexandrinus, and Tatianus above-named, mention authors that make him much ancients. The difference of which authors in this point is not unworthy the readers consideration, that by this one instance he may guess of the difficulty, and so pardon the errors in the computations of ancient time: seeing in such diversity of opinions a man may hardly find out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarians (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gave being to Homer about 80 years after Troy taken, near the time that the Heraclidae returned into Peloponnesus: and Eratostratus after Troy 100 years. Theopompus 500 years after the army of Greece sailed into Phrygia for the war of Troy. Euphorion makes him cotemporary with Gyges, who began to reign in the 18th olympiad (which was 45 years after Rome was built) and Sosibius saith, that he was 90 years before the first olympiad: which he seeks to prove by the times of Charillus, and his son Nicander; Philocorus placeth him 180 after Troy: Aristarchus 140, in the time of the seating of the colonies in Ionis. Apollodorus affirms that he lived while Agésilas governed Lacedæmon; and that Lycurgus in his young years, about 100 years after the Ionian plantations, came to visit him, near 240 years after Troy taken. Herodotus finds Homer flourishing 622 years before Xerxes's enterprise against the Grecians: which Beroaldus accounteth at 168 years after the Trojan war. Eusebius seems to make him to have been about the time of Joash king of Judah, 124 years before Rome was built: tho' elsewhere in his chronology he notes, that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of David, and others in other ages. In his evangelical preparation, where out of Tatianus Assyrius he citeth sundry opinions touching the time when Homer lived, he reckoneth many other Greek writers more ancient than Homer; as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Pheonius, Aristeus, Orpheus, Museus, Thamyris, Amphion, and others.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. ^a*Aulus Gellius* reports, that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirm, that Homer preceded Hesiod: and on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the poet, and Ephorus the historian, make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. ^b*Varro* leaves it uncertain which of these learned fablers was first born: but he finds that they lived together some certain years, wherein he confirms himself by an epigram written upon a trevise, and left by Hesiod in Helicon.

^c*Cornelius Nepos* reports, that they both lived 160 years before was Rome built: while the Silvii reigned in Alba, about ^d140 years after the fall of Troy. ^e*Euthymenes* finds them both 200 years after Troy taken, in the time of Acastus the son of Pelias, king of Theffaly. For my self, I am not much troubled when this poet lived; neither would I offend the reader with these opinions, but only to shew the uncertainty and disagreement of historians, as well in this particular, as in all other questions and disputes of time. For the curiosity of this man's age is no less ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliads with the word Menin, as perhaps containing some great mystery. In derision whereof Lucian feigning himself to have been in hell, to have spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he began his book with that word? who answered, that he began in that sort, because it came in his head so to do.

It seemeth that Senyes, or, after Macrobius, Senemires, ruled Egypt at this time: for Tanepherisobris was his successor, who preceded Vaphres, father-in-law to Solomon.

About the end of Saul's government, or in the beginning of David's time according to ^f*Cassiodorus*, the Amazons with the Cymmerians invaded Asia, Latinus Sylvius then ruling in Italy. And besides the overthrow of that famous state of Troy (which fell 103 years before David's time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not only by reason of those northern nations: but there sprung up, somewhat nearly together, six kingdoms into greatness not before erected. In Italy, that of the Latins: in the south part of Greece, those Lacedæmon, Corinth, and the Achæi. In Arabia, Syria, Soba, and Damascus, the Adads made themselves princes, of which there were ten kings, which began and ended with the kings of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these, the state of the Israelites having now altered their form of government, began to flourish under kings, of which David, in a few years, became master of all those neighbouring nations, who by interchange of times had subjected the Judeans, corrupted their religion, and held them under in a most abject, and grievous slavery; to wit, the Edumians, Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Itureans, and the rest of the Arabians, with the Philistines, Jebusites, Geshurites, Machabites, all which acknowledged David for their sovereign lord, and paid him tribute.

CHAP. XVII.

Of DAVID.

SECT. I.

Of David's estate in the time of Saul.

THE hazards which David ran into while he was yet only designed king, and living as a private man, expected the empire, were very many. The first personal act of fame, was his killing of Goliath in the view of both armies, whereby he became known to Saul, and so highly affected of Jonathan the son of Saul, that he loved him as his own soul: inasmuch, as when Saul sought to persuade his son, that David would assuredly be the ruin of his house, and estate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cause, Jonathan could never be persuaded, never forc'd, nor ever wearied from the care of David's life, and well doing. It was not long after this signal act of David, but that Saul became exceeding jealous of him, tho' he were become as his household servant, and his esquire, or armour-bearer. Saul being vexed with an evil spirit, was advised to procure some cunning musician to play before him upon the harp; whereby it was thought that he might find ease, which came to pass accordingly. He entertained David, for this purpose, and began to favour him, giving him a place of command among the men of war. But the jealous tyrant soon waxed weary of his good affections, and sought to kill David, being thereunto moved only thro' envy of his virtue. This passion first brake forth in the midst of his raving fit, at which time he threw a spear at David, that was then playing on his harp, to do him ease.

^g*Censorinus* remembreth one Asclepius a physician, who practised the curing of the frenzy, by the like musick: and tempted thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a kind of harmony, Seneca in his third book of anger witnesseth. But the madness of Saul came from the cause of causes, and was thereby incurable, howsoever it sometimes left him, and yielded unto that musick, which God had ordained to be a means of more good to the musician than to the king.

Saul Having failed in such open attempts, gave unto David the command over 1000 soldiers, to confront the Philistines withal. For he durst not trust him as before, about his person, fearing his revenge. Now the better to cover his hatred towards him, he promised him his daughter Merah to wife: but having married her to Adriel, he gave to David his younger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to present him with an hundred foreskins of the Philistines: hoping rather (in respect of the valour of that nation) that the Philistines would take David's head, than he their foreskins. This hope failing, when as now David's victories begat new fears and jealousies in Saul, he practised with Jonathan, and afterwards with his own hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this he sought to murder him in his own house, but Michol his wife delivered him. So David sought Samuel at Ramah, and being pursued by Saul, fled thence unto Nob in Benjamin, to ^a Abimilech, then to ^b Achis the Philistine, prince of Gath: where to obscure himself, he was forc'd to counterfeit both simplicity and distraction. But being ill assured among the Philistines, he covered himself in the cave of Adullam: and after conveying such of his kinsfolks as were not fit to follow him, into Moab, he hid himself in the desarts of ^c Ziph, Maon, and the hills of Engedi, where he cut off the lap of Saul's garments, and spared his life: as he did a second time in the desert of ^d Ziph, after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Gath the second time, and was kindly entertained in regard of the hatred, with which his master Saul was known to prosecute him.

Of Achis, David obtained ^e Siklag in Simeon, pretending to invade Judea: but he bent his forces another way and struck the Amalekites, with other enemies of Israel, letting none live to complain of him. Achis supposing that David had drawn blood of his own nation, thought himself assured of him: and therefore preparing to invade Israel, summoneth David to assist him, who dissembling his intent, seemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistine princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himself to Siklag. At his return he found the town burnt, his two wives, with the wives and children of his people taken by the Amalekites: hereupon his fellows mutinied, but God gave him comfort, and assurance to recover all again: which he did.

This army of the Philistines commanded by Achis, encountred Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three sons were slain. The news with Saul's crown and bracelets were brought to David, at Siklag, in his return from being victorious over Amalek, by a man of the same nation, who ^f avow'd (tho' falsely) that himself at Saul's request had slain him. David, because he had accused himself, made no scruple to cause him to be slain at the instant: and the sooner, because the probabilities gave strong evidence withal. Otherwise it followeth not that every man ought to be believed of himself to his own prejudice. For it is held in the law; ^g Confessio reorum non habenda est pro explorato crimine, nisi approbatio alia instruit religionem cognoscentis; The prisoner's confession must not be taken for an evidence of the crime, unless some other proof inform the conscience of the judge. For a man may confess those things of himself, that the judge by examination may know to be impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodia reorum l. si confessus, & in cap. de pœnis l. qui sententiam, therefore doth the gloss reconcile these two places in this sort. Si quis in judicio sponte de seipso confiteatur, & postea maneat in confessione, id est satis; If any man in judgment do confess of himself, of his own accord, and after doth persevere in his confession, it is enough. That David greatly bewailed Saul it is not improbable, for death cutteth atunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befel him, being a king, with whom, in effect, the strength of Israel also fell, could not but stir up sorrow and move compassion in the heart of David.

The victory which the Philistines had gotten was so great, that some towns of the Israelites, even beyond the river of Jordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left unto the enemy, who took possession of them without any resistance made. Wherefore it may seem strange, that a nation so warlike and ambitious as were the Philistines, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and seek to make the conquest entire. Most like it seems, that the civil war immediately breaking out between David and the house of Saul, wherein Juda was divided from the rest of Israel, gave them hope of an easy victory over both; and thereby caused them to attempt nothing at the present, lest by so doing they should inforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessary reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which means, both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were united.

SECT. II.

Of the beginning of David's reign, and the war made by Abner for Ishbosheth.

AFTER the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the War, sought to advance Ishbosheth (or Iseobtus according to Josephus) tho' he had no right to the kingdom of Israel: for Mephibosheth the first son of Jonathan lived. Against this Abner, and Ishbosheth, David made a defensive war, till Abner pass'd Jordan, and entred the border of Juda; at which time he sent Joab with such forces as he had, to resist Abner: Ishbosheth remaining in Gilead, and David in Hebron. The armies encountred each other near Gibeon, where it seemeth, that Abner made the offer to try the quarrel by the hands of a few; like to that combat between the Lacedemonians, and the Argives, remembred by Herodotus, 300 being chosen of each nation, of which number three persons were only left unslain. The like trial by a far less number was performed by the Horatii and Curiatii for the Romans and Latines. The same challenge Goliath the Philistine made, whom David slew: a custom very ancient. Edward the third offered the like trial in his own person to the French king; and Francis the French king to Charles the emperor. There were 12 chosen of each part, in this war of David with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Benjamin, and as many of Juda: whose force and valour was so equal, as there survived not any one to challenge the victory. But the quarrel staid not here: for the army of Juda press'd Abner in gross, and brake him. 360 Men of Abner's companions were slain, and but 20 of Juda; whereof Asabel the brother of Joab was one: who when he would needs pursue ^h Abner, and by Abner's persuasions could not be moved to quit him, he was forced to turn upon him, wounding him to death, with the stroke of his spear. For tho' Asabel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the text, as light as a wild roe, and as Josephus reporteth, contended not only with men, but with horses; and hoped to have gotten great fame, if he could have mastered Abner (who as Asabel persuaded himself, had by being overthrown and flying away lost his courage) yet here it fell out true; ⁱ That the race is not to the swift.

That this civil war lasted two years, we find it written in the 2 Sam. ii. 10. tho' in the beginning of the third it is again made probable, that this contention dur'd longer; and therefore the matter rest-

^a 1 Sam. 19. ^b 1 Sam. 21. ^c 1 Sam. 24. ^d 1 Sam. 26. ^e It seemeth that Simeon never obtained Siklag till this time, for it is said in the 17 of Sam. 27. 6. therefore Siklag pertaineth unto the king of Judah unto this day. ^f 2 Sam. 1. ^g In Eccl. 9. 1. ^h 2 Sam. 2. ⁱ Ecclesi. 9.

eth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbins conceive, that Ishbosheth had then reigned two years, when this was written, the war as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the party of Ishbosheth after this, and till such time as there grew jealousy between him and Ishbosheth for Saul's concubine: neither did the death of Ishbosheth instantly follow; but how long after the murder of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appear.

SECT. III.

Of the death of Abner slain by Joab, and of Ishbosheth by Rechab and Baanah.

ABNER, reconciled to David, was anon by ^a Joab murdered; for Joab could not endure a companion in David's favour, and in the commandment of his forces, by which he was grown so powerful, as David forbore to call him to account; for thus much he confesseth of himself: ^b I am this day weak, and these men the sons of Zeruah be too hard for me. In this sort David complained after Abner's death, and to make it clear that he hated this fact of Joab, he followed him with this publick imprecation; ^c Let the blood fall on the head of Joab, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subject to ulcers, to the leprosy, to lameness, to the sword, and to poverty, &c. For could any thing have withstood the ordinance of God, this murder committed by Joab might greatly have endangered David's estate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischance therefore David openly bewailed, so that all Israel perceived him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held being general of the men of war, was of such importance, that the kings themselves were fain to give them great respect, as hath been already shewed more at large. This office Joab held in the army of Juda, and thought himself worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtain the whole kingdom. For he was near to David in kindred, and had been partaker of all his adversity, wherefore he did not think it meet, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefits be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature so jealous of his dignity and place, that he afterwards slew Amasa his own kinsman, and the king's, upon the same quarrel, taking it in high disdain to see him joined with himself, as captain of the host of Juda; much less could he brook a superior, and such a one as had slain his brother, and been beaten himself in battel. But howsoever Joab did hate or despise Abner, David esteemed highly of him as of a prince, and a great man in Israel, excusing the oversight by which he might seem to have perished, by affirming, that he died not like a fool, nor a man vanquished, ^d But as a man falleth before wicked men, so (said he) didst thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit nor want of valour and virtue in him, whom a stronger hand destroyeth unawares, or whom subtilty in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all under the sun are subject to worldly miseries and misadventures. Howsoever Ishbosheth meant to have dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he despaired greatly of his estate, and with him all Israel were possess'd with great fear: insomuch as two of Ishbosheth's own captains, Rechab and Baanah, murdered Ishbosheth, and presenting his head to ^e David, received the same reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to have slain Saul. Ishbosheth being dead, all the elders of Israel repaired to David at Hebron, where he was the third and last time anointed by general consent.

SECT. IV.

Of the flourishing time of David's kingdom, the taking of Jerusalem, with two overthrowes given to the Philistines, and the conduction of the ark to the city of David.

WHEN David was now established in the kingdom, his first enterprise was upon the Jebusites, who, in derision of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as is thought) manned their walls with the blind and lame of their City ^f; which David soon after entered: all their other forces notwithstanding. For having mastered the fort of Zion (which was afterwards the city of David) he became lord of Jerusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Jebusites, who had held it from the foundation to the times of Moses and Joshua, and after them almost 400 years: there are who expound this place otherwise. Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some think that it was meant by the idols of the Jebusites: others, that it had reference to the covenant made long before with Isaac and Jacob: the one blind by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the angel, and that therefore till those (that is, till that covenant) be broken, David ought not to molest them. But for my self I take it with Josephus, that they armed their walls with certain impotent people at first, in scorn of David's attempt. For they, that had held their city about four hundred years against all the children of Israel, Joshua, the Judges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it also against David.

When he had now possess'd himself of the very heart and centre of the kingdom, and received congratulatory ambassadors and presents from Hiram king of Tyre: he entertained divers other concubines and married more wives, by whom he had ten sons in Jerusalem, and by his former wives he had 6 in Hebron where he reigned 7 years.

The Philistines hearing that David was now anointed king, as well of Juda as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warm in his seat. And being encountred by David at two several times in the ^g Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giants, they were at both times overthrown. After which he called the place Baalperazim.

Then David assembled 30000 choice Israelites to conduct the ark of God from the house of Abinadab in Gibeon, to the city of David, which business was interrupted by the death of Uzzah the son of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the ark, tho' it were with intent to stay it from taking harm when it was shaken. But after three years it was with great solemnity brought into the city with sacrifices, musick, dances, and all signs of joyfulness, in which David himself gladly bore a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the ark, and afterwards told him in scorn, That he was uncovered as a fool in the eyes of the maidens his servants; namely, that he gat his regal dignity both in apparel and behaviour; and mixed himself among the base multitude, dancing as fools do in the ways and streets: not that she disliked David's behaviour (as I take it) tho' she made it the colour of her derision. But rather the abundant grief, which this spectacle stirred up, beholding the glory of her husband to whom she was delivered lastly by force, and remembering the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruins she conceived that the son of Ishai had built this his greatness, together with the many new wives and concubines imbraced since his possession of Jerusalem, made her break out in those despicable terms, for which she remained barren to her death.

This done, * David consulted with the prophet Nathan for the building of the temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of war, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; having threatned, not in vain, that he would require the blood of man, at the hand of man and beast. The wars which David had made were just, and the blood therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy temple. Hereby it appears how greatly those princes deceive themselves, who think by bloodshed and terror of their wars, to make themselves in greatness like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercy and goodness, or seek the blessedness promised by our Saviour unto the peace-makers.

Now altho' it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a temple of David's founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he received both a confirmation of the kingdom to him and his heirs, and that happy promise of the everlasting throne, that should be established in his seed.

SECT. V.

The overthrow of the Philistines and Moabites.

SOON after this David overthrew the Philistines, which made them altogether powerless, and unable to make any invasion upon Israel in haste. For it is written, accepit frenum Amgaris e manu Philistæorum; which place our English Geneva converts in these words, And David took the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philistines. The Latin of Junius giveth another and a better sense; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong city of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneva hath it in the marginal note. This city of Gath was the same which was afterwards Dio-Cæsaria, set on the frontier of Palestina at the entrance into Judea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thence into their retreat in all their invasions, which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontier town of equal strength to the Philistines on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood the Hebrews call Amma, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Pliny in his 11th book and 13th chapter. This exposition is made plain and confirmed in the 1st of Chron. chap. xviii.

There was no nation bordering the Jews that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistines did, who before the time of Saul (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leave one smith in all their cities and villages of that kind, but infore'd them to come down into their territory, ^d for all iron work whatsoever they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of David were seldom free from paying tribute to the Philistines.

After this he gave them four other overthrows: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came between. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbi-benob, the head of whose spear weighed 300 sheckles of brass, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abishai succoured David, and slew the Philistines, whereupon the counsellors and captains of David (lest the light of Israel might by his loss be quench'd) vow'd that he should not thenceforth hazard himself in any battel. The second and third encounter and overthrow of the Philistines was at Gob, a place near Gesar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistines by the taking of Geth, he invaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his adversity he sought succour, and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same king or no it is not known.

The Rabins feign that Moab slew those kinsfolks of David, which lived under his protection in Saul's time, but questionless David well knew how that nation had been always enemies to Israel, and took all the occasions to vex them that were offered. And he also remembered that in the xxiii^d of Deuter. God commanded Israel not to seek the peace or prosperity of the Moabites, which David well observed, for he destroy'd two parts of the people, leaving a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zebah, the region of Adadezer the son of Rebub king thereof. The place is set down in the description of the holy land: to which I refer the reader.

SECT. VI.

The war which David made upon the Syrians.

IT is written in the text; David smote also Hadadezer, &c. as he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words [as he went to recover his border] be referred to David or Hadadezer it is not agreed upon. Junius thinks that the article [he] hath relation to David, who finding Tobu oppress'd by Hadadezer, overthrew the one and succoured the other. But the ancient and most received opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, he was in far better case to have proceeded after his victory than before: seeing that (Adadezer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his back, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountains upon him at his return.

Again, seeing David was either to pass through a part of Arabia the desert, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: he had now both horse and chariots good store to carry his provisions thro' those uncultivated places, by which he was to have marched before he could have reached Euphrates or any part thereof. But we find that David returned to Jerusalem, after he had twice overthrown the Syrian army, not bending his course towards the river Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appear, that it was the Syrian, and not king David, that was going to enlarge his border, as afore is said.

The king of Syria Damascena, and of Damascus, whereof that region is so called, hearing that Adadezer was overthrown by the Israelites, fearing his own estate, and the loss of his own country which adjoined to Syria Zobab of Hadadezer, sent for an army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadezer, and too soon for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This king of Damascus, Josephus (out of Nicolaus an ancient historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family as all those other Adads were: which now began to grow up in greatness, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Affyrians, as is shewed heretofore. David, having now reduced Damascus under his obedience, left a garrison therein as he did in Edom: having also sack'd the adjoining cities of Betab, and Berathi, belonging to Adadezer, of which cities Ptolemy calleth Betab, Tauba: and Berathi he nameth Barathena. ^a*Tobu*, or Thoi, whose country of Hamath joined to Adadezer (as in the description of the holy land the reader may perceive) sent his son Foram to congratulate this success of David: partly because he had war with Adadezer, and partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of gold, silver, and brass, all which together with the golden shield of the Aramites, and the best of all the spoils of other nations David dedicated unto God at his return. Junius translated the words [clypeos aureos] by umbones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold but the bosses only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But because Roboam made shields of brass in place of these of Adadezer, at such time as Shibcab the Egyptian sack'd the temple of Jerusalem, it may be gathered thereby, that those of Adadezer were golden shields.

This done, David sent ambassadors to Hanum king of the Ammonites to congratulate his establishment in his father's kingdom: for David, in the time of his affliction under Saul, had been relieved by Nabab, the father of Hanum. But this Ammonite being ill advised, and over-jealous of his estate, used David's messengers so barbarously and contemptuously (by curtailing their beards, and their garments) as he thereby drew a war upon himself, which neither his own strength, nor all the aids purchased could put off, or sustain. For notwithstanding that he had waged 33000 soldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vassals of Adadezer 20000, and of ^c*Maachab* and Ishtob 13000 (for which he disbursed a thousand talents of silver) yet all these great armies together, with the strength of the Ammonites, were by ^d*Joab* and his brother Abishai easily broken and put to ruin: and that without any great loss or slaughter at that time. And it is written that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites also retreated into their cities, the one holding themselves within the walls, the other in their desarts adjoining, till Joab was returned to Jerusalem.

Hadadezer, hearing that Joab had dismissed his army, assembled his forces again, and sent all the companies that he could levy out of Mesopotamia, who under the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamp'd at ^e*Helam*, on the south side thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, assembled all the ablest men of Israel, and marched towards the Syrian army in Palmyrena, not yet entered into Arabia: to wit, at Helam, a place no less distant from Damascus, towards the north-east, than Jerusalem was towards the south-west. Now David (speaking humanly) might with the more confidence go on towards Euphrates (which was the farthest-off journey that ever he made) because he was now lord of Damascus, which lay in the mid-way. He also possess'd himself of ^f*Thadmor* or Palmyrena, which Solomon afterwards strongly fortified, and this city was but one day's journey from Helam, and the river Euphrates. So had he two safe retreats, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter between David and the Syrians, they lost 40000 horsemen, and 700 chariots, together with Shobach general of their army. The Chronicles call these 40000 soldiers footmen, and so Junius converts it, and so is it very probable. For the army of Israel consisting of footmen, could hardly have slaughtered 40000 horse-men, except they quitted their horses and fought on foot. So are the chariots taken in this battle, numbred at 7000, in the 1st of Chronicles chap. ix. in which number, as I conceive, all the soldiers that served in them, with their conductors, are included: so as there died of the Syrians in this war against David, before he forced them to tribute, 100000 footmen, besides all their horsemen and waggoners, and besides all those that Joab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabba. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength again, and afflicted the kings of Juda often: but the kings of Israel they impoverished, even to the last end of that state.

David having now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians from the party and confederacy of Ammon: he sent out Joab the lieutenant of his armies to forrage and destroy their territory, and to besiege Rabbab, afterwards Philadelphia, which after a while the Israelites mastered and possess'd. The king's crown, which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with precious stones, David set on his own head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoil of the city. And tho' David stay'd at Jerusalem, following the war of Uriab his wife, till such time as the city was brought to extremity, and ready to be entered: yet Joab, in honour of David, forbore the last assault, and entrance thereof, till his master's arrival. To the people he used extream rigour (if we may so call it, being exercised against heathen idolaters) for some of them he tore with harrows, some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning kilns, in which he bak'd tile and brick.

Of David's troubles in his reign, and of his forces.

BUT as victory begetteth security, and our present worldly felicity a forgetfulness of our former miseries, and many times of God himself the giver of all goodness: so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good king, change also the zealous care which formerly he had to please God in the precise observation of his laws and commandments. For having now no dangerous apparent enemy (against whom he was wont to ask counsel from the Lord) he began to be advised by his own human affections, and vain desires. For he was not only satisfied to take Uriab's wife from him, and to use her by stealth; but he imbroiled his adultery with Uriab's slaughter, giving order to his trusty servant ^g*Joab* to march him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gave an assault upon the suburbs of Rabba, when there was not as yet any possibility of prevailing. And, that which could no less displease God than the rest, he was content that many others of his best servants and soldiers should perish together with Uriah, hoping thereby to cover his particular ill intent against him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the highest of happiness; and his days then to come were filled with joys and woes interchangeable, his trodden down sorrows began again to spring; and those perils which he had pulled up by the roots (as he hoped) gave him an after-harvest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased God to take the witness of David's own mouth against him, as David himself did against the Amalekite, which pretended to have slain Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the prophet propounded unto him his own error, in the person of another, to wit, of him that took the poor man's sheep that had none else, the bereaver being lord of many: he then vowed it to the living Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, altho' it pleased God to pardon David for his life, which remission the prophet Nathan pronounced: yet he delivered him God's justice, together with his mercy in the tenor following; Now therefore the sword shall never depart from thy house, &c. because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slain Uriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. Soon after this, David lost the child of adultery which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, His own son Amnon being in love with his half-sister Tamar, by the advice of his cousin-german the son of Shimeab, David's brother, possess'd her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a careless and despightful manner. Two years after which foul and incestuous act, Abshalom caused him to be murdered, at the feast of his sheep-shearing; not perchance in revenge of Tamar's ravishment alone: but having it in his heart to usurp the kingdom; in which, because he could not in any sort be assured of Amnon, he thought his affair greatly advanced by his destruction. So the one brother having ravished his own sister, and then despised her; the other after a long dissembled malice, first made his own brother drunken, and then slaughtered him; which done, he fled away, and lived under the safeguard of Talmai king of Geshur, near Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen king. Thirdly, When Abshalom by the invention of Joab (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his son) was brought again; first to the king's favour, and then to his presence. He began instantly to practise against David his father, seeking by the pretence of common justice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his father's equity, to win unto himself a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatened by the Lord as a punishment of David's sin.

The company which Abshalom gathered at the first were but 200 men: which he carried with him from Jerusalem to Hebron; pretending, tho' impiously, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired unto him, and many troops of people from all places, he proclaimed himself king, and was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawful prince) accepted so readily, that David doubting to be set upon on the sudden, durst not trust himself in his own city of Jerusalem, nor in any other walled town for fear of surprize: but encamped in the fields and desarts, with some 600 of his guards, and few else. The priests he left in Jerusalem, with the ark of God, from whom he desired to be advertised of those things that chanced, to whom he directed Hushai his trusty friend and servant, praying him to make himself in all his outward actions and counsels of Abshalom's party and confederacy, thereby the better to discover unto him the purposes of Achitophel, a revolted counsellor, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan: and Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred David's prosperity had smothered, but his adversity illightened) holding himself upon the advantage of a mountain side, cast stones at David, and most despitefully cursed him to his face: but David attending no private revenges, forbade Abishai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the roll of his revenge, to his son Solomon. Abshalom being now possess'd of Jerusalem, was advis'd by Achitophel to use his father's concubines in some such publick place, as all Israel might assure themselves, that he was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being persuaded they would then resolutely adhere to Abshalom and his cause, without fear of being given up upon a reconciliation between them. This savage and impious (tho' crafty counsel) Achitophel indeed urged for his own respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all others inflamed Abshalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold David: I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he shall lie with thy wives in the sight of the sun: for thou didst it secretly, but I will do this thing before all Israel, and before the sun, 2 Sam. xii. 11. He also gave advice to Abshalom, that himself with an army of 12000 men might be employed at the instant for the surprizing of David, which had willingly been embraced by Abshalom, had not Hushai David's faithful servant, given counter advice, and sway'd it: persuading Abshalom, that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel, to pursue his father; than by such a troop, which David's valour, and those of his attendants, might either endanger or resist. This delay in Abshalom, and advantage of time gained by David, was indeed, after God, the loss of the one and delivery of the other. whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the success which followed, disposed of his own estate, and then forsook both the party and the care of Abshalom, and of his own life.

David being advertised of this enterprize against him, march'd away all night, and pass'd Jordan, possessing himself of Mahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the same wherein Ishbosheth himself, in the war against David after Saul's death seated himself. To which place there repaired unto him Shobi, the son of Nabash the Ammonite, whom David loved, the same which Josephus calleth Shiphar. And tho' it be greatly disputed what this Shobi was, yet the most general and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Ilanum, whom David for his father's sake established in the kingdom, after Ilanum's overthrow. In thankfulness whereof he relieved David in this his extremity. There came also to David's assistance Machir of Lodabar, guardian in former times to Mephibosheth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed David and all his company.

In the mean time both the king and Abfalom prepared to fight; Abfalom made Amasa commander of the army of Israel, the same place which Joab held with David; an office next the king himself, like unto that of the majors of the palace anciently in France. David, persuaded by his company, stay'd in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces he had to Joab, Abishai and Ittai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that issued out at the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Abfalom. But Joab, besides that he was very cruel by nature, remembered that Abfalom had lately disposed of his government to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and news brought him that Abfalom hung by the hair of his head on a tree, when he could not persuade the messenger to return and kill him, he himself with his own servants dispatch'd him. It appeared also by the sequel, that Joab affected Adonijah, whom he afterward acknowledged, David yet living; and fearing the disposition of Abfalom, he embraced the present advantage offered.

Hereof, together with news of the victory, when knowledge was brought to David, he mourned and sorrowed, not only as a man that had lost a son, but as one that had outlived all his worldly joys, and seen every delight of life interred. For he so hid himself from his people, as those, which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victory, covered themselves also in the city, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserved death than recompence. Whereupon Joab presenting himself before David, persuaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himself to the army. For first he told him that he had discountenanced his faithful servants, who had that day preserved his life; inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a king, than not only not to acknowledge so great a love and constancy in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolvedly expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrary grieve and lament at their good success. For, no doubt, they might all have bought their peace of Abfalom at an easy rate. Secondly, He urged, that it was generally believ'd, that he lov'd his enemies and hated his friends, and that he witnessed by this his mourning, that he had not any respect of his princes, and others his faithful servants, but would more have joyed if they had all perished, and Abfalom lived, than in the victory by their faithfulness and approved valour gotten.

Lastly, He used this prevalent argument, that if the king came not out and shewed himself publicly to his men of war, that they would all that very night abandon him, and return; concluding with this fearful threatning: And that will be worse unto thee than all the evil that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these overbold and arrogant speeches (tho' perchance uttered with a good intent) Joab rais'd David from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the city among the people, whom he assured of his love and affection, especially Amasa who commanded the army of Abfalom, to whom he promised the office of lieutenantship; the same which Abfalom had given him, and which Joab now enjoyed. For David doubted, that if Amasa were not satisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now under his commandment.

This done, the king marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his passage he pardoned Shimei, who had lately reviled him to his face; but this remission was but external, as appeared afterward. He also accepted of Mephibosheth's excuse, whom Ziba had formerly falsely accused and betrayed.

He also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberal host, to follow him to Jerusalem, that he might reward his service done him; who excusing himself by his age, appointed his son Chimham to attend the king.

At Gilgal on this side Jordan, all the tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to have most interest in David, the army brake, and David returned to Jerusalem. But Sheba, the son of Bichri, a Benjamite, of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontentment among the Israelites, withdrew them from David, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest; and it seemeth that many of the people of the out-tribes, and in effect of all but Judah, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first king. David employed his reconciled captain Amasa, to give him contentment, and to witness his trust, as also because he conceived that Amasa had interest in those revolts of Israel more than Joab had. He received commandment from David to assemble the army within three days, which he foreflowed; but being onward on his way, Abishai, Joab's brother, was sent after him, with David's guard and best soldiers, whom also Joab accompanied: and overtaking Amasa near Gibeon, pretending to embrace him, gave him a wound, whereof he fell dead, being no less jealous of Amasa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done, he pursued Sheba, and finding him enclos'd in Abel, assaulted the city with that fury, that the citizens by the persuasions of a wise woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba's head, and flung it to Joab over the walls: which done, he retreated his army to Jerusalem, and commanded as before all the host of Israel.

The next act of David's, was the delivery of Saul's sons or kinsmen to the Gibeonites, whom those citizens hung up in revenge of their father's cruelty. David had knowledge from the oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three years, came by reason of Saul and his house; to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yielded to give them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himself, as also, if we may judge humanly, to rid himself of Saul's line, by whom he and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and endangered; only he spared Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan, both for the love he bare to his father, as for his oath and vow to God.

Now where it is written in the text; The king took the two sons of Kispah whom she bare unto Saul, and the five sons of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom she bare to Adriel, and delivered them to the Gibeonites, 2 Sam. xxi.

Junius calls this Michol the sister of her that was David's wife, she whom Saul married to Phaltiel; but Michol here named had Adriel to her husband: the same which is named Merab in 1 Sam. xviii, who was first promised to David, when he slew Goliath in the valley of Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loved David, which perchance Merab did not, whether David had any human respect in the delivery of her children, it is only known to God.

Now whereas the Geneva nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here used, having an eclipsis or defect, and signifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kindred, as in the 19th verse of the same xxist chapter it is said of Goliath, whose spear was as weighty as a weaver's beam, when as by the same eclipsis it must be understood by the brother of Goliath: Goliath himself being formerly slain.

As by the death of Saul's children God secured the house of David, leaving no head unto rebellion: so did he strengthen both the king and nation against foreign enemies, by the valour of many brave commanders, the like of whom, for number and quality, that people of Israel is not known to have had at any time before or after. Thirty captains of thousands there were, all men of mark, and great reputation in war. Over these were six colonels, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might well be held as miraculous. These colonels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to have been given upon meer consideration of their virtue. For Abishai the brother of Joab, who in the war against the Ammonites and Aramites was lieutenant, and commanded half the army, could not attain to the honour of the first rank, but was fain to rest contented with being principal of the three colonels of the second order, notwithstanding his nearness in blood unto the king, the flourishing estate of his own house, and his well approved services. All these colonels and captains, with the companies belonging to them, may seem to have been such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readiness for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawn out, if need required, into the field, very far exceeded thirty thousand, yea or thirty times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the king in Saul's time, and been hardened with his adversities. Others there were very many, and principal men in their several tribes, that repaired unto him after the death of Saul; but these captains and colonels (who with Joab, that was general of all the king's forces, make up the number of 37) were the especial men of war, and reckoned as David's worthies^a. The long reign of David, as it is known to have consumed many of these excellent men of war, so may it probably be guessed to have wasted the most of those whose deaths we find no where mentioned. For the sons of Zeruia, who had been too hard for David, were worn away, and only Joab left in the beginning of Solomon, who wanted his brother Abishai to stand by his side in his last extremity.

By the actions fore-passed in the time of David, it is gathered that he had reigned now 33 years, or thereabout, when the posterity of Saul was rooted out, so that he enjoyed about seven years of entire quiet and security, wherein it pleased God to remove all impediments that might have troubled the succession of Solomon in his father's throne. In this time also David having established all things in Juda and Israel, and the borders thereof, he again displeased God by^b numbring the people, as in ostentation of his power: in which he employed Joab with other captains of his army, who after 9 months and 20 days travel, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to bear arms, and they amounted to the number of 1300000, besides Levi and Benjamin; whereof in Juda and the cities thereof 500000, and in Israel 800000.

For this, when by the prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himself to which he pleased; to wit, seven years famine; three months war, wherein he should be unprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a general pestilence to last three days: David made choice to bow himself under the hand of God only, and left himself subject to that cruel disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished 70000. And hereby he hath taught all that live, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giveth us this divine reason, ^c For his mercies are great.

SECT. VIII.

Of the last acts of David: Adonijah's faction: the revenge upon Joab and Shimei.

LASTLY, when he grew weak and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of women, he was yet advised to lie in the arms of a young and well complexioned maiden, to keep him warm. In this his weak estate of body, when he was in a manner bed-ridden, Adonijah his eldest son (Amnon and Abshalom being now dead) having drawn unto his party that invincible, renowned and feared Joab, with Abiathar the priest, began manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the kingdom after his father. For being the eldest now living of David's sons, and a man of goodly personage, Solomon yet young and born of a mother formerly attainted with adultery, for which her name was omitted by St. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) he presumed to carry the matter without resistance. Hereof when David had knowledge by Bathsheba the mother of Salomon, who did put him in mind of his faithful promise, that Solomon her son should reign after him (Nathan the prophet affirming the same thing unto the king, and seconding her report of Adonijah's presumption) the king calling unto him Zadoc the priest, Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah the captain of his guard, gave charge and commission to anoint Solomon, and to set him on the mule whereon himself used to ride in his greatest state: which done, Solomon attended and strongly guarded by the ordinary and choice men of war, the Cherethites and Peletites, shewed himself to the people. Those tidings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his assistants, and for the safety of his life he held by the horns of the altar, whom for the present Solomon pardoned. After this, ^d David had remaning two especial cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one, concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Solomon; the other, concerning the building of the temple, which he sought by all means to advance, and make the business publick. ^e To bring these intentions to good effect he summoned a parliament, consisting of all the princes of Israel, the princes of the several tribes, all the captains and officers, with all the mighty, and men of power; who repaired unto Jerusalem.

In this assembly the king stood up, and signified his purpose of building the temple, shewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Herein he took occasion to lay open his own title to the crown, shewing that the kingdom was by God's ordinance due to the tribe of Juda (as Jacob in his bleſſing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himſelf was pleaſed to make choice of him among all his father's ſons. In like manner he ſaid that God himſelf had appointed Solomon by name to be his ſucceſſor: whereupon he earneſtly charged both the people and his ſon, to conform themſelves unto all that God had commanded, and particularly to go forward in this work of the Lord's houſe which Solomon was choſen to build^a. Then produced he the pattern of the work according to the form which God himſelf had appointed; and ſo laying open his own preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

The king's propoſition was ſo well approved by the princes and people, that whereas he himſelf had given 3000 talents of gold, and 7000 of ſilver, they added unto it 7000 of gold, and 10000 of ſilver, beſides braſs, iron and jewels, heartily rejoicing in the advancement of ſo religious a work. This buſineſs being well diſpatched, a ſolemn feaſt with great ſacrifice was made, at which time Solomon was again anointed king, and received fealty of all the princes and people of the land, and of all the princes his brethren the ſons of king David. Solomon being thus eſtabliſhed king, his father David finding himſelf even in the hands of death, firſt exhorted his ſon to exerciſe the ſame courage and ſtrength of mind, which himſelf had done in all his attempts, and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterpriſes, he uttered theſe mighty words; ^b Take heed to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and keep his ſtatutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies, as it is written in the law of Moſes, &c. to the performance of which God faſtened the ſucceſſion, and proſperity of his iſſues. For this done (ſaith God himſelf) ^c Thou ſhalt not want one of thy poſterity to ſit upon the throne of Iſrael.

Secondly, He adviſed him concerning Joab, who out of doubt had ſerved David from the firſt aſſault of Jeruſalem to the laſt of his wars, with incomparable valour and fidelity, ſaving that he faſtened himſelf to Adonijah (his maſter yet living) and thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath never left cruelty unrevenged, ſo was it his will that Joab ſhould drink of the ſame cup, whereof he had enforced other men to taſte, and ſuffer the ſame violence which himſelf had unjuſtly ſtrucken others withal, qui gladio percutit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaved Abner and Amasa of their lives, having againſt the one the pretence only of his brother's ſlaughter, whom Abner had ſlain in the time of war, and could not avoid him: againſt the other but a meer jealousy of his growing great in the favour of David. And tho' Joab aſſured himſelf that Abner and Amasa being dead, there was none left either to equal him or ſupplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raiſed up Benaiah the ſon of Jehoiadab, to pull him from the ſanctuary, and to cut him in pieces. For David giveth this cauſe to Solomon againſt Joab, that he ſlew the captains of the hoſt of Iſrael,^d and ſhed blood of battel in peace; and to this apparent and juſt cauſe, it is not improbable but that David remembered the ill affection of Joab towards Solomon, which Joab made manifeſt by the untimely ſetting up of Adonijah, David yet living. Some other offence Joab had committed againſt David, of which in theſe words he put his ſon Solomon in mind; ^e Thou knoweſt alſo what Joab the ſon of Zeruiah did to me, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Abſalom, contrary to the king's deſire, or by the proud words uſed to him when he mourned in Mahanaim for Abſalom; or whether it were the publiſhing of David's letter unto him for the killing of Uriah: thereby to diſgrace Solomon as deſcended of ſuch a mother, the ſcriptures are ſilent. True it is, that thoſe great men of war do oftentimes behave themſelves exceeding inſolently towards their princes, both in reſpect of their ſervice done, as alſo becauſe they flatter themſelves with an opinion, that either their maſters cannot miſs them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kind of pride hath overthrowed many a worthy man otherwiſe deſerving of great honour and reſpect.

He alſo gave order to Solomon, to rid himſelf of Shimei, who not long before had caſt ſtones at David, and curſed him to his face. And albeit by reaſon of his oath and promiſe David ſpared Shimei all the time himſelf lived, yet being duſt and in the grave he ſlew him, by the hand of Solomon his ſon^f. Hence it ſeemeth that king Henry the ſeventh of England had his pattern, when he gave order to Henry the eighth to execute Pool as ſoon as himſelf was buried, having made promiſe to the king of Spain, when he delivered Pool unto him, that while he lived he would never put him to death, nor ſuffer violent hands to be laid upon him.

And yet did not the execution of Joab yield unto Solomon any ſuch great profit or aſſurance as he hoped for. For he found a young Adad of Idumea, and Rezin of Damascus to vex him: who, as the ſcriptures witneſs^g, were emboldened to enterpriſe upon Solomon, hearing that David ſlept with his fathers, and that Joab the captain of the hoſt was dead. Now when David had reigned in all 40 years, to wit, in Hebron 7 years, and in Jeruſalem 33, he died.

For his perſon, he was of ſmall ſtature, but exceeding ſtrong. For his internal gifts and graces he ſo far exceeded all other men, as, putting his human frailty apart, he was ſaid by God himſelf to be a man according to his own heart. The Pſalms which he wrote witneſs his piety, and his excellent learning: of whom Jerome to Paulinus. David Simonides noſter, Pindarus & Alcæus, Flaccus, quoque Catullus, & Serenus, Chriſtum lyra perſonat, & in decachordo Pſalterio ab inferis ſuſcit at reſurgentem. David (ſaith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alcæus, Horace, Catullus and Serenus, he playeth Chriſt on his harp, and on a ten-stringed pfalter he raiſeth him up riſing from the dead. And being both a king and a prophet, he foretelleth Chriſt more lightſomely and lively than all the reſt.

The book of the Pſalms, ſaith Glycas, was divided, ordered and diſtinguiſhed, by Ezekias: but whether all the pfalms were written by David it is diverſly diſputed. For ^h Athanaſius, Cyprian, Iſyranus, and others conceive divers authors, answering the titles of the ſeveral Pſalms, as Moſes, Solomon, and the reſt hereafter named, and that only 73 Pſalms were compoſed by David himſelf, namely thoſe which are intituled ipſius David. For the 50th and the 72d, with the 10 that follow, are beſtowed on Aſaph the ſon of Barachia, 11 others on the ſons of Korah, and 11 are aſcribed to Moſes, to wit, the 89th and the 10 following, and ſo they are intituled in the old Hebrew copies, tho' the Vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) ſtyle them otherwiſe. The ſuppoſed nine authors of theſe Pſalms which David wrote not, ^a Sixtus Senensis nameth as followeth; Solomon, Moses, (whom Aben-Ezra, contrary to Jerome, maketh one of David's singers) Asaph, Ethan-Eziachi, Eman-Eziakra, Idithum, and the three sons of Chore. But St. Chrysostome makes David the sole author of all the Psalms, and so doth ^b St. Augustine, reasoning in this manner. Altho' (saith he) some there are that ascribe those Psalms only unto David, which are over-written ipsius David, and the rest intituled ipsi David to others, this opinion (saith he) Voce evangelica Salvatoris ipsius refutatur, ubi ait quod ipse David in spiritu Christum dixerit esse suum Dominum, quoniam Psalmus 109 sic incipit: Dixit Dominus Domino meo, sede a dextris meis, &c. The voice of the gospel refutes this opinion, where it saith, that David himself in the spirit called Christ his Lord, because the sixth Psalms begins thus, The Lord said unto my Lord, sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his testimonies are used both by Christ and the apostles, and he was as a pattern to all the kings and princes that succeeded him.

His story, and all his particular actions, were written by the prophets, Samuel, Nathan, and Gad, as it is in 1 Chron. xxix. 19. For the several parts of the books of Samuel which intreat chiefly of David, were as it seems written by these three holy men.

^c Constantine Manasses hath an opinion, that the Trojans, during the time of the siege, sought for succour from David, and that he stay'd neuter in that war. But it seemeth that Manasses did miscast the time betwixt David and the Trojan war. For it is generally received, that Troy fell between the times of Abdon and Samson, judges of Israel, about the world's year 2848, and David died in the year 2991.

SECT. IX.

Of the treasures of David and Solomon.

HIS treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 1st of Chronicles, chap. xxii. ver. 14. that he left Solomon for the building of the temple a hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver, and of brass and iron passing all weight, which is more than any king of the world possess'd besides himself, and his son to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirty and three cartload and a third of a cartload of silver, allowing two thousand weight of silver, or six thousand pound sterling to every cartload, besides three score and seventeen millions of French crowns, or of our money, twenty three millions and one thousand pound: a matter, but for the testimony of the scriptures, exceeding all belief. For that any riches were left him, it doth not appear; seeing that the judges had not any treasure, nor any sovereign power to make levies: but when they went to the wars, they were followed by such volunteers as the several tribes by turns gave them: seeing also that Saul who was of a mean parentage, and perpetually vexed and invaded by the Philistines, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part possess'd by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amiss to consider how David within the space of not very many years, might amass up such mighty treasures. For though parsimony be it self a great revenue, yet needs there must have been some other great means. It seems that he made the uttermost profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Eusebius, in his 9th book and last chapter de preparatione Evangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that David, among other preparations for the temple, built a navy in Melanis (or, as Villalpandus corrects it, Achanis) a city of Arabia, and from thence sent men to dig for gold in the island Urphe, which Ortelius thinks, was Ophir, tho' Eupolemus in his place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this island is in the Red sea; from whence, saith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Jury. Pineda, l. 4. de rebus Salomonis, c. 1. thinks that David did this way also enrich himself, and citeth this testimony of Eupolemus: and yet certainly David had many other ways to gather riches. Much land doubtless he gained by conquest, from the Canaanites and Philistines, besides those fruitful vallies near Jordan in Traconitis and Basan, and the best of Syria, and other countries bordering the Israhelites. These demesns be-like he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of captives, which he took in his wars, which were not able to redeem themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written, 1 Chron. xvii. that Jehonathan was over his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the cities, in the towns; that Ezri was over the labourers that tilled his ground; Simei over the vineyards; and Sabdi over the store of the wine; Baal Hanan over the olive trees, and Joash over the store of the oil, also that he had herdsmen that had charge over his cattel, both in the high lands, and in the plains, over his sheep, camels and asses. And this custom of enriching themselves by husbandry and cattle the ancient kings every where held, both before and after David's time. For we read of ^d Pharoah, that he spoke to Joseph to appoint some of his brethren, or of their servants, to be rulers over his cattle. We read of ^e Uzzia, that he loved husbandry, had much cattle, and ploughmen, and dressers of vines: likewise we read it in all Greeks poets, that the wealth of the ancient kings did especially consist in their herds and flocks, whereof it were needless to cite Augeas and Admetus, or any other, for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning David, it is not unlikely, but that those captives which were not employ'd in husbandry, were many of them used by him in all sorts of gainful professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner used their slaves.

To these profits (besides the tributes and impossibilities which doubtless were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Tobu, and others) we may add the great spoils which he found in the cities and countries which he conquered: also the head-money which was gathered per legem capitationis; by the law of capitation or head-money, every man, rich or poor, paying half a sickle of the sanctuary, which is about as much as 14 pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous sum in that kingdom: wherein 1570000 fighting men were numbred by ^f Joab. Now altho' this law of capitation be thought by some very learned not to have been perpetual (which opinion of theirs nevertheless they confess is against the Hebrew expositions) yet David upon this occasion is not unlikely to have put it in practice. And by these means might he be able to leave those huge treasures to Solomon. Yet it may seem that this great mass of gold and silver left by David, the least part was his own in private, and so will it appear the less wonderful that he left so much. Of his own liberality we find, that he gave to the building of the temple 3000 talents of gold, and 7000 talents of silver, a great sum: but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the sanctuary it self were exceeding great, as needs they must have been, having received continual encrease, without any loss or diminution ever since the time of Moses and Joshua. The revenues of the sanctuary (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defray'd the daily expences, and maintained the priest and Levites) were partly raised out of the head-money beforementioned; partly out of the spoils gotten in war. For all the booty was divided into two parts, whereof the soldiers had one, and the people which remained at home, had the other half; whereby all the country received benefit of the victory, yet so that the soldiers had a far greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiving more for every single share.

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lord's tribute, which was one in fifty of that which the people received, and one in five hundred of that which was given to the soldiers; namely, one hundred and one thousandth part of the whole booty. So in the spoil of Midian, 32000 women being taken, the army had 16000 of them for slaves, and the congregation the other 16000; but out of the 16000 given to the army were exempted 32 for the Lord's tribute. Out of the people's number were taken 320. By this means the lesser that the army was which had exposed it self to danger, the greater profit had every soldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaining at home were fain to undergo more than ordinary travel in domestic affairs, did receive by so much the greater portion. But the Lord's tribute was always certain, yea, many times it was increased, either by some especial commandment, as when all the gold, and silver, and other metals found in Jericho, were consecrated unto God; or by thankfulness of the rulers and people, as when after the victory obtained against the Midianites without the loss of one man, all jewels, bracelets, ear-rings, and the like, were offered up, as voluntary presents.

Now howsoever the Israelites were many times oppress'd, and trodden down by other nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies never got possession of the tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the sanctuary must have been exceeding great; as containing above one hundredth part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtained against the bordering nations. For that this treasury was not defrauded of the due portion, it is evident; seeing that before the time of David and his lieutenant Joab, it is recorded, that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had used to dedicate of the spoils obtained in war, to maintain the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former judges and captains in other ages. Certain it is, that the conquest of David brought into the land far greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Joshua perhaps excepted: but these vast sums of an 100000 talents of silver, may seem rather to have been made up, by the addition of his winnings and liberality, to the treasures laid up in many former ages, than to have been the mere fruits of his own industry.

Now concerning the riches of Solomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he received of yearly revenues, with his tributes, 666 talents of gold, besides the customs of spices. He had also six rich returns from the East-Indies, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that voyage every three years, and he began that trade in the 22d year of his reign, and ruled 40 years. Besides this, all Judea and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobab, of Damascena, of Palmyrena, of Iturea; all of Idumea, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizzites, Hevites, Jebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished, tho' subjected.
